Uppers.—There has been a somewhat increased demand for this variety, but practically all the cotton is strongly held, and sellers are extremely difficult to deal with. The price of spot as compared with contracts remains about unchanged for cotton below fully good fair, but has somewhat hardened for fully good fair and above.

Crop 1924.—The report of the Ministry of Agriculture for February reads :—Preparation of land is actively taking place; in Lower Egypt Zagora is being sown on a larger scale than last year. A few fields have already been sown, and the cotton area is expected to be larger than last year. There is also a tendency towards early cultivation.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Business on Improved Scale.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended March 12 :—

Egyptian Spot.—The better feeling hinted at in our previous report has been well maintained. Spinners have continued to take cotton freely, and there is no sign of any diminution in the daily sales, which have again continued good at an average of over 1,000 bales per diem. Prices have fluctuated within comparatively narrow limits, and the tendency during the past week has been definitely upward. Early in the week the inquiry was of a somewhat hesitating character, due to the possibility of a lock-out occurring in the Lancashire mills, but later it broadened out considerably and a fair general business took place. The attention of buyers has been concentrated chiefly on Sakellaridis 50 to 75 on, and 100 to 150 on contracts. In the lower quality, there is at present no lack of cotton, but the bulk of it is of a very poor character, and the careful buyer has considerable difficulty in finding "staple." From 100 to 150 on, the selection is comparatively small, and cotton in the neighbourhood of 100 on appears to be going off very rapidly. The finer grades have been practically neglected, but the quotations of good Sakel were raised to-day exceptionally, 15 points.

In uppers, a distinct falling off in interest has been noticeable, due, we believe, to the extravagant limits under which the better quality cottons have recently been labouring. As we pointed out in a previous report some time ago, buyers will not follow indefinitely a constantly hardening basis for uppers, for after a point, they find it more economical to seek the necessary raw material in other, and outside, channels. Such inquiry as we have witnessed has been nearly all for cotton round about pass price futures, but lower grades down to "100 off" have also been in request, a marked contrast to a fortnight ago, when it was a case of "extra fine or nothing." A fair business has taken place in Sudan cotton, chiefly in the Sakel variety, as much as 250 on being paid in one day. Brown, white, and pilion have been in poor demand. C.i.f. business remains in a state of stagnation. Forwardings to spinners for the week ending the 7th inst. were returned as 14,313 bales. Estimated sales 6,000 bales Egyptian and 600 bales Sudan. Quotations are advanced 55 points

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

The Manchester cotton trade review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended March 15 states :—

Whilst some sections report a fair volume of inquiry, the turnover has not been satisfactory. Spinners and manufacturers hold to their prices firmly, but buyers abroad operate with great care. As was anticipated, the dispute referred to in previous reports has been settled without recourse to a lock-out. The Board of Trade returns of shipments effected during February were surprisingly good, but, of course, these relate to business arranged some weeks previously.

Yarn.—Spinners are maintaining their new attitude very strongly, and, where changed, prices are a little higher. The orders booked are not large, but probably sufficient to clear the output on the present half-time basis. Shipments during February were 14,131,900 lbs., against 10,991,500 lbs. in January and 10,801,600 lbs. in February of last year.

Cloth.—Inquiry in this section has been of satisfactory dimensions, but the firmness shown by manufacturers has led to only an inadequate proportion of it being translated into actual orders. Sales have been, generally speaking, in small lots, and large commitments for any market are seldom heard of. Shipments during February amounted to 397,070,200 sq. yds., against 353,965,900 sq. yds. in January and 342,558,520 sq. yds. in February, 1923.

Cotton.—After a heavy fall on Saturday last there has been an advancing tendency, but it cannot be said that there is as yet much confidence in the stability of present rates. Closing prices yesterday were as follows :—American fully middling, 17.20d. ; Egyptian fully good fair, 20.85d.

SMYRNA FRUIT MARKET.

Messrs. C. J. Giraud and Co., of Smyrna, report as follows for the week ended March 1 :—

The arrivals of sultanas on the market are estimated at 36,600 tons, and the sales are put at 35,700 tons. Prices in local currency are unchanged. Higher exchanges, however, slightly reduce quotations in foreign equivalents. Some fresh business has reached the market this week from Continental sources.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The Khalifate.

There has hardly been time for any definite steps to be taken by the Moslem world in regard to the Khalifate and King Hussein's assumption of the office. As was anticipated in our last issue, opposition to the latter is being manifested in several quarters, notably in Egypt, where the appointment of King Fuad as Khalif is being actively canvassed. Warned by King Hussein's experience, however, a section at least of Moslem opinion in Egypt recommends the regularisation of the appointment by means of a properly constituted congress of Islam. In the meantime, the Ministry of Wakfs, with a view to introducing uniformity in the Egyptian mosques, has issued orders that there should be for the present no prayers for a Khalif, but that a prayer should be inserted for King Fuad qua King. King Hussein is reported to have decided to summon a world Moslem conference to consider questions of universal Moslem interest, but it remains to be seen what response will be made to this attempt to secure by a side wind endorsement for his Khalifate. The prospects of harmony for an Arab Khalifate do not appear to be rosy, if we may judge from an outspoken communication from Sultan Ibn Saoud of Nejd to an Egyptian paper on the subject of King Hussein. The letter, which seems to be accepted as genuine, was written before the question of a vacancy in the Khalifate had arisen, and deals merely with King Hussein's political activities. The King of the Hejaz is accused of attempting to dominate the Arabian peninsula, and Ibn Saoud drily remarks that none of the neighbours of the Hejaz can accept King Hussein as their leader. There will be some delay before Indian Moslems can formulate a policy on the Khalifate question. Mr. Mohammed Ali and his discredited Khalifate Committee are still trying to dominate Moslem opinion by pretending that the question is linked up with British rule in India; but the decision of the All-India Moslem League to hold a meeting at Lahore in June is a sign that the League is no longer content to be a tool in the hands of the Committee.

The Greek Crisis.

The policy of conciliation propounded by M. Papanastasiou, the new Republican Prime Minister of Greece, has not met with the ready acceptance that its merits seemed to bespeak for it. While the rank and file of the Royalists are understood to be favourably disposed, opposition on the part of some of the leaders is being encountered. With a view to bringing all Royalists under a single leader, the Government has invited General Metaxas to return to Greece under a safe conduct; but he is inclined to stipulate for a general amnesty as a preliminary step to safeguard his own position in case there should be any change of personnel or opinion in the Republican Cabinet. A gesture of complete confidence would, perhaps, have become General Metaxas better, the more so as the part that he played in the purely military revolt of General Leonardopoulos was not heroic, nor even dignified. While in exile, General Metaxas is clearly unable to exercise any influence on the course of Greek affairs; returned to Greece, he might gather up, with advantage to Greece, the reins of authority that he wilfully threw away when he abandoned his constitutional opposition in an unsuccessful attempt to identify himself with a movement that would have nothing to do with him. Prior to this false step, he had shown some capacity as head of the Royalists. If, through anxiety for his own personal safety, he now fails his party again, it would be well if some of the younger and moderate members of that party were to assume responsibility for the Royalist policy. It was the abandonment of constitutional methods by General Metaxas that gave the Republicans their opportunity. The shortest cut to extricating Greece from her ills now seems to be in an acceptance of the Republican programme. Until Greece has retraced her steps to strict constitutionalism, there is no point in the Royalists' attempting to challenge what is now being imposed on the country by force.

Egypt's Parliament.

In spite of the absence of an official Opposition in the Egyptian Legislative Assembly—the small group of Deputies who are not Zaghloulists is hardly numerous enough to claim the title—the Cabinet is apparently not to be allowed to have things all its own way without a struggle. The moderation and statesmanship of Zaghloul Pasha do not commend themselves to the extremists of his party, and something like an organised attempt is being made to impose extremist views on the Government. An amendment to the Address from the Throne from among the Prime Minister's own followers is a luxury to be indulged in only where a party practically monopolises the representation of the country. Zaghloul Pasha, however, has taken a firm stand in the matter and seems resolved to make his followers adopt correct parliamentary practice at the risk of his resignation. A split in the party would appear to be inevitable sooner or later, as the left wing, on its own showing, is angling for trouble in every direction. If Zaghloul Pasha is to steer the country quietly and efficiently through the early stages of its independence, he must be assured of a loyal following. Perhaps, when the Budget is presented and the Assembly is reminded that this year's surplus of £600,000 brings Egypt's reserve fund, which it inherits from Great Britain's association with the country, to eighteen million Egyptian pounds, extreme Nationalists will realise that there is another side to their picture of Egypt's sorrows under British occupation.

Yugoslav Politics.

The appearance in the Skupshtina of the Croatian Deputies who have hitherto refrained from taking their seats has placed M. Pashitch's Radicals in a minority, and he has resigned without waiting for a defeat in the Chamber. M. Pashitch's capacity for steering the Yugoslav ship of state in the most adverse circumstances is so exceptional that it is difficult to imagine any set of conditions, except one, that will drive him permanently from office. Fresh elections appear inevitable, and it is unlikely that he will forgo the advantage of being in power when these are held. The Skupshtina stands prorogued until a new Cabinet has been formed, and the expectation in Belgrade is that M. Pashitch will form a new Government and dissolve the Chamber.

The Turkish Constitution.

The vesting of supreme authority, executive as well as legislative, in the Turkish Grand National Assembly, is likely to be carried to the extreme length of withholding from the President of the Republic the right to dissolve it. A clause in the draft Constitution granting the right to the President, secured only two votes in its favour, but as the 131 Deputies present did not constitute a quorum, the subject has to come up again for discussion. The outcome of Turkey's constitutional experiment will be watched with interest, as it promises to ride roughshod over all former practice. It is not difficult to foresee complications arising when an Assembly of highly paid Deputies can be dissolved only by its own decision; and Mustapha Kemal Pasha must now be beginning to regret that the only opposition in the Assembly is provided by his own party.

Persia's Problem.

The course of true republicanism is not running as smoothly in Persia as it has in Turkey. At the eleventh hour the opponents of the proposal to substitute a Republic for the Monarchy asserted themselves and marched to the Mejliss to protest against the change. They were ultimately dispersed, but they appear to have put a spoke, at least for the time being, in the Republicans' wheel. The idea of a Republic was dropped, and the Mejliss proceeded to depose the Shah and to proclaim his son, aged two years, as his successor. Whether the Sardar Sipah becomes Regent or agrees to the appointment of someone else to the post, the reins of power are likely to remain in his hands for the present, to the manifest advantage of Persia. He was credited with being in favour of a Republic, but in the face of the strong opposition he has been well advised to accept the proposed compromise. The ex-Shah will require and receive no sympathy. His heart has never been in his work, as his frequent absence from Persia has testified. If the Kajar dynasty continues to exist, it will be due to the monarchical instinct of the people rather than to the merit of recent occupants of the Throne. It is to be hoped, however, that the successful opposition to the proposed Republic will not encourage the forces of reaction in the country. There should be plenty of room for progress with the retention of the Monarchy, provided that there is a body of public opinion wise enough to recognise the need for reforms and someone strong enough to carry out reforms. In the considerable measure of success that the Sardar Sipah has already obtained it was not easy for the foreign observer to discover the need for alarming conservatism by a radical change in the Constitution.

Transjordania.

The indeterminate status of Transjordania is well exemplified by two recent reports from that country. First of all it was stated that King Hussein had appointed the Emir Abdullah Commander-in-Chief of the Hejaz forces as an alleged preliminary step to effecting an exchange of posts between the ruler of Transjordania and his brother Ali. Although Transjordania is separate from Palestine, it comes under the Palestine Mandate, and the High Commissioner for Palestine is responsible for the country. Consequently, there seemed something anomalous in the Emir Abdullah, who received his appointment from Great Britain, acquiescing in his transfer to another post at the behest of the King of the Hejaz. On such a point, however, the British Government would doubtless wish to further the interests of all concerned, especially as in so doing it might save its grant-in-aid. There has, however, been no further reference to the subject. Whatever the political status of Transjordania, no serious attempt has yet been made to determine its boundaries, and it is now announced that the King of the Hejaz has transferred the districts of Akaba and Tebuk (the latter a station on the Hejaz Railway) to the Emir Abdullah. The effect of this transfer of territory will be to introduce a more definite southern frontier for Transjordania than has existed in the past, and the next step should be to draw up a precise boundary line between the two countries. The greater part of the territory in question, which includes the famous ruins of Petra, had previously been regarded as belonging to Transjordania, but it is well that the rights of possession should be settled officially before any dispute can arise. The time may come when Petra proves to be a minor Mecca for tourists to the great advantage of the Transjordanian exchequer.

The Prospect for India.

The second phase of the discussions on the Indian Budget came to an abrupt termination last week when, after a little preliminary hesitation, the bloc hardened its heart, and, by a minimal majority, rejected the Finance Bill as a whole. The Viceroy has now "recommended" a new Bill, which will be "certified" in due course, and the administration of the coming year will proceed nearly, but not quite, on the usual lines. Such difference as there is arises from the fact that the Viceroy can certify necessaries, but not luxuries or even comforts, and the most important practical result is that the financial relief which it was hoped to give to the provinces has been rendered impossible for the present. We take it that some members of the bloc will hear more of this matter when they get back to their constituencies; but that is their affair. They have chosen their own course, and have now to draw the appropriate lessons from the consequences. In this country the general attitude is one of disappointment that so little progress has been made, but we seem to discern an increasing recognition of the fact that the burden laid on the shoulders of the nascent democracy was rather heavy at the outset, and a tendency to hope that the beginners will display the ability to learn from their own mistakes.

The Situation in the Provinces.

The rejection of a provincial Budget has more important results in practice than follow from similar action on the part of the Central Assembly. At the time of writing it is still uncertain whether Bengal intends to establish the truth of this proposition by experiment, for the early divisions there have been won and lost by single votes; but in the Central Provinces its demonstration is now being pressed forward. A Governor can finance and administer the reserved departments effectively, but he can only carry on a minimum of the work of those which have been transferred to Ministers. Sir Frank Sly has lost his Ministers, and for the present there is an end to all active progress in "nation-building," to use the phrase current in India for the development of education and sanitation, of agriculture, industries, and the like. The result must be a temporary set-back for the progressive little province, and we take it that State-aided colleges and hospitals, in particular, will be hard hit. By-and-by we presume the electors will be asked to say how they like the régime of stagnation imposed on them by their representatives, and they will then have a remedy ready to their hands.

Has Dyarchy Broken Down?

The position which has now been reached in some provinces has not unnaturally been interpreted as a collapse of the dual administrative system elaborated by Lord Chelmsford and Mr. Montagu, and last week the leading journal displayed as a headline the ominous words, "Breakdown of Indian Dyarchy"; but we are inclined to prefer the statement of a special correspondent in the same issue that "Dyarchy has hardly had a fair trial." As a matter of fact, most of the Ministers appointed three years ago fell into the natural mistake of regarding themselves as part of the bureaucracy—the only political institution they really understood—and, neglecting the legislatures, tried to settle down comfortably in their offices. In the result most of them have been eliminated, and in those provinces where the legislatures are functioning their successors are now giving indications of a more correct appreciation of their position. It is, of course, slow work to build up a new political tradition, and very little of it has yet been accomplished, but it seems to us that the cry of a breakdown is premature: the important thing now is that the significance of initial errors should be clearly grasped and that their repetition should be avoided.

It is officially stated that the colonies of Bermuda, Jamaica, Cyprus, Malta, Mauritius, Gibraltar, and Sierra Leone make no direct contribution towards the cost of the Imperial troops stationed there. Ceylon makes a contribution, which is limited to two-thirds of the cost of the garrison.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Tuesday Morning.

The Abbey Election.

Hour after hour since the result of the Abbey election, in which the official Conservative candidate defeated Mr. Winston Churchill by 43 votes, sermons have been preached explaining the true meaning of the whole affair. It was, indeed, just the kind of dramatic incident on which our gushing writers of leading articles love to dwell. How Mr. Churchill, on being told that he was in, went up gleefully to speak to his wife; how, on being told that he was out, he dropped from his mouth a newly lighted cigar; how, in a hoarse voice, he demanded a recount—all these things we have been told ad nauseam by the sensational Press. The truth is, of course, that the defeat of Mr. Churchill means very little to the country—he will surely try again and succeed.

What significance this election may have lies almost wholly in the enormous number of votes gained for the Labour candidate. For a conscientious objector, of all people, to get 6,000 votes from the constituency of Westminster is scarcely a hopeful sign that all is well with Conservative policy. There has been a revulsion against the spirit which was on top during the War—it would be foolish to deny it—but it is impossible to believe that it has developed to the extent of supporting a man who did his best to prevent our winning the War; there must be another explanation of the support given to Mr. Fenner Brockway. Englishmen have short memories, and it was probably rather the fact that the Socialist candidate had what the other candidates had not—a definite policy—that gained for him all these votes. The feeling that Labour alone is "out" to do something for the under-dog is very rampant just now, and, unless it can be dispelled, the Liberal Party will be not the only party in danger of disappearing.

And the most pitiable part of the whole situation seems to be that the best brains outside the Socialist Party are purely destructive. At present the main significance of the Conservative Party lies in a belief that it safeguards security—a material significance that is, of course, the meanest and meagrest that any party could have.

caused has been very considerable. Reports in the papers to the contrary are, to say the least of them, "tendencious." It is again a question of wages; the tramway men want 8s. more a week, and the omnibus men are in sympathy with their "demands." Of course, we are told that the strike is unjustifiable (just as we were told the same thing in the trouble with the dockers, who eventually were granted their demands almost in toto), but the public is a little tired of looking at the matter in this way. It feels that the country is, with all these strikes and rumours of strikes—the miners may soon be out, and it is said that the N.U.R. contemplate action shortly—getting upside down, and that it is not the slightest use prating about the iniquities of the men when the masters have already stated that they are prepared to grant advances of 2s. to 5s. a week. If this advance can be made now, says the ordinary man, it ought to have been made without a demanding of it: it is just that appearance of both sides desiring to get the last drop possible out of the other that makes all these affairs so depressing.

Meanwhile the trains are crowded, the feet are tired, and the taxi men roaringly prosperous. The "pirate" 'buses, of which a good deal had been promised, have not been much in evidence, but perhaps they are taking a day or two to find out the most profitable routes.

The University Sports.

It was pretty universally hoped that at the University Sports on Saturday one side would win and someone would break the high-jump record. Neither of these things, however, happened. Oxford and Cambridge tied with five and a-half events each, although Cambridge might have won but for the fact that their hope in the three miles mistook the tenth lap for the last, produced his sprint, and collapsed before the finish. And in the high jump neither the Oxford nor the Cambridge man did more than 5 ft. 11 in., which was 3½ in. off the record.

Of the Boat Race, which is on April 5, it is still a little early to write. Cambridge have had extraordinarily bad luck with illness, although they are, one says, more advanced in their preparation; but it is difficult to maintain that the Light Blues, with but one old Blue in their boat, will defeat Oxford. The unusual difference in the weights—Cambridge have only one man over 13 st. and but two over 12 st.—is alone almost sufficient to make Oxford favourites.

Ireland.

There seems to be an epidemic in the world just now of armies wishing to take control of the civil authorities, and although the disease is acute enough in Ireland, that fact alone would not be sufficient to rivet the attention of England on the Free State. What has drawn the tired gaze of the people of this island to the Irish is the alarming murder of British troops off Queenstown. This news came as a shock to most Englishmen, who thought that British soldiers and sailors were no longer used in the defence of Ireland.

But, as with Greece, so, one imagines, will the Government act towards Ireland. To track down the murderers is obviously the work of Mr. Cosgrave's Administration. Few people had thought that all Irishmen were resigned to the Free State, and had suspected that there were still plenty of irreconcilables, but they did not know that there were still in Ireland English soldiers as butts of these irreconcilables' discontent. Real peace in that country seems far off yet, and it may be that the relations between it and this country are to undergo some modification.

The Empire Exhibition.

The air has been thick for some time past, both in and out of Parliament, with charges of mismanagement and of corruption in connection with the Empire Exhibition at Wembley, and it is not yet altogether dissolved, in spite of abundant and reassuring official statements. Complaints that the Exhibition would not be ready by St. George's Day have long been made, but there are people to be found who believe that all will be well.

The Government's attitude in face of all these charges and complaints does not differ at all from what any other Government's attitude would be, and one is bound to say that it is no more convincing. If, however, the Labour Government make a marked success of the Exhibition, they will gain unreckonable kudos. And one rather thinks that they do perceive the uniqueness of their opportunity. So that for this, if for no other reason, they will do their utmost to ridicule the derisive cry of the Rothermere Press that the Exhibition will not be ready by April 23.

CYPRUS AND BYRON.

We have received the following telegram from the Limassol Press Bureau dated March 24:—

The hundredth anniversary of Byron's death has been celebrated here at a largely attended meeting. The Mayor presided, and those present included members of the Legislative Assembly and Municipal Council, clergy, members of school committees and club, and all the local social and political associations. A portrait of Byron framed in laurel leaves intertwined with the British and Greek colours hung in the hall. The meeting passed a vote of gratitude to British Philhellenes, appealing to them to support the union of Cyprus with Greece.

Preparations have been made for the holding of similar meetings throughout Cyprus.

Bulgaria has accepted the offer of the Inter-Allied Commission to reduce the cost of the armies of occupation to £1,000,000, payable over ten years, during which time 5 per cent. interest will be charged.

The King and Queen of Roumania, the King and Queen of the Hellenes, the Crown Prince and Princess of Roumania, and Prince Paul and Princess Irene of Greece honoured Sir Herbert and Lady Dering with their presence last Tuesday night at a fancy dress ball at the British Legation in Bucharest.

Cairo, March 16.

Constitutional Egypt.

Nobody who watched yesterday's inauguration of Parliament could have failed to have been impressed by the fact that the organisers, whether consciously or unconsciously, had produced a most effective colour scheme. From the terrace behind the galleries of the Chamber of Deputies the scene could be appreciated to the full, the crimson tarboushes, green and white turbans, and black skull caps on the road below, along each side of which ran a rank of blue-uniformed policemen, with khaki-clad soldiers in front, then the spectators, ranged hundreds deep, in the gardens of the Ministries opposite, the roofs of which were packed with Egyptian women, whose thin white veils, flying in the breeze, lent the last picturesque touch. But if there had been plenty of colour before, it seemed all to fade away when the Royal Bodyguard, magnificent in new uniforms of a wonderful mauve blue, with canary facings and sashes of another yellow, with touches of scarlet in the head-dress and other parts of the uniform, their lance pennants fluttering in the breeze, came into sight, preceding and following the six-horse State coach in which rode the King and the Prime Minister. It would be difficult to imagine anything smarter or more splendidly turned out than King Fuad's household troops, particularly the cavalry, and yesterday they were certainly groomed, horses and men, to the last hair. For those of the spectators who had ever done any soldiering themselves the uppermost thought was to wonder how many hours of cleaning and polishing had been necessary to produce such immaculate perfection.

For the crowd, the important part of yesterday's proceedings was, of course, the street pageantry. And even for the privileged few for whom there had been reserved accommodation in the Chamber itself, it was the exterior martial display which seemed the more impressive. Egyptians love and are very good at organising a spectacle. As yet democratic institutions are too new for such a ceremony as that of yesterday, at which the majority of those chiefly concerned were making their initial acquaintance with formal procedure, to be quite as dignified as it should be. Everyone, including King Fuad, who handed his speech to Zaghloul Pasha for the latter to read, seemed a little nervous. And no wonder. For the senators and deputies gathered below it must have seemed like a first appearance on the stage, with the glitteringly clad diplomatic corps gazing down from their galleries as a critical audience which knew more about the play than did the actors themselves. None the less, it was all very interesting and thoroughly well done. The Parliament House, too, on those who were seeing it for the first time, made an excellent impression. It is a very conveniently arranged building in which the needs of everybody, including even the Press—too often in this country neglected—seem to have been very carefully studied. The architect, Mr. B. R. Hebblethwaite, deserves all the more credit, seeing that, when the building of the House was decided upon, he was given only a fortnight to produce plans for which six months would have been a more usual time allowance. The worst fault of the building is, perhaps, that the galleries are too high up, but only experience will show whether this will be, from the reporters' point of view, a serious drawback.

The Premier and the Press.

A very bad impression has been caused by the Government's attitude towards the Opposition Press in connection with Parliament's inauguration. Owing to the fact that the two Nationalist newspapers, the Lewa and the Omma, were suppressed some time ago, and have not since been allowed to reappear, the Opposition in the newspaper world is confined to three journals, the Siyassa, organ of the Constitutional Liberal Party; the Watan, an anti-Zaghloulist Coptic organ; and the Akhbar, an independent sheet. The first two of these were excluded, by the Prime Minister's order, from the inauguration ceremony. Protests were made by the editors of all the Arabic newspapers, but the Premier would not modify his decision. "Do you ask me," he answered a deputation, "to allow to be present the representatives of the newspapers which have insulted us?" It is not yet known whether the ban is to be permanent, nor is it clear that such a prohibition could lawfully be made, but it is certain that, if it can, the present Government will keep out reporters whose newspapers are too critical of the Ministry's doings. A similar discrimination was made yesterday for correspondents of English newspapers, the representatives of the Morning Post and the Daily Mail being refused admission. These exclusions were not based on lack of accommodation, for the Press Gallery was scarcely more than half-filled by journalists, the remaining seats being allocated to various people whose claims to be present were not very evident. It was not only in the case of newspapers that the sheep had been separated from the goats, for the leading anti-Zaghloulist politicians, such as Sarwat Pasha and the members of his Cabinet, had also been excluded. A number of ex-Ministers, including the two former Premiers, Adly Pasha Yeghen and Hussein Pasha Rushdy, had been invited, but did not attend.

The Khalifate.

The Khalifate question continues to occupy public attention, and all sorts of proposals and suggestions are made in the Arabic Press, but none of them, least of all the assembling of an Islamic congress in Cairo, seems likely to materialise. So far, there has been no pronouncement on the subject by any of the chief Moslem dignitaries, the statement circulated last week by a number of ulema conspicuously lacking the signature of any very prominent Mohammedan theologian. The most authoritative opinion yet given is probably that of Sheikh Mohammed Bekhit, ex-Grand Mufti, who, in the Siyassa has declared that the deposition of the Khalif Abdul Mejid is illegal, and that all Moslems should look to him as their religious head. But, as though to illustrate the local division of opinion on the subject, another prominent sheikh, Rashid el Rida, has an article in the same day's Ahram, declaring that all the arguments about Abdul Mejid are futile, since he has never been the true Khalif, who still is Wahid ed Din. But neither Sheikh Bekhit nor Sheikh Rashid el Rida, though their opinions arouse some interest, has any official status in the local religious world, and the two men whose pronouncement would be authoritative, the Grand Mufti and the Rector of Al Azhar, seem to be determined to say nothing on the subject.

Mr. Verschoyle's Retirement.

The difficult position of British officials in the Egyptian administration of to-day has been further emphasised by the retirement of Mr. Verschoyle, who succeeded Brigadier-General Blakeney as general manager of the Egyptian State Railways only a few months ago. When General Blakeney retired, it was no secret that the cause of his going was his inability to work with Mahmoud Samy Pasha, Under-Secretary of State in the Ministry of Communications. Samy Pasha's theory of the relationship of the head of the railways to the Ministry is that the former is simply a departmental head, whose actions must be controlled and supervised, just like those of any other official, and who does not need, and should not have, any particular powers in order to secure the efficient running of the railways. It is possible that Samy Pasha's theory is right, but it is impossible to find a British official who will accept a position in which the opinion of himself and of his technical staff on purely technical matters is being constantly overridden by an Under-Secretary of State, who, though he may be a capable administrator, is entirely ignorant of railway working. General Blakeney would not accept the position, and with great difficulty the Egyptian Government persuaded Mr. Verschoyle to take the general managership. Mr. Verschoyle was very loth to do so, well knowing the difficulties, and it was only after much persuasion, from the Residency as well as from the Egyptian side, that he accepted. He had never any illusions regarding the work he was taking on, and for that reason insisted that his four years' contract should contain a clause permitting him to resign at any time by giving three months' notice. Now he has resigned, and it is most improbable that another British official can be found to take his place. It is unlikely, indeed, that the Egyptian Government will try to find another British general manager, for there is talk of abolishing the position. Mahmoud Samy Pasha remarked to a reporter the other day, "Why do they want a general manager of the railways? I can very well do the work in addition to my present duties." So, maybe, the Government intends to let the man who has made impossible the position of two general managers become the general manager in fact, if not in name, himself. Possibly the experiment will work well, but if it does it will belie the opinion of every British official in the railways, who considers that the system is rapidly drifting into complete disorder. Anyhow, Mahmoud Samy Pasha may not himself reap the reward of his work, for he is notoriously Liberal Constitutional in political leanings, and his appointment may well in the near future become one of the spoils of victory—a reward for a faithful follower.

GREECE.

Athens, March 15.

The Legation Outrage.

When on the morning of March 12 those of the Athenians who had not heard the violent explosion were informed by the papers that an attempt had been made to blow up the British Legation, many of them experienced that disagreeable feeling of having a jug of cold water poured down one's back on a cold winter morning. The Corfu experience was still fresh in their minds, and another international "incident" from which Greece would once again emerge with her colours lowered was the last thing on earth they desired. The timely assurances of the British Minister, Sir Milne Cheetham, however, to the effect that he attached no political importance to the dastardly attempt immediately alleviated all earlier fears, and the Greeks were thanking their lucky stars that the outrage was not committed on the doorstep of the Legation of another well-known Power, which might have easily been the case. In these extremely hard times, they argued, it would be very difficult to raise another 50 million liras, even though some of the money might eventually find its way into the pockets of the refugees.

The explosion occurred at one o'clock in the morning, at which time Dragatsaniou Street, where the Legation is situated, is usually deserted. Moreover, that part of Athens, although in the very heart of the city and at a stone's-throw from three Ministries—Interior, Finance, and Marine—is very badly lighted, making detection difficult, if not impossible. The statement of the sentry on duty outside the Ministry of Finance to the effect that a few seconds before the explosion he saw two men running towards St. Theodore's Church should therefore be treated with reserve. The only occupants of the Legation that night were Sir Milne and Lady Cheetham and the butlers. Fortunately, none of them was hurt, and only poor Mehmet, the Legation's black hall porter, who was sleeping in the basement of the building, was thrown clear of his bed by the force of the explosion. The Chief of the British Police Mission in Greece, Sir Frederick Halliday, was one of the first to arrive on the scene of the explosion. His confrère of the Greek Police, who was inexplicably late in putting in an appearance, was replaced a few hours after the explosion. Sir Frederick, whom I saw early that morning, very kindly explained to me how the whole business was done, and at the same time initiated me into the mysteries of dynamite explosions. It appears that the cartridge was placed in a crack of the outer marble step by an experienced hand, which knew exactly what the amount of damage would be. There was no intention whatsoever of blowing up the Legation. The destruction of the massive wooden doors was all that was aimed at, and these were blown from their hinges.

There are naturally many theories as to the reasons of the outrage, the most plausible being that it was a purely political move in order "to put a spoke in the wheels of the Republicans." As Sir Frederick said, it was simply done to blacken the face of the Papanastasiou Government. But there are a good many who firmly believe that the explosion was caused by foreign agents, and a certain Great Power is openly mentioned. These circles maintain that the outrage would never have been perpetrated had Great Britain not shown so much interest in Greece's favour in the Dodecanesian question.

M. Venizelos's Departure.

M. Venizelos left Greece almost as quietly and as unobtrusively as he arrived just over two months ago. Hardly more than forty people, including M. Kaphandaris, the ex-Premier, boarded the Italian steamer "Carnaro" to bid farewell to the departing Cretan statesman. M. Roussos, recently Minister for Foreign Affairs, and a very old friend of M. Venizelos, wept like a child as he embraced the ex-Premier on both cheeks. In fact, there was hardly a dry eye among the little band of friends and admirers, who seemed to realise that this was the final appearance of M. Venizelos on the Greek stage. To journalists who boarded the "Carnaro" M. Venizelos said that he had no plans. He was very disillusioned and very tired and needed a long rest.

The Republican Government.

M. Papanastasiou, the Republican chief, might well be pleased with himself. The most he could have hoped for ten days ago was to be included in a Coalition Cabinet under M. Kaphandaris. To-day, thanks to the assistance of his military allies, he is the Prime Minister of a virtually Republican Greece. M. Kaphandaris's sudden resignation came as a great surprise even to the members of his Cabinet, who were not informed of his decision to relinquish power until the very last minute. They could not very well understand why a government which, but a few days ago, had obtained the National Assembly's confidence with an overwhelming majority, should suddenly decide to throw in the sponge, thus enabling its rivals to become masters of the situation. But M. Kaphandaris held different views. He had from the very first declared that if ever the Officers' League were to be reconstituted and the military were to resume their old tactics of interfering with the work of the Government, he would relinquish power without the slightest hesitation.

The new Government will appear before the National Assembly next week to outline its programme and ask for a vote of confidence. The programme includes the definite déchéance of the Glücksburg dynasty and the establishment of a Republic, the latter subject to the approval of the people by a plebiscite. Although M. Papanastasiou is displaying a good deal of optimism, competent Liberal circles maintain that in all probability the Republicans will be defeated in the Assembly, and will consequently be forced to resign, in which case the only solution would seem to be the formation of a Coalition Cabinet.

Miscellaneous.

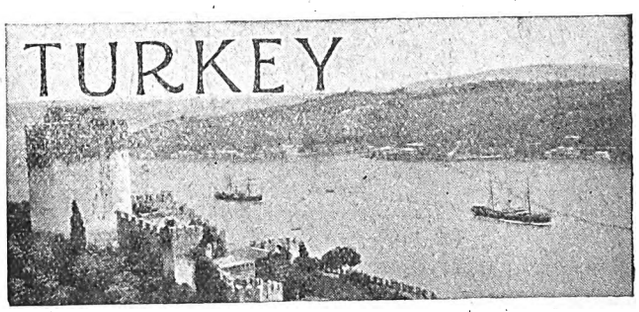
General Danglis, the inventor of the Scheider-Danglis gun, which was adopted by the French, Greek, and Russian armies, died early this week at the Evangelismos Hospital in Athens following an operation for cancer.

The Hellenic Government is negotiating with Messrs. Yarrows for the construction of two high sea destroyers. The ships in question will be of the latest type, with a speed of 36 knots, and will cost about £300,000 each.

The net profits of the National Bank of Greece during the year 1923 were Drs. 104,115,232. The board of directors have decided to pay a dividend of Drs. 1,200, which is Drs. 400 more than was paid last year. The National Bank has established three new branches—at Verria, Ekaterini, and Grevena.

The Government proposes to create a Ministry of Public Safety. General Pangalos will probably take charge of the new Ministry.

At the annual meeting of the Anglo-Hellenic League in Athens, M. D. M. Kalopothakis, Director of the Press Bureau at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, was elected chairman for the years 1924 and 1925. Capt. C. M. Elliadi was elected hon. secretary. Among the members of the executive committee are included Sir Frederick Halliday, Mr. B. Hill, Dr. A. Cawadias, and Prof. S. Menardos. Prof. A. M. Andreades is the president of the League.



Constantinople, March 17.

The Question of the Schools.

The comparative calm of the past week has been rather an anti-climax after the breathless succession of events in the week that preceded it. The few remaining members of the ex-Imperial house have left Turkish territory for various destinations, but no further radical changes have yet been made. The foundations of Turkish society have been so profoundly shaken, and the insecurity of every institution has been so aptly illustrated, that nothing now can create a great surprise. Rumour is busy presaging impending changes in the situation of the Patriarchate and the Grand Rabbinate, and although nothing more concrete has happened than a recrudescence of litigation against the Patriarchate initiated by Papa Eftim, one has seen so many important changes prepared by just such little manœuvres de basse race that one is unwilling to dismiss these hints of possible developments as without significance. The question of the schools, too, is providing material for increasingly bad blood between the civil authorities and the various religious organisations. The authorities are obviously aiming at squeezing out of existence all except the purely lay State schools, and their tactics are to put the sectarian educational organisations in the wrong by subjecting them to petty oppression until their patience is exhausted and they commit technical illegalities, and at the same time to load them with a compulsory State-appointed staff for teaching Turkish and Turkish subjects which will hopelessly compromise their already shaky finances. Needless to say, the scheme will succeed, for the schools are completely defenceless. One or two big Greek schools in Constantinople have already been closed as the result of their alleged unpatriotic attitude during the Armistice period, and certain Catholic schools in Smyrna and elsewhere have been closed for not having complied with the order to remove all traces of religious symbols and images from the class-rooms. The regulations do not appear to be unduly onerous or unreasonable on paper, but in the present state of political feeling it is hopeless to expect a sensible give-and-take policy in their application—a policy which alone could make the reforms workable until the Turks recover their equilibrium and both sides thicken their skins and get back to the traditional attitude of mutual toleration.

Full-Speed at Angora.

The proceedings of the Assembly have been confined to more domestic issues than the far-reaching matters it has recently been treating. There are, however, points of interest in these discussions if one could only be sure that the public debates represented something more than a comedy staged in the private meetings of the People's Party for the amusement of the Press and public until the caucus is ready to spring upon an astonished world some new revolutionary proposal which will be rushed through after a show of hands in a single sitting. The Chamber has now got back again to the discussion of the Organic Statute, and the proposal to set up a kind of second chamber and to grant the President of the Republic the right of veto has been the subject of hot debate. The experience of the past few months has demonstrated the absolute necessity of having some machinery to curb the ardour of the "elective" oligarchy in Angora, which has made itself notorious throughout the world for hasty and ill-considered legislation; they will, however, have none of it, and the usual 140 autocrats howled and voted out the motion to legalise the modest machinery for putting on the brake.

Government and the Ottoman Bank.

The necessity of curbing the more outré and turbulent spirits among the supporters of the Government is shown by the official efforts at reassuring public opinion on the subject of the Public Debt, against which a furious Press campaign is being waged. The Government is bound to find a terrain d'accord with the foreign financial interests, and the agreement which has just been concluded with the Ottoman Bank and ratified by the Cabinet shows that in order to keep itself provided with ready cash, the Government is prepared to make a reasonable deal which must be fairly acceptable and profitable to the Bank also. By this agreement the Bank's concession is extended until March 1, 1935: the Bank opens a credit in favour of the Government of five millions, and in favour of the Banque Agricole of two millions, which bear a rate of interest between 5 and 7 per cent.; provision is made for a gradual incorporation of Moslem employees until they form 50 per cent. of the total staff, and the Bank engages to send at least ten Moslem employees yearly abroad for training in its foreign branches; the Government secures a certain degree of control over the appointments to the board of directors and the managerial staff. These are the principal points in the agreement, and to the outsider they do not appear to be unduly one-sided; in particular, the arrangements made for the progressive training of a competent Moslem staff appear excellent.

The agreement has not, however, escaped a hostile criticism on the part of some of the Constantinople papers, and the Tevhid makes itself responsible for the fatuous remark that the extension of the concession for eleven years has retarded for that period the successful development of the Turkish finances. It is in this same spirit that the backwoodsmen in Angora and Constantinople are clamouring for the suppression of the Public Debt. Zekiai Bey, the Government's Commissary at the Public Debt, was interrogated, on his return from Angora the other day, concerning the various Press prognostications of the horrid fate of the Debt. As the cautious servant of a needy Government, he was careful to appear to deny knowledge of any immediate violent changes, except a reduction of the Budget for the Administration of the Debt to eight hundred thousand pounds Turkish. Nevertheless, there are degrees of "suppression," and it would not surprise one to see attempts made to modify the "Debt" out of all recognition. The only voice which is raised in defence of the institution is that of Hussein Jahid Bey, and he ought to know, for he has been representative of the Turkish bondholders on the Council of Administration. In a leading article in the Tanin a few days ago he strongly inveighed against the campaign for the so-called suppression of the Debt Administration, which he stigmatised as stupid and particularly ill-timed, in view of the necessity of inspiring the foreign money market with some confidence in Turkey's financial stability and honour, and he made the only practical and concrete suggestion for lightening the weight of the administration which has been seen in the native Press, namely, the rearrangement of the revenues affected to the service of the Debt, in order that their collection may be simpler and more concentrated. Thus could the organisation of the Debt Administration be rendered less complex, and hence smaller and cheaper. Given proper guarantees and a spirit of conciliation on both sides, there seems to be no reason why a modification of the Decree of Mouharrem on such lines could not be hammered out at a round-table conference, but if Angora imagines that by presenting Europe with faits accomplis of the sort indulged in by the Municipality of Constantinople in dealing with its financial obligations, Angora had better take warning in good time and walk warily. While filling columns of print with complaints that the new

Turkey is misunderstood by European politicians who cannot understand that the old Ottoman Empire—the happy hunting-ground of unscrupulous concessionaires—is gone for ever, the Turkish politician and journalist should not forget that the old Europe, in which the Powers were ready to outbid one another pour les beaux yeux du Padichah, and lend him vast sums on what now appears to be very doubtful security, is also gone for ever; nowadays Turkey is not sufficiently important to be worth paying court to, and if Turkey wants money and help of any kind, she will have to do what all other small and poor States are forced to do—that is, come and ask for it, and not expect it to be poured into her lap. There is little sentimentality in the post-War world and none in the post-War money market.

BESSARABIA AND RUSSIA.

(From a Correspondent.)

It seems more than probable that the question of Bessarabia will be brought up at the Russo-Roumanian Conference which is to be held at Vienna towards the end of this month, for although M. Duca, Roumanian Minister of Foreign Affairs, denies the very existence of such a question, the Soviet Government has declared upon more than one occasion that Russia has not, and can never, come to admit Bessarabia as a province of Greater Roumania. Should this subject be seriously approached at the Conference—and it would be blind optimism to hope that Russia will silently renounce her claim—there is no knowing where it may lead to.

The Soviet Government holds that in view of the fact that Bessarabia, a Russian province, was occupied by the troops of a nation with which Russia was not at war, and at a moment when Russia was unable to defend her own, it is impossible for the Soviet to consider Bessarabia as anything but invaded and stolen. At first sight this argument does appear to be both logical and final; yet it is curious how a glance into the last century shows Roumania, with regard to Bessarabia, as holding not only a similar, but an identical grievance against Russia, and a claim in every way superior and older than hers.

If we trace history no farther back than the year 1877, when the Russians and the Roumanians joined forces and finally beat the Turks, we find that Russia rewarded Roumania for her share in the victory by snatching away from her approximately one-half of the Northern Principality of Moldavia, namely, Bessarabia, and meeting her former ally's entreaties with threats. It is surely no argument for Russia to remind us that prior to this, during the first half of the nineteenth century, the greater part of Roumania was overflooded four or five times by Russian troops on their various campaigns against the Turks, and, although it is true that Bessarabia was formally ceded to the Russians by the Turks in 1812, if this can be considered as constituting any sort of a claim, their forced withdrawal in 1854 must be taken as putting an end to that claim. Seven years later, on December 23, 1861, the Porte admitted the union of the principalities Wallachia and Moldavia, including Bessarabia, and, as Cuza, the first ruling Prince, then declared, that date may justly be considered as marking the foundation of the Roumanian nation.

It will be seen that the Russians put forward no claim for Bessarabia at this time, and not until 1877, i.e., sixteen years later, did they despoil their ally in the manner described. If now, therefore, the Soviet declares that Bessarabia has been occupied by the troops of a nation with which Russia was not at war, and at a time when Russia was unable to defend her own, Roumania may well repeat these words in changing about the names of the two countries, and may add that up to 1812, when it was ceded Russia by the Turks for a period of forty-two years, the province of Bessarabia formed an integral part of Moldavia and never of Russia.

Now, in a consideration of more recent times, it must be remembered that Bessarabia has never been under the authority of the Soviet Government, either directly or indirectly.

As early as November 25, 1917, immediately after the proclamation of the Bolshevist rule, Bessarabia declared itself an "Independent Moldavian Republic," which Republic was recognised by the Ukranian Government on January 22, 1918. In the treaty of Brest-Litovsk of March 3, 1918, signed by the Central Powers on the one hand and the Soviet and Ukranian Governments on the other, and in which the frontier between the Soviet Republic and Ukrania was fixed, the "Independent Moldavian Republic" was not included either within the one or the other, but recognised as a separate Republic.

The Independent Moldavian Republic once formed, a legislative body under the title of Sfatul-Tarii was elected and instated at Chisinau. At this time the Russian troops from Bukovina had deserted the trenches, and were returning home, despoiling everything on their way. In Moldavia the Roumanian Army kept them more or less to the main roads and attended to their speedy despatch over the frontier. In Bessarabia, however, the new Republic had no means of defending itself against the demoralised masses that flooded into the country, and soon the conditions became chaotic. Thousands of hungry, undisciplined Russians daily flocked over from Roumania, robbing and burning and ravaging all that fell within their reach. Help had to be found in order to save the Republic, and on December 8, 1917, the Sfatul-Tarii decided to send a delegation to Jassy, and request the aid of Roumanian troops to restore order. In view of the highly critical situation at home the Roumanian Government decided that it had not the troops to spare, and declared itself unable to accord the military assistance required. The result of this was that soon the whole of Bessarabia was flooded, and the Sfatul-Tarii driven from its capital, while some of its members were taken prisoner by the invaders and others put to death. In utter desperation, on January 5, 1918, the Sfatul once more appealed to Roumania for military assistance, and this time the Roumanian Government decided to send a division in Bessarabia to restore order. Two and a-half months later, on March 27, 1918, the Sfatul declared the Independent Moldavian Republic as being formally united with Moldavia across the river Pruth, and as making part once more of the Mother Country Roumania.

It is not unnatural that the Moldavians east of the Pruth should wish to reunite with their brothers of Moldavia west of the Pruth, with whom they have been one for hundreds of years, and when we recognise that in Bessarabia there are six Roumanians to every Russian, we cannot be surprised that the Sfatul acted in the way it did.

That Russia will make a claim for Bessarabia is certain, yet her claim will be unjust, and though it seems probable that Bessarabia will be used as a pawn in the game which Russia is playing in order to retain for herself the Roumanian treasure deposited with her for safe keeping in 1916, yet this attitude upon the part of Russia is equally unjust, and unworthy of the great nation she is.

THE TRIALS OF PERSIA.

Nowhere more than in the East at the present time—the East which until the forces set free by the Great War attacked it was universally spoken of as "unchanging"—is the theory, for so long held by students of Western political institutions, that all fundamental changes in the polity of a people come slowly and are the product of centuries' leavening, being belied. Especially in the Middle East is this ferment of ideas to be seen. It is the result partly, perhaps, of religious or of irreligious conceptions, partly of political convictions, but most of all of a profound psychological change. Now the leading psychologist of the Middle Eastern States is Turkey, who ever since the Armistice has been the cynosure of both neighbouring (except for the Arabs of Arabia) and distant Sunni and Shiah eyes. In her struggle against Greece and the West she was looked upon with eager admiration, and since 1922 also the changes in her political constitution have been the subject both of respect and of envy in many Moslems. In Persia, particularly, has the genius of Mustapha Kemal been appreciated and lauded, and it is largely because Persia, more than any other Eastern State, found herself, just as Turkey found herself, in need of a strong man capable of carrying through a programme which should upset the decadent modes of past centuries, that Teheran is now looking to Angora and endeavouring to fashion itself in the image of the Anatolian town. This tendency in Persia towards a Republic has developed and gained impetus very quickly, for it is only during the present year that rumours have met with wide currency that the Sardar Sipah wished to become a Mustapha Kemal. That the Persian Premier, Riza Khan, is both a strong and a worthy patriot is obvious to anyone who has watched him rise from a mere colonelcy of infantry to his present position; and it does not consort ill with what one imagines to be his character that he should now be reported to be seeking to establish a Persian Republic. Admittedly, he himself but a short time ago denied that he had any personal ambitions to become a President, but he knows, none better, how useless in every practical sense the Kajar Dynasty has become to Persia, and it is more than probable that, in true Oriental fashion, he is half leading and half being led by the present agitation for a Republic.

But one should be chary of carrying the parallel between Turkey and Persia too far. The will in Anatolia to security, stability, and peace was almost universal—or else the Turk's admiration for the Ghazi knew no bounds—for those profound changes which are now the astonishment of the world the Angora Assembly has been able to effect without, apparently, any considerable challenge. In Persia, on the other hand, there is little evidence that the desire to trust the governing of the country completely to Riza Khan is overwhelming; one has rather to remark the sharpness and promptness of the opposition, which has already been manifested in or outside the Mejliss. Whether the Sardar Sipah, who seems to have the Army behind him, has definitely accepted the compromise of the Shah's deposition remains to be seen. It is very significant that the thousands of angry people who last week marched to the Mejliss to protest against the establishment of a Republic were headed by ecclesiastics. For the Shiah of Persia is a very different being from the Sunni of Anatolia. He is fanatical, tenacious, and uncompromising; he knows to a nicety how to play on the easily aroused sentiments of the common folks; and, although since the War he has become deeply imbued with Nationalist ideas, he is not a progressive, but chooses rather to take up his stand on the old and effete conceptions of privilege. One has but to remember the experiences of the Irak Administration with Nejef and Kerbela and the trouble that the Sheikh el-Khalisi caused in Persia to the British to realise how intensely the Shiahs of this region feel and express themselves. How far the maintenance of ecclesiastical privilege in Persia is bound up with the retention of the monarchical system it is difficult to say, but from the attitude of the Ecclesiastical Party it is permissible to conclude either that the majority of Persians—pliable material, in presumable accordance with the ecclesiastics' views—are against a Republic, or that the real cause of this opposition lies in fear on the part of the ulemas that the Sardar Sipah is heading an agnostic movement similar to the one which is uprooting old ecclesiastical conditions in Turkey. Certainly the Ecclesiastical Party must have known at least for two or three months of the Republicans' intentions, and one is inclined to believe that, in view of the lateness and undisguised haste of the manifestation of their opposition, it was rather to anxiety lest the religious system obtaining in Persia should be overthrown than to dislike of a mere political Republic that their blocking methods should be ascribed.

The situation at the moment of writing is obscure: already too many premature and inaccurate guesses on the proclamation of a Republic at Teheran have been made. The fact—we, at any rate, believe it to be a fact—that the majority of Persians would, were the question to come to a vote, be against a Republic is by no means the deciding factor in the problem, for in the East one strong man of genius with an army can carry a programme in the teeth of opposition. If it does eventually come to a clash between Riza Khan's army and the ecclesiastics, who for years have battened on Persia's lack of prosperity, there is little doubt of the result. Riza Khan is indeed the hero of modern Persia; certainly it is to him alone that all outside observers, genuinely anxious to see Persia standing on her own feet, are looking. As readers who have followed our informing Teheran Correspondent's letters will have noted, he has quelled the disturbances of unruly tribes, he has collected taxes, he has even hopes of making his Budget balance. If, then, he decides that the preservation of national dignity and efficiency are not compatible with the conservation of the Monarchy, his opinion should be weighed very carefully before it is rejected on the all-damning ground that a Republic is at all times and in every place unsuitable to the peoples of the East. Persia is rich in material resources, but pitiably poor in actual wealth, and the maintenance of the Kajar Dynasty appears sadly to sag down her national finances. She has tasted bitterly of the assumed superiority of the West, but has also seen clearly the superiority of certain Western political methods. What is more natural, in consideration of the inertia and insignificance of the nominal rulers of Persia, that the country should turn, or be turned, to the belief that the days of the wasteful, empty past are going, and that the visible symptoms of that idleness are to go with them? Even were the present Republican move to fail, it is hard to imagine that Persia, unless she has one of her periodical lapses into impotent indifference, will continue long to endure her present political system.

KHALIFATE AND PROTECTORATE IN MOROCCO.

By SIR VALENTINE CHIROL.

It is a far cry from Angora to Fez, but I spent this winter in Morocco, and it may be not without interest to indicate some of the effects which the recent action of the Republican Government of Turkey must produce in a conservative country where Islamic culture reached its apogee when the Moors ruled in Spain long before the Turks fought their way into Western Asia and South-Eastern Europe from their savage Central Asian homelands and substituted Islam for their primitive pagan war cries. At the moment, when the Turkish Khalifate has been abolished by the men of Angora, the situation in Morocco derives special interest from the fact that the Moors have, and always have had, in their Sultan a Khalif of their own, and have never admitted the claim of the Ottoman Sultans—rarely, it must be remembered, pressed until relatively recent times—to be regarded as the supreme Khalif over the whole world of Islam, or, at any rate, of Sunni Islam. In the tumultuous agitation carried on for the last few years in support of the Turkish Khalifate amongst our Indian Mohammedans, its leaders out there and its supporters in this country have chosen to suppress or to ignore this inconvenient fact, though the Moors are as good Sunnis as the Turks or as their Indian friends. It was a wise precaution, doubtless, in India, where political hatred of British power played a greater part than any religious fervour in exalting the horn of Turkey and denouncing the British Empire as her chief enemy. For instance, at the last Khalifate conference in Southern India, Shaukat Ali, who presided, declared once more that you might "ask any Musulman in any part of the globe who is the greatest enemy of Islam, and you will only get one reply, Great Britain, the English nation." Of one thing I am certain: that it is not the reply that would be made by the Mohammedans of Morocco, or even by the most uncompromising divines of the great Sunni University of Fez.

In this respect especially recent happenings in Turkey have once more confirmed the wisdom of Marshal Lyautey's far-sighted statesmanship in Morocco. No looser terms than the word "Protectorate" has ever been invented by Western diplomacy to cloak the assumption by European Powers of political ascendancy over an eastern country, and in most cases, as, for instance, when we proclaimed a British Protectorate in Egypt, little disposition is shown to define its meaning. Marshal Lyautey was less reticent after the proclamation of the French Protectorate in Morocco. He formulated his conception of it as "a system under which the country preserves its own institutions and governs and administers itself through its own organs under the mere control of a European Power, who, having taken charge of its foreign relations, assumes the general direction of its military forces and finances and economic development." Into the application of that system in its administrative aspects I do not propose to enter here, and shall merely say that it bears out faithfully on the whole the principles laid down by the Marshal. More pertinent to the question I am dealing with is the special solicitude displayed by Marshal Lyautey for the maintenance of the spiritual authority and prestige of the Sultan, Mulai Yusef, under and in spite of the new relations of dependence into which he had entered vis-à-vis a non-Mohammedan Power. For this purpose it was not enough for the French to show great personal deference to the Sultan, but it required them to convince his subjects that his spiritual authority remained inviolate, and that their religious beliefs and customs were certain to be treated with invariable consideration and sympathy. No attempt has been made to interfere in the least with the administration of Mohammedan law by the Kadis in suits governed by it between the Sultan's Mohammedan subjects. The Pasha of Rabat, where the French controlling power has its headquarters and Marshal Lyautey resides, still administers justice in the native city. In all the chief towns of Morocco the new French quarters, official and residential, have been laid out as far as possible outside the old walls so as to avoid occasions of friction between old and modern ways of life. Facilities are given for the public celebration of all Mohammedan festivals in accordance with ancient customs. Access to the mosques is forbidden to all non-Mohammedans, whilst large sums of money have been devoted under the skilful direction of the French Beaux Arts to the restoration of many noble monuments and the revival of many ancient arts and crafts which had fallen into lamentable decay and oblivion. In the reforms which the French were bound to introduce for the benefit of the native population itself, and especially in such matters as education, sanitation, and municipal administration, Marshal Lyautey has spared no pains to consult the views of the Moors themselves so as to carry as far as possible Moorish opinion with him. The municipality of Fez is composed entirely of Moors, with the single exception of one French member who acts as liaison between his colleagues and the French authorities. To appreciate the results one has only to compare the extraordinary cleanliness of the streets of Fez with the filthy conditions which still prevail at Mulai Idris, the picturesque little city in the Zerhoun hills, to which the shrine of its patron saint has lent such incredible sanctity that it has been deemed wiser to leave it for the present altogether untouched to its own malodorous ways. There is perhaps no reason to be surprised at the confidence which the admirable French hospitals have already gained for themselves, for medical missionaries, many of them British, had already known how to disarm to some extent Mohammedan prejudice against this branch of western science. More remarkable is the popularity of the admirable crêches over which Madame Lyautey presides, though it is mostly the fathers who still carry their babies there, in order to avoid letting their womenfolk come into contact with other mothers whose acquaintance is not desired. It is by reassuring the Moors as to the safety of their religion and their ancient customs that the French have not only created a genuine reaction in favour of the Protectorate, but have also strengthened the position of the Sultan as Khalif, since he is himself given a large measure of credit for everything that the French do in that direction, whilst in his personal life he sets his subjects such an example of strict observance of the best Mohammedan rules of conduct as few of his predecessors have ever done.

Not only has Morocco never recognised either the spiritual or the temporal supremacy of Constantinople, but it is geographically too far removed from Turkey to have been ever seriously affected by what happened at the other end of the Mediterranean. As Mohammedans, the Moors were bound, no doubt, to sympathise with their Turkish brothers in the faith during the war between Turkey and Greece, and Mustapha Kemal's portrait sometimes occupied a place of honour in Moorish houses as the victorious wielder of the sword of Islam. But the popularity which he may have enjoyed for a time on those grounds can merely help to emphasise now the disrepute into which he has fallen by laying violent hands upon an institution of which the Moors, though never acknowledging its authority in their own country, recognised the sacred character in the eyes of millions of their co-religionists. Having never accepted the doctrine of a universal Khalifate, they were never seriously perturbed over the fate of the Turkish Khalif as such, nor are they likely to see in the chaos into which the men of Angora have plunged that part of the Sunni communion that did recognise the Turkish Khalif an opportunity for seeking to extend the spiritual authority of their own Khalif beyond the boundaries of his realm. But inasmuch as the office is entitled to the reverence of all good Mohammedans, they cannot fail to contrast the sacrilegious treatment to which it has been subjected at Angora with the enlightened and unfailing consideration which it has received under the French Protectorate in their own country.

EGYPT AND THE SUDAN.

At the Carlton Hotel, on March 7, an address by M. Felix Valyi on "The Problem of Egypt" was read to the Near and Middle East Association. Lord Lamington presided, and among those present, excluding those who joined in the discussion, were:—Baron Gonsuke Hayashi, Youssouf Kemal Bey, Shevky Pasha, Mehmed Bey Konitza, Mahmoud Sabit Bey (representing the Egyptian Minister) and Madame Sabit Bey, the Councillor Argnan Legation (representing Abdul Hadi Khan), the Viscountess Dupplin, Sir John and Lady Miller, Sir William Clark, Lady Downer, Abdullah Izzet, Lord Headley, Kwaja Nazir Ahmad, Imam of the Mosque, Woking, Miss Edith Durham, Major J. C. Thomson, Mrs. Margaret Hasluck, Colonel Richard Steel, Admiral Sir Edmund Fremantle, and Captain E. H. Griffin, hon. secretary.

The lecture was written from the human and psychological standpoint of the Egyptian problem. The strategic aspect was not, M. Valyi contended, the most important aspect of Egypt, where a people of fourteen million were anxious to be transformed into a modern nation. He thought the British Commonwealth would have to invent new methods of statesmanship. Prior to the British occupation of Egypt, he said, the Egyptians had made wonderful strides towards self-government. In spite, however, of the checking by Britain of Egypt's constitutional evolution, the demands of the present Egyptian Premier and of his associates were moderate, and the desire for friendship with England was sincere. Passing to the Suez Canal and the Sudan, M. Valyi said that the presence of a British Army on Egyptian soil complicated the legal solution of all vital questions.

In the subsequent discussion Sir Murdoch Macdonald emphasised that the point of view of the Sudanese must be taken into consideration. His advice to Egypt was to develop every acre of her land, and there was no reason why a satisfactory arrangement regarding water supply should not be come to between England, Egypt, and the Sudan. Dr. J. F. Crowley (Consulting Engineer of the Irish Free State Government) stressed the need of a cheap power supply in Egypt. Mr. J. M. W. Jeffries thought that a settlement of the Egyptian problem ought to be made on purely business lines.

The submarine K 26, which is carrying out an experimental cruise—believed to be the longest yet undertaken by British underwater vessels—left Malta on March 20 for Port Said. It is understood that the K 26 was fitted at Malta for a Red Sea cruise.

The Bengal Khilafat Conference has passed a resolution regretting King Hussein's assumption of the Khilafat, and declaring that Indian Moslems are not prepared to accept an action taken by a particular group or country without consultation of the Mussulmans throughout the whole world.

NOTES AND NEWS.

Greek Tobacco.

In an article in another column a well-informed correspondent deals with the curious position that has arisen with regard to the Greek tobacco crop. Tobacco has recently been a generous source of revenue to Greece, but there seems some prospect that the markets to which the Greek farmers have hitherto looked to take the crop may be practically lost to them—at any rate, for a time—as a result of the unwise policy adopted by the Greek authorities, who have evidently looked upon tobacco as a commodity which will bear any amount of taxation, forgetting that there is a point at which taxation reduces consumption, and that this applies to crops just as much as it does to retail commodities. Greece's loss (if so it prove) seems likely to prove the gain of another Balkan country, Bulgaria, whose crop now exceeds 100,000,000 lbs., and, if so, it will help considerably in the re-establishment of that country's economic position. But there is an "if" in the business. It is not easy to change the habits of smokers, who are a most conservative race, and it is possible that an altered flavour resulting from an admixture of Bulgarian tobacco may fail to appeal.

The Bondholders' Report.

The report of the Council of Foreign Bondholders for 1923 which has just been issued deals at length with the situation with regard to Turkey. It is pointed out that the position of the holders of Turkish bonds has been rendered still more difficult by the substitution of the Treaty of Lausanne for the Treaty of Sèvres. In the meantime the bondholders have been deprived of the greater part of the revenues ceded to them, while the Turkish authorities have seized the Galata Bridge tolls, which are pledged to the bondholders. A satisfactory feature is the resumption by Serbia of the payment of the current interest on the Montenegro external loan. There is a review of the developments leading up to the recent negotiations regarding the series of Bulgarian loans, but the agreement arrived at happened too late for reference in the report.

The Yugoslav Market.

Elsewhere in this issue will be found two articles describing the railways and the general economic position in Yugoslavia. Nowhere is sympathy stronger for the new States of Europe than in Great Britain, and it is satisfactory to know that the initial difficulties with which Yugoslavia has been faced are in process of being overcome. Yugoslavia is one of the markets in South-Eastern Europe to which British traders will be looking in the future, and the indications certainly suggest that there is ample scope for the extension of commerce in that direction. As in other parts of the Balkans, trade conditions in Yugoslavia are still in a state of flux, and the permanent trade routes are still uncertain, though, given the provision of adequate railway communication, there is no doubt at all that the Adriatic will have the preference over the Ægean, and the marked increase in the number of British ships that now make calls in the Adriatic should be an important consideration in determining the flow of commerce.

Chartered Bank of India.

The reports of the Eastern banks, which have now been issued, make an excellent showing in view of the fact that the past year saw the continuance of the trade depression. The net profits of the Chartered Bank of India are only slightly below those of the previous year, the figures being £782,707, as compared with £789,532. On the other hand, £222,201 was brought forward, as against £215,169, so that the disposable surplus is about the same as before. It is proposed to maintain the dividend and bonus at 20½ per cent. free of income-tax, to place £100,000 to the reserve, £25,000 to the officers' fund, and £50,000 to the premises account, and to carry forward £222,408.

National Bank of India.

There is only a very slight difference in the net profits of the National Bank of India, the figures being £534,798, as against £535,160. The amount brought forward was £159,255, as compared with £164,095. the available total being £694,054, as against £699,255. It is proposed to maintain the dividend at 20 per cent. free of income-tax, to place £50,000 to the reserve fund, to write £20,000 off house property account, and to add £25,000 to the pension fund, leaving £199,054 to be carried forward.

Mercantile Bank of India.

There was a slight contraction in the net profits of the Mercantile Bank of India at £258,707, as compared with £267,434, but the amount brought forward was considerably larger at £152,105, as against £137,673. A final dividend of 8 per cent. is proposed on the three classes of shares, making the distribution 16 per cent., as before, and the appropriations are £50,000 to the reserve, £20,000 to premises, and £15,000 to the pension fund, leaving £157,812 to be carried forward.

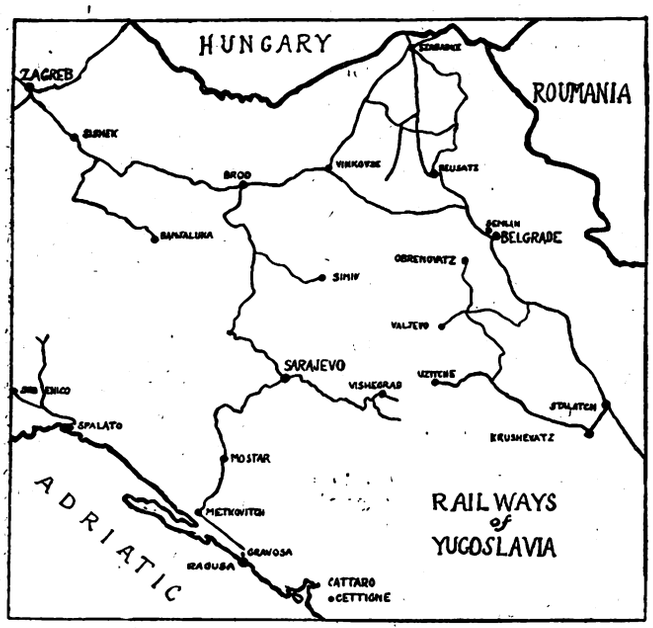
YUGOSLAV SECTION.

RAILWAYS IN YUGOSLAVIA.

Yugoslavia is a country of great natural resources, able to produce most things, from tropical fruits to Siberian furs. Her pressing need to enable her to make the most of her capacity to be self-supporting is an extension and improvement of her railway system. At the present moment there are four kilometres of railway lines to every hundred square kilometres of territory, but the distribution of the railways ranges from 10.5 kilometres per 100 square kilometres in the province of Voivodina to 0.2 kilometres in Montenegro, the figures for the other provinces being Croatia 6 km., Slovenia



5.7 km., Serbia (including Macedonia) 2.4 km., Bosnia-Herzegovina 2 km., and Dalmatia 1 km. per 100 square kilometres. The disparity is accounted for by the fact that the former provinces of the Austro-Hungarian Empire were for the most part better provided for than Serbia, the exceptions being Bosnia-Herzegovina, annexed in 1908, and mountain-bound Dalmatia. A further difficulty in regard to the railway system of the new kingdom is that it has been built up on the principle of providing the minimum facilities for communication between the different units of the Yugoslav State. Accordingly, the problem confronting the Yugoslav Government is so to improve the existing network of railways at a reasonable outlay as to make it correspond more with the actual economic requirements of the country.

Yugoslavia possesses some hundreds of miles of sea-coast, but there was only one point—Ragusa, i.e., Gravosa (Gruz)—on the coast having railway communication with the interior, and that by means of a narrow-gauge line. The need for direct connection between Serbia of pre-War days and the Adriatic was well recognised, and gave rise to schemes for an Adriatic railway. The construction of such a line, although an economic necessity for the development of the countries to be served by it, was opposed for political reasons by Austria-Hungary, who was resolved at all costs to prevent or hinder the economic emancipation of Serbia. The idea of an Adriatic railway never lapsed, but as a result of the wars that have absorbed the attention of the Balkans since 1912, concrete schemes had to be postponed. As soon as possible after the Armistice, however, public attention was again directed to the question of a Yugoslav port on the Adriatic connected by rail with the interior. In view of the magnitude of the undertaking, owing to engineering difficulties, it was recognised that a large loan would be required, and after negotiations in various quarters, a loan for a hundred million dollars was concluded with an American group. The proposal was that the loan should be used for the construction of a railway connecting Belgrade with the Adriatic. The loan, however, was not a success. A certain sum was advanced by the Blair group, but hostility to the project in America has prevented the scheme from going through. Work was actually started on a line intended to go from Belgrade to Cattaro, but owing to the lack of funds, has been interrupted. In any case, the construction of the line would take several years. Plans were accordingly drawn up for the immediate improvement of existing lines, in particular of the narrow-gauge railways, of which there were nearly 3,000 kilometres. Certain stretches were to be converted from narrow to normal gauge, and gaps in the railway system linked up with new lines. An important consideration in this programme was that it could be carried through without loans, the expenditure being met from the ordinary revenue of the State.

Prominent among the new lines in course of construction is the one that will provide intercommunication between Bosnia and Serbia. The Bosnian railway system centring in Serajevo has a branch running eastwards terminating at two points on the Serbian frontier, the northern prong of the fork at Vordishte via Vishegrad, the southern near Uvatz. On the Serbian side the railway branching from the main line between Belgrade and Nish at Stalatz, which passed through Krushevatz and Shashak, ended at Uzitche. Work is now being pressed on to connect this town with Vishegrad, and it is hoped that the new line will be completed by September of this year. Although the distance between the two places is not great, the construction of the connecting line presents considerable difficulties. The hilly nature of the country may be inferred from the fact that in the sixty miles there are no less than ninety tunnels, in addition to many viaducts and bridges.

Sea-Borne Traffic.

The completion of the Vardishte-Uzitche link will act as a stimulus to oversea traffic with the Dalmatian ports of Ragusa (Gravosa), and ultimately Spalato. The latter, the old Roman and Venetian port, aims at becoming the chief centre of Yugoslavia's maritime commerce, but has yet to have railway connection with the main Yugoslav system. Ragusa will now benefit by direct access without change of gauge to Serbia, and will offer the shortest route to Belgrade for sea-borne goods. The new line passes through notable timber regions, which, given adequate facilities of transport, may hope to satisfy the demand of the Levant for wood. It passes also through great plum-producing districts in which Yugoslavia is so particularly rich. Hitherto traffic between Serbia and Bosnia had to be conveyed by way of Brod on the Zagreb-Belgrade railway, and at Brod was subject to the transfer from normal gauge to narrow gauge rolling-stock. The considerable shortening of the railway route to the sea for important Serbian products must cheapen the cost of these goods to foreign markets.

Yugoslavia, it has to be remembered, is rapidly becoming a valuable market for British goods. Whereas in 1913 only one British vessel called at Gravosa (Gruz), last year there were seventy-seven. Some 5,000 tons of goods for which British ships or agents were responsible pass weekly through Gravosa, and it is confidently anticipated that with the completion of the new line (Vishegrad-Uzitche) this amount will before long be doubled.

It will thus be seen that the Yugoslav Government has done well in pushing on the work of developing existing lines and removing gaps in its railway system without waiting for a big loan to enable it to undertake more ambitious schemes. Much still remains to be done. Elsewhere than between Vishegrad and Uzitche the work can only be accomplished piecemeal as funds permit. To enable the railways of Yugoslavia to meet the needs of the country a loan will be necessary; but nothing is better calculated to inspire confidence among foreign financial interests, to whom recourse for such a loan may ultimately have to be had, than the obvious resolve of Yugoslavia to use its existing resources for the purpose of doing what it can in the matter unaided.

YUGOSLAVIA'S ECONOMIC POSITION.

A Growing Market.

Not so much prominence has been given to developments in Yugoslavia since the War as to those in Roumania or Bulgaria, for instance. Probably this is one reason for the comparative neglect of that country by the British trader. As a matter of fact, fairly satisfactory progress has been made in the direction of reconstruction, though it would be futile to suggest that much more could not have been accomplished if the right methods had been pursued from the commencement. But it is easy to be wise after the event, and if the Yugoslav authorities have made mistakes in the past, the same holds good of every Balkan country since 1918. If, moreover, the dinar still stands at an unsatisfactory level, it has to be remembered that Yugoslavia is not so favoured in respect of natural resources as to make recovery so easy as in the case of other countries that could be instanced. Greece has her shipping industry and tobacco and currants as two great staple crops, while Roumania has enormous oil resources, and is potentially the granary of South-Eastern Europe. Yet the drachma is not much better than the dinar, while the leu is much worse. Of course, in both these cases special factors have operated, and a comparison would be both unfair and misleading. They are referred to merely to show that Yugoslavia's position, as indicated by the level of the dinar, is far from unpromising. The wide margin that separates the exchange from the pre-War parity will not lightly be overcome, and it is perhaps unwise to lay stress on what is regarded as the normal rate of exchange, for it is by no means certain that the pre-War parities will ever be re-established. Be that as it may, there is no valid reason why the next year or so should not witness a substantial appreciation in the exchange. Very many factors influence exchange—confidence abroad or the lack of it, internal developments of an adverse character or the reverse, but there is one factor that operates unceasingly, and that the most important of all, the financial position, and the policy that is being pursued by the Yugoslav authorities in this respect is such as to justify considerable confidence in the outlook.

It has been pointed out above that Yugoslavia lacks some of the outstanding advantages of other Balkan countries. But her economic resources are nevertheless very considerable. She has extensive mineral resources, valuable forest areas, while her agricultural industry promises to be a constantly increasing source of wealth. Industry is on a rather restricted scale, as is inevitable in the case of a country which, by its situation, must look mainly to agriculture. But here, too, there are considerable possibilities for development. Interesting details on these and other aspects of Yugoslavia are given by M. Nedelkovitch in his able brochure* on the present conditions in the country, some extracts from which, dealing mainly with agriculture, were given in a recent issue of The Near East. He points out that the forest area of Yugoslavia amounts to 30.3 per cent. of the total area of the country, and of the forest land 43 per cent. is owned by the State. The value of the exports of timber and by-products last year was 920 million dinars. Vast forests presuppose an abundance of game of many kinds, and the annual "bag" killed in Yugoslavia is very large, and, of course, plays a considerable part in the list of exports. For 1923 the export of furs was estimated to total in value sixty million dinars—not a bad contribution to the export list. The minerals existing in Yugoslavia have been described at length in these columns, and it must, therefore, suffice to state here that the more important of them include copper, iron, and coal. The mineral wealth of the country is still very largely a matter of uncertainty, and it is very probable that research will prove the existence of very important deposits that are as yet unknown.

From 1919 to 1922 inclusive Yugoslavia had a series of adverse trade balances. They gradually decreased from 2,296 million dinars in 1919 to 1,661 million dinars in 1921, but for 1922 the figure was 3,370 million dinars. M. Nedelkovitch points out, however, that the figures for the last year are not exact, as the imports included German deliveries under Reparations, and he adds: "In reality, the trade balance was already in 1922 tending towards equilibrium." For 1923 the approximate figures are 5,000 million dinars for imports and 8,000 million dinars for exports, giving a very substantial favourable trade balance. Needless to say, the continuance of this state of things is bound to exercise a marked influence on economic conditions in the country, and will inevitably tend to widen the demand for imports.

Statistics of the countries from which Yugoslavia has been drawing her imports are not satisfactory from the British point of view. There are, unfortunately, three obstacles which have stood in the way of the extension of British commerce. First, there must naturally be a tendency for a country in Yugoslavia's position to draw the bulk of her imports from neighbouring countries if these happen to be manufacturing regions, and this is, of course, the case, Czecho-Slovakia, to give only one instance, being within easy access; secondly, there is the exchange problem, which has naturally tended to deflect the current of trade to the benefit of countries with depreciated currencies; and, thirdly, there is the unwillingness of traders to enter Near Eastern markets, the cause of which before the War was that so many other markets were available in which trade was to be had almost for the asking. Happily, this attitude has not been universal, and many examples will at once occur of famous British firms who have kept the trade flag flying in the Near East, but it has been sufficiently widespread seriously to affect our commercial relations with that region. The incidence of the first two factors mentioned has, of course, been considerable—in particular, the exchange—but the apathy of the British merchant is mainly responsible for the position.

Turning to the figures for 1923, Austria's share of the import trade amounted to 31.1 per cent., Czecho-Slovakia's to 19.8 per cent., and Italy's to 14.4 per cent. The percentage for Great Britain is relatively small, but, all the same, it is highly satisfactory to be able to state that a very fair trade was done in 1923. Indeed, the indications were that it was gradually on the increase. The fact is that for certain classes of commodities Yugoslavia must look to us, and there is no valid reason why the present trade should not be enlarged if only British commercial houses will see to it that the requirements of this market are adequately catered for. There are gratifying signs that at long last the traditional attitude to this and other Near Eastern markets is undergoing a change, as, indeed, it must if British trade is to develop to the requisite extent. It cannot, indeed, be too strongly emphasised that in the future, as a result of changes arising out of the war, this country cannot afford to neglect any markets, let alone any so promising as are to be found in the Near East. It is on the realisation of this fact and of the great scope for the expansion of British commerce in countries like Yugoslavia that the hope for the future lies. The prospects depend, in fact, on our traders, who, if this country is to take the position in the Near East markets that should be hers, must take a broader view than merely to visualise the immediate present. They must, in short, be prepared to pave the way for future expansion by carefully studying the markets so as to be able to reap the fullest advantage from the good times that are coming, when adverse exchanges will no longer present the obstacle that they do at present; and countries which are now compelled to restrict purchases to the narrowest limits will be able freely to satisfy their normal requirements.

The growth of Yugoslavia's export trade is symptomatic of the gradual and general improvement in conditions. In 1919 the exports amounted in value to 686 million dinars, for 1920 they had almost doubled at 1,321, for 1921 the figures were 2,461, and for 1922 3,072, while for 1923, as we have seen, they are put at 8,000 million dinars. Even when allowance is made for the depreciation of the dinar, the rate of progress is notable, and the author of the brochure already referred to states that the exports are still increasing "owing to better organisation, better transport, and the reduction of export duties." The destination of the exports is interesting. Italy and Austria were the principal importers of Yugoslav products in 1922, while Great Britain played a very small part in the trade. Last year there was some improvement in this respect owing to the development of the market here for prunes, but it scarcely needs emphasis that if we are to look to Yugoslavia in years to come as an increasing market for our manufactures, we must be prepared to take more of her products. It is only on that reciprocal basis that trade can be sound and enduring.

One of the fallacies that has to be explained away in regard to the Yugoslav market (it might be said, indeed, with regard to all the Near Eastern markets), is in relation to the extent of its scope. The belief has obtained ground that the needs of this market are very limited in character. As a matter of fact nothing could be more erroneous. The requirements of the Yugoslav market are certainly limited by the present state of the country's development and by the prevailing conditions, but they are in broad outline much the same as those of other countries. It is impossible to say of a region whose purchases include motors, agricultural implements, pharmaceutical products, oil, bicycles, earthenware, telephones, printers' colours, typewriters, books, glassware, optical instruments, tyres, safes, office furniture, and builders' accessories, to name only some of the many imports, that its demands are restricted in scope. Yet these are some of the requirements of Yugoslavia. The truth is, and it is absolutely essential that British merchants and manufacturers should realise it, that Yugoslavia to-day represents a great potential market for our goods. It rests with them whether this opportunity is to be utilised to the full or not. It must be emphasised that there is in that country no prejudice against British goods to be overcome. There, as everywhere else, it is perfectly realised that British goods stand for quality, and if the inhabitants are able they will take them. Naturally, the question of price is of considerable importance, and this factor has (as may be the case for some time) militated against our success. There is also the very obvious fact that our competitors have been allowed a very long start in the market, and they have made very good use of it. Fairs are held in Yugoslavia at frequent intervals—there will be one at Zagreb next month. Hitherto British goods have played a very small part in these exhibitions, while our principal rivals in the Near East, notably France and Czecho-Slovakia, have been very much to the fore, and it is indisputable that their whole-hearted participation in these events has been of very material advantage to them. These fairs provide one of the easiest and most obvious ways by which British firms can introduce their goods to this market. Is it too much to hope that in the future this shortcoming will be remedied?

A glance at a list of Yugoslavia's exports will suffice to show that there should be a possibility of expanding British imports from that country. The five principal heads among the exports are wheat, timber and timber products, livestock, maize, and wine. The other exports include eggs and poultry, cheese, skins, prunes, fresh fruits, minerals, olive oil, and silk cocoons. Not all of these commodities naturally could find a home in the British market, but there should be some scope for the increase of our purchases, and it must be emphasised that if the Yugoslav market is to continue to develop—that is, if its purchasing power is to increase, constantly wider outlets must be found for the country's produce. By helping to provide the additional demand, Great Britain will not only be furthering the economic development of the Balkans, but will also help to create an important market for British goods.

In this necessarily brief survey of Yugoslavia's economic position many aspects have perforce had to remain unmentioned, while it has naturally been impossible to do more than outline shortly some of the more outstanding facts on which an opinion with regard to the country's prospects can be based. But sufficient has been said to show the nature of the progress since the War and to indicate something, at any rate, of the prospects for the future. Yugoslavia has had its problems to solve since 1918—problems no less serious than those with which many other countries that suffered in the War have been confronted—one of the most difficult being the question of external communications—and the successful way in which the Yugoslav authorities have dealt with them is of the most favourable augury for the future. Given freedom henceforward from external preoccupations, there is no reason why the country should not continue rapidly to go forward on the path of progress or why that process should not be accompanied by the increasing development of Yugoslav-British relations.

MARKET FOR POULTRY EQUIPMENT IN TURKEY.

Many of the better-class farmers in Turkey and a few of the better educated poultry-growers use incubators (says an American Consular report). They are usually of home manufacture, however, and are generally crude imitations of American or other foreign machines. The average farmer in Anatolia has, as a rule, never seen or heard of an incubator. Brooders, as manufactured in the United States, are even less generally known than incubators. There are two British makes of incubators now in use in Turkey—the Phipps, for 70 to 110 eggs, and the Taylor, for 260 eggs—and an Australian make with a capacity of 60, 120, and 200 eggs.

Before the War Turkey is said to have produced annually 500,000,000 eggs. Both eggs and live poultry from Turkey have found markets abroad, and if Turkish producers could be shown that without an increase of expenditure the output for export would be materially increased by the use of incubators and brooders, a good market would be opened up for such articles. To accomplish this result demonstrations would be required at such centres as Adabazar, Eskishehr, Sivas, Bartin, and Samsun, and instructions given in the handling of the incubators and in the various details connected with the handling of poultry and eggs. What is needed in Turkey is substantial, efficient equipment which can be quickly supplied at a low price.

NATIONAL BANK OF EGYPT.

The report of the National Bank of Egypt for the year ending December 31, 1923, states that the gross profit for the year, after providing for depreciation on the bank's buildings and furniture, for rebate of discount and for bad and doubtful debts, amounts to £902,452 2s. 4d. After deducting from this sum: For directors' fees, £11,750; for current expenses, £363,014 5s. 8d.—£374,764 5s. 8d., there remains £527,687 16s. 8d. In conformity with article 49 of the bank's statutes, a dividend of 4 per cent. is payable on the share capital, £120,000. After this statutory distribution there remains £407,687 16s. 8d. Adding to this the balance brought forward from last year, £183,013 18s. 7d., the amount available is £590,701 15s. 3d. The directors consider it prudent to allocate to special reserve for contingencies a sum of £75,000, which leaves £515,701 15s. 3d. From this amount the directors recommend the payment of an additional dividend of 11 per cent. on the share capital, which will absorb £330,000, and leave a balance to be carried forward of £185,701 15s. 3d. The total dividend for the year will thus be at the rate of 15 per cent.—equivalent to £1 10s. per share. An interim dividend of 8s. having been paid on September 3, 1923, the balance remaining to be distributed will be £1 2s. per share.

The traffic receipts of the Suez Canal from March 8 to 14 amounted to 3,430,000 francs as against 3,540,000 francs for the corresponding period of last year.

National Bank of Egypt.—Coupon No. 35 for the final dividend of £1 2s. is now payable at the National Bank of Egypt, 6 and 7, King William Street, E.C.4.

THE GREEK TOBACCO CRISIS.

Opportunity of Bulgaria and Russia.

European and American manufacturers are faced with a new situation in regard to the purchase of supplies of "Turkish leaf" tobacco. The Greek Government's restrictions on foreign exchange and the heavy taxes imposed upon farmers, as well as on all exporters of leaf tobaccos, have forced the manufacturers to substitute Bulgarian and Russian tobaccos for a part of their Greek tobacco requirements. Greek farmers and merchants are thus in danger of losing the tobacco trade, which for years had given them a strong foothold in countries which were buying their tobaccos, and Bulgarian and Russian interests are taking advantage of the situation that has thus arisen.

Bulgarian and Russian tobaccos are now finding a market among European and American manufacturers more easily than they have for the past twenty years. Official records show that millions of pounds of Bulgarian and Russian tobaccos have been imported into the various countries. Prior to the war, Bulgaria and Russia met with little success in their attempts to dispose of their highest quality leaf tobacco among European and American manufacturers, because the latter, for the purpose of their blends, had no desire for any substitute for the Macedonian and Thracian tobaccos, which constituted the bulk of their "Turkish leaf" supplies before as well as after the war. A substantial part of their Turkish leaf requirements was also obtained from the Smyrna and Samsoun districts. Macedonia and Western Thrace became a part of Greece after the war, and the leaf tobacco grown in these territories has been increased in price nearly 120 per cent. in gold. This is due, first, to the change which took effect in the minds of the workers, and, secondly, to the heavy taxes imposed by successive Greek Governments. Before the war the farmers in Macedonia and Thrace were paying a tax of 10 per cent. of the entire value of their crop. To-day they are paying more than 25 per cent. This tax is in reality paid by the manufacturer and the consumer. In addition to the 25 per cent. tax, the Greek Government has imposed various restrictions on the exportation of tobaccos not only from the above territories, but also from all territories in Greece where tobacco is grown. For instance, an exporter of tobacco could not export his tobaccos from Greece, unless he purchased the value of his tobaccos, in drachmae, from the Government Bank at a fixed rate. For example, if £1 in the open market was worth 220 drachmæ, the exporter would be obliged to sell his sterling to the Government at the fixed rate of 150 drachmæ. Naturally, this entailed an additional cost for the tobaccos which the merchant purchased from the farmer, but the Greek Government soon saw the impracticability of this method of taxation. About a year ago it abolished the system, and instead imposed upon the exporters an export tax of 20 per cent. of the value of the leaf tobaccos to be exported from Greece. The Greek buyers of leaf tobacco in Greece and the European and American manufacturers stopped purchasing tobaccos from Greece, and such tobaccos as they had purchased previously and had ready to be exported from the country to be placed in bonded warehouses in Europe and America are still stored in Greece in huge quantities. They could not afford to export the tobaccos on account of this excessive export tax, which would further increase the already high prices which, without the export tax, were 150 per cent. more than the pre-war prices. Further, manufacturers could not afford to purchase any of the leaf tobacco of the 1923 crop, in view of the high prices. The 1923 crop in all Greece amounted to nearly 150,000,000 lb., whereas the 1922 crop was 60,000,000 lb. The 1922 crop in Greece was practically sold before January, 1923, whereas not one-tenth of the 1923 crop has yet been sold. Next month the Greek farmers must prepare their plantations so as to have them ready for the 1924 crop, and, since they have not disposed of their 1923 crop, naturally they cannot defray the expenses of the coming crop.

The Greek Government, after strong representations on the part of merchants and farmers, reduced the export tax on old crops from 20 per cent. to 10 per cent., and for the 1923 crop from 20 per cent. to 2 per cent., but that has not helped the exporters and the merchants and manufacturers. They are the potential purchasers of the 1923 crop, not the farmers nor the Greek Government, and they continue to hold their old crops in Greece, incurring upon themselves insurance premiums at high rates, interest on money, and large overhead expenses. The merchants and manufacturers wanted the Greek Government to abolish the export tax entirely, so as to enable them to reduce the high cost of the tobaccos already purchased and those to be purchased, and to make it possible for them to consume their leaf tobaccos; but the authorities, having in view the meeting of foreign obligations, and also being under the impression that European and American manufacturers, as well as the world's users of Turkish tobaccos, could not do without the tobaccos grown in the territories of Macedonia, Western Thrace, and the islands of Old Greece, have not abolished the export taxes. The manufacturers, who for from twenty to twenty-five years have been obtaining a large part of their Turkish tobacco leaf requirements from Macedonia and Thrace, have thus been forced to look to other leaf-tobacco-growing countries, and they have discovered that they can procure a certain portion of their necessary supplies from Bulgaria and Russia. While, therefore, protests and representations regarding the abolition of the export tax have passed unheeded in Greece. Bulgarian and Russian merchants have imported into Europe and America large quantities of the best of their native leaf tobaccos, and the opportunity is theirs to continue this supply under existing conditions. All the taxes imposed upon Bulgarian leaf tobaccos do not amount to more than 10 per cent. The present Greek Government taxes for leaf tobaccos amount to over 47 per cent. of the net proceeds of the producer for old crops and 36 per cent. for the new crop. Bulgaria's 1923 crop amounts to about 100,000,000 lb., and a number of European countries, such as Italy, Czecho-Slovakia, Austria, Hungary, Germany, and Poland, as well as others, prefer to purchase their leaf tobacco requirements from Bulgaria; first for the reason that they find the quality equally as good as that of Greek tobaccos; secondly, because the Bulgarian tobaccos are lower in price; and thirdly, since they are certain that there can be no question of the imposition in Bulgaria of taxes on leaf tobacco which will hinder the export trade.

European and American manufacturers, having thus introduced the use of Bulgarian tobaccos, will, if the present situation continues in Greece, establish in the near future their buying organisations in Bulgaria, placing Greece in the same position, in so far as concerns leaf tobacco, as that in which Bulgaria was not long ago, when her production amounted to only 10,000,000 lb. The secret of the cigarette and leaf tobacco industry is that, when the public acquires a liking for one kind of tobacco it is difficult to change it and to substitute another. Should, therefore, Bulgarian and Russian leaf tobaccos appeal to the taste of the European and American publics, farsighted tobacco men realise that the best portion of the millions of pounds which the manufacturers formerly spent in Greece will be expended in Bulgaria, Russia, and Turkey. As an illustration of the effect of taxation on tobacco in Greece, it may be mentioned that whereas the average price before the war was about 2s. 6d. per lb., it now exceeds 5s. per lb.

THE FINANCES AND TRADE OF PALESTINE.

III.—Foreign Trade.

Each year the value of the imports into Palestine far exceeds the value of the exports. The figures are as follows :—

	Imports. £E.	Exports. £E.	Re-exports. £E.	Total Exports. £E.
1920 ...	5,410,000	1,319,000	42,000	1,361,000
1921 ...	5,872,000	1,416,000	83,000	1,499,000
1922 ...	5,581,000	1,353,000	189,000	1,542,000
1923 ...	4,935,000	1,555,000	234,000	1,789,000

To some people these figures appear to show that the country is on the high road to ruin. If it buys five million pounds worth of foreign products a year and it sells less than two million pounds worth of its own products, it must be growing poorer, it is said, at the rate of more than three million a year. If that were true, Palestine would indeed soon be bankrupt. The situation is, in fact, not satisfactory, but it is by no means so bad as that.

Importation of Capital.

There is a large investment of capital going on in Palestine. A number of houses are being built and factories and other industries established. Most of this capital comes from abroad. It comes mostly in the form of goods. For instance, a company may be formed in France to erect a flour mill at Haifa. It buys in Europe building materials and machinery worth, let us say, for example, £E50.000. These materials and machinery appear in the trade statistics of Palestine as imports to that value. But it is absurd to say that, because there is immediately no corresponding exportation, this country is the poorer to the extent of £E50,000 through this import. True that it would be still better if the capital could be provided from within the country, because then the profits of the company would belong to shareholders here, and would remain here year by year. But if it is not so provided, it is better that it should come from abroad than for the country not to have such industries at all. In this particular example Palestine would be the richer, not the poorer, by the existence on her soil of building materials and machinery worth £E50,000. It is not known how much capital comes into Palestine each year in the form of machinery, building materials, drainage plant, and so forth, but it must be very considerable, and it goes far to account for what is called the adverse balance of trade.

Secondly, large sums are sent here by various organisations having special interests in Palestine. The Zionist Executive alone receives annually from abroad, for purposes of education, colonisation, etc., a sum which approximates to £E500,000. Christian religious institutions receive every year large sums for schools, convents, and buildings of all kinds. Tourists in Palestine spend in the country amounts which, in the total, reach a considerable sum. All this money passes from hand to hand; it is distributed throughout the country. A large part of it is no doubt spent on buying goods of various kinds imported from abroad. The value of these goods appears in the statistics of imports, without any corresponding entry for exports.

In the same way the British Forces stationed in Palestine receive considerable sums from Great Britain. The numbers of those forces have been largely reduced, and the cost of them has been reduced also; but the British taxpayer is still providing in the present financial year a million and a-half pounds to pay for the garrison in Palestine. A large proportion of this is sent here in the form of pay for the officers and men, or to defray the cost of rations, forage, and buildings. This money also passes from one hand to another, and much of it is no doubt ultimately spent on goods that figure in our statistics of imports.

The Government, too, has been spending for purposes of development the capital sums which have been stated in a previous article. This money has been mostly borrowed from abroad, and will be repaid over a period of years. If the expenditure is remunerative, it is economical to do this. For instance, if £E50,000 is spent on telephone plant paid for out of Government borrowings, there will appear an entry of £E50.000 in the trade returns with respect to the telephone plant which is imported; there will be no corresponding entry on the export side. But the country is not the poorer by the transaction. The commercial community have telephone facilities to the extent of £E50,000, which they need, and they pay to the Government annual fees which enable the interest on this debt to be met, and the debt itself to be paid off in a series of years. So also with railway rolling-stock and other importations by the Government of materials of various kinds.

In England also there is now, and there always has been, a large excess of imports over exports. For example, in the year before the war the excess was no less than 135 million pounds, and for several years previously the balance was about the same. Yet that was, in England, a period of good trade on the whole, and the country was steadily growing richer. The difference was accounted for mainly by the value of the interest paid on British capital invested abroad and by the earnings of freight by British ships, but it is unnecessary to go into these matters here.

Need of Home Industries.

Now, it would be wrong to draw the conclusion that the development of home industries is of no importance, and that it does not matter to what extent the imports exceed the exports. They cannot, in fact, exceed the exports by more than a certain sum, which is fixed by the importation of capital and of the other items which have been mentioned. But the more the country produces for itself and the more of its own products it is able to sell abroad, the better. It can then buy still further quantities from abroad of the commodities which the population need, but which cannot successfully be produced here. Profits and interest would also then be paid to people in Palestine, instead of to people abroad, and so the wealth of the country would be built up more rapidly. It is, indeed, of immense importance that, by every legitimate means, the productive powers of this country should be developed. Every Palestinian who creates or maintains an industry here, or who works on the land and promotes the success of agriculture, or who buys for his own consumption goods that are produced in the country, renders a patriotic service to Palestine. The statement of facts in this article does not support any conclusion different from this. Its purpose is, however, to prevent false and alarmist conclusions being drawn from the large excess of imports over exports which appears in the trade statistics of Palestine.

A further effect of the material development of home industries would be a reduction in the cost of living. But a still more important cause of reduction has been the increase of production in the greater countries and the fall in world prices.

The changes in the cost of living in Palestine have been approximately as follows:—Taking the pre-war prices of eighteen important items of food and fuel as 100, the prices would be: in 1920, 402; 1921, 593: 1922, 314; December, 1923, 260.

Another calculation is based upon the wholesale prices of twenty-five essential articles of foodstuffs and fuel. If December, 1920, be taken as 100, the figures would be:—December, 1921, 61; December, 1922. 50; December, 1923, 45. In these articles the wholesale prices are now less than half what they were three years ago.

More detailed figures are available for the last two years, showing the expenditure by an average Arab family on twenty essential commodities. If the cost be taken as 100 in January, 1922, the changes are estimated to have been as follows:—Average for 1922, 88.2; January, 1923, 85.8; December, 1923, 75.8; average for 1923, 76.6. It therefore appears that the prices of such articles are now about three-fourths of what they were two years ago.

Currency and Exchange.

It is sometimes suggested that the trade of Palestine might be more prosperous if its currency did not stand so high. Egyptian money is used; the Egyptian paper pound bears a fixed value in relation to the Englisb paper pound; and the English paper pound is usually, in these years, not far below par—that is, not far below its gold value. The American dollar is at present the most important currency which retains an actual gold value. It is said that if Palestine had a currency which was somewhat depreciated her producers would be able to compete more easily, both in the local market and in the markets of the world, with the producers of countries which now have such depreciated currencies.

But certain facts on the other side have to be borne in mind.

(1) A depreciated currency always means in the long run a higher cost of living. That involves a higher cost of labour, and therefore more expensive production, and greater difficulty in competition.

(2) It also means a higher cost of machinery and raw materials imported from abroad—a serious handicap to production.

(3) A depreciated exchange often fluctuates greatly. Such fluctuations make business very difficult. Producers and traders cannot foresee the future; they have to put their prices high in order to safeguard themselves against possible loss. Trade suffers as a consequence, and the consumers suffer also.

(4) It might be a temporary advantage to exporters to allow the currency to be slightly depreciated. but once a currency is on the down grade it is not easy to stop it. Confidence is lost in the value of the paper. Bankers will buy it only at a lower and lower rate of exchange. The fall is liable to become progressive; numbers of people are ruined in the process; a time of severe economic depression follows, and recovery is slow and difficult.

The Government of Great Britain is determined to keep the value of the sovereign as near par as it can. The British Budget has been made to balance by the imposition of very heavy taxation. The National Debt is not being increased, and in some directions is being diminished. There is no Government inflation of credit, and there is no printing of paper money without sound security behind it. Consequently, the pound sterling, in spite of the vast expenditure of the Great War, is not far below par, and with it the value of the Egyptian pound, which is the Palestine currency, is maintained.

The consequence is seen in the fall in the cost of living, in a gradual improvement in trade, and in a greater stability of business conditions than in some neighbouring countries.

Conclusion.

These articles have a limited scope. We do not wish to weary our readers by examining too many subjects or by entering into too much detail. And no attempt is made to discuss such questions as the reforms in internal taxation, or in the customs tariff that may be desirable. It must not be assumed, for that reason, that no reforms are considered to be necessary. It is merely that these are matters of opinion which are not within the scope of these articles. They are intended to do no more than to present for consideration a number of facts in order that those who are interested in these matters, which are of such vital importance to the prosperity of the country, may have at command the information necessary to enable them to form an instructed opinion.

SMYRNA FRUIT MARKET.

Messrs. C. J. Giraud and Co., of Smyrna, report as follows for the week ended March 8:—

The arrivals on the Smyrna market are estimated at 36,800 tons, and the sales to date are put at 36,100 tons. Prices remain unchanged. The Continental demand continues quietly absorbing weekly quantities, and the limited supplies existing in the country are likely to be consumed in Central and Northern Europe. Shipments to the United Kingdom are at a standstill.

Cotton and Cotton Goods.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Uncertain Tone in Futures.

The Alexandria Commercial Company, in their report for the week ended March 14, state :—

Since our last report the futures market has been nervous and hesitating; at the close the tone somewhat improved. The uncertain attitude shown by the New York market and the smallness of the demand from abroad have unfavourably affected our market; the drop has not been heavy, but the tendency has been weak. The main feature of the week has been the strength of spot cotton, due rather to the unwillingness of holders to part with their stocks than to an active commercial demand. For the market to decline further heavy speculative pressure will be required, as the major part of the existing stocks are either hedged with futures or held by people financially independent, who, confident in the strength of the statistical position, do not appear at all disposed to sell at the present low level of prices; the fact that about six months must elapse before supplies can be increased by fresh arrivals makes them more determined in their policy. More business than usual has been transacted in new crop options, part of it being for commercial account. The discounts of new crop compared to the near positions have remained almost unchanged for both Sakel and Ashmouni. At the second March tender 18,000 krs. dockets were issued; it is said that all this cotton is going to be received by one exporter. The premium of March over May has kept at about ½ dollar, and, should it be maintained, further heavy tenders may be expected on the 24th, the last March tender day. The fact that so much cotton is being withdrawn from the market may tend to harden the difference between the tenderable qualities and futures. Reports from the textile centres are almost unchanged. The position in America and England is probably slightly better, but the recent disorganisation of the Continental exchanges has naturally upset business in these countries. The week's receipts amount to 42,852 krs., against exports 195,497 krs.; the stock stands at 1,525,498 krs.

Spot.—We have had a week of poor spot markets at Minet el Bassal. Demand from spinners has been very moderate, and sales amount to about 7,700 B/s, of which we estimate 5,300 B/s Sakel, 2,300 B/s Uppers, 100 B/s Brown and Pilion, and a few bales of White. Arrivals show a considerable falling off, but exports for the week have been fairly large, and the stock shows a marked decrease, being now just over a million and a-half kantars.

Sakellarides.—All styles have been dealt in, with cotton about F.G.F. and a little better attracting most attention. Prices of spot against contracts are generally somewhat easier.

Uppers.—There has been business in all grades. Prices of spot against contracts are without much change, with the exception of fully fair, which is a little dearer.

Brown and Pilion.—A small business has been done. Prices of spot against contracts are without much change.

White.—Is neglected, and only a few bales have been done. Quotations of spot against contracts are dearer for good fair, without much change for F.G.F. and rather easier for good.

Crop 1924.—We have had a rather serious interruption of the good climatic conditions which have prevailed since the beginning of February. However, the crop being yet in its earliest stage, not much harm has been caused. Sowing in the northern districts has now started. Water supply is ample. The figures of the Nile gauges indicate a condition below normal, but better than at the same time last year.

LIVERPOOL COTTON REPORT.

Inquiry on Good Scale.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended March 19 :—

Egyptian Spot.—A good and fairly general inquiry has again been in evidence, and sales of spot cotton, while hardly up to the totals recently recorded, have continued to be of a substantial character. Fluctuations in the futures market have again proved a hindrance to business, but they appear to be getting less violent, and there are signs that confidence amongst buyers is beginning to return. During the week spinners have "fixed" freely, and reports from good sources indicate that a large volume of business is waiting to be transacted in certain quarters. There appears to be no doubt whatever that, whilst the position of Egyptian spinners has been steadily improving, very few of them have bought cotton in any quantity beyond April delivery. It seems highly probable, therefore, that, with the supply of staple cotton getting scarcer and scarcer each week (we refer to the bread-and-butter varieties), a renewed wave of buying should take place in the near future, unless another serious break occurs in the American markets, and this does not seem to be a likely possibility at the moment. Sakellaridis has been the centre of attraction in the week's inquiry, three distinct qualities being asked for, namely, 50 to 75 on; 120 on; and 200 to 250 on. "Off" cotton and the very fine qualities have been neglected.

There has been some slight improvement in the demand for White Egyptian—the best qualities receiving most attention, but so far no actual business has been traced. Brown and Pilion have received scant attention. A good business has taken place in Sudan cotton, chiefly in the Sakel variety, at from 225 to 350 on. Uppers have been rather more in demand than was the case in the previous week, and on one day a small line of the best quality was disposed of at about 100 on contracts. The supply of this cotton actually on offer here has now sunk to almost negligible proportions, but the demand for this quality also appears to have shrunk at the same time as the supply. Inquiries for Upper cotton lately have rarely exceeded "25 on," and more often than not have been concerned with the "off" qualities. C.i.f. business has shown a slight improvement. Forwardings to spinners for the week ending the 14th inst. were returned as 8,893 bales. Estimated sales 4,800 Egyptian and (approximately) 1,000 bales Sudan. Quotations are advanced 80 points all round. F.G.F. Sakellaridis 21.40d.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

Greece as a Republic.

M. Papanastasiou, who now appears as the strong man on the Greek stage, allowed the Monarchists little time to reconsider their decision not to accept his offer of a compromise in regard to the declaration of a republic. By a virtually unanimous vote—the late Prime Minister, M. Kaphandaris, and his followers were absent—the Chamber on March 25 constituted Greece a Parliamentary Republic, subject to ratification by plebiscite. At the same time, the Glücksburg Dynasty was deposed, all its members being deprived of all rights of succession and prohibited residence in Greece. Perhaps, as a natural corollary to the refusal of King George II. to abdicate voluntarily and to accept a pension from the State, the Chamber proceeded to confiscate all the royal property that had been presented to the Dynasty by the State. The property in question, we imagine, will be the Athens palaces and the two estates given to King George's father—one in the Peloponnese, which he received when Crown Prince, on the motion of M. Tricoupis, the other in Macedonia, on the motion of M. Venizelos, after the conclusion of the Second Balkan War. The Tatoi estate, a dozen miles from Athens, purchased by the late King's grandfather, King George I., does not come, presumably, under the ban of confiscation, although an order for its compulsory sale may go forth. In this, as in all other matters directed personally against members of the Dynasty, it is to be hoped that the Government will proceed slowly, in the interests of Greece. With remarkable instinct, in a country where political passions run high, M. Papanastasiou, who has himself been a political prisoner, has recognised the necessity of ending as far as possible the blood-feud between the two sections of the people, and has for this reason lost no time in proclaiming a general amnesty. Anything in the nature of a vendetta against King George II., against whom can lie no charge of injuring Greece's interests, will only serve to keep alive the monarchical rancour which it is to the advantage of the Republicans to eliminate.

The Turkish Assembly.

The first serious trial of strength in the Grand National Assembly of the Turkish Republic appears to have ended with honours easy. Mustapha Kemal Pasha has not been accorded as President the right to dissolve the Assembly; but the attack on Ismet Pasha appears to have failed in the face of his vigorous defence. The proceedings at Angora would have little interest for the world at large were they not linked up with the whole question of Turkey's future. It is essential to the success of the Republic that the nation as a whole should accept the new order. Angora's claim to speak for a unified and united Turkey falls to the ground if there is a split in the Popular Party itself. Nationalist Asia Minor, resolute and with considerable military strength at its disposal, has been able to overawe Constantinople, and those who are anxious that Turkey should be at peace with herself and set to work on the reconstruction and the development of the country, have realised that the only short cut to progress and reform lay in Angora's ability rapidly to make good its claims. A crisis at this early stage in the Republic's history can only evoke misgivings among the well-wishers of Turkey. What is not clear is whether the struggle at Angora is merely personal or whether, behind the constitutional controversy, the religious forces in the country are seeking to recapture the ground lost by their tongue-tied acquiescence in the abolition of the Turkish Khalifate.

Islam's Period for Reflection.

A conference of the chief ecclesiastical and theological authorities in Egypt has decided to convene in Cairo next March an Islamic Congress, in which all Moslem nations are to be represented, in order to consider who should be appointed Khalif. The summons to the Congress, it is interesting to note, is embodied in a declaration which admits that the Khalif Abdul Mejid, by the deprivation of his temporal powers, has been disqualified from becoming Khalif in the sense that Islam desired, and that, "seeing that in principle the Khalif is destined to be the representative of the Prophet, safeguarding everything concerning Islam, which necessarily means that the Khalif should be the subject of respect, veneration, and obedience," the Khalif Abdul Mejid no longer possesses "such qualifications." Here, then, is a further ruling for a divided Islam. Some Moslem authorities, inveighing against the action of Republican Turkey, have declared that Abdul Mejid is still the lawful Khalif; others, accepting Abdul Mejid's deposition as final, have elected King Hussein as Khalif; now come the Egyptian Moslems, who say, in effect, that neither Abdul Mejid nor King Hussein is Khalif, and that the Khalif must be formally elected by the Moslem world in congress. The two chief countries in Islam to-day are undoubtedly India and Egypt. Both are united in refusing to recognise the Transjordanian election of King Hussein to the Khalifate. Indian Moslems appear to entertain hopes that they will be able to persuade the Turks to reconsider their hasty abolition of the Turkish Khalifate; Egyptian Moslems are inclined to welcome a return of the Khalifate to Egypt. A whole year has now been accorded to the Moslem world to reflect on the subject, and as much may happen in that time to all the countries concerned, the Turkish Republic included, the wisdom of the delay is obvious.

The Vienna Conference.

The Russian and Roumanian representatives at the Vienna Conference find themselves in the traditional position at meetings of this kind—that is to say, poles asunder. It is not difficult to understand the Roumanian contention that the status of Bessarabia ought to be regarded as a chose jugée. Russia has no weighty argument to offer against Roumania's claim, but lays stress on her own reading of actual conditions in Bessarabia. Of the two Powers Russia probably has more to gain from the conference; to Roumania on the other hand the return of the money deposited in Moscow during the War would be at the present time of very considerable advantage. In the circumstances a compromise is indicated, and neither party can pretend that the submission of the question of the future of Bessarabia to a plebiscite would be an unreasonable hardship. Roumania's objection, otherwise than as a matter of principle, is, indeed, hard to understand. The overwhelming desire of the Bessarabians for union with the Roumanian kingdom has been emphasised for so long that it might be expected that the Bucharest Government would welcome a plebiscite as the most effective means of giving the death-blow to all Russian claims on the province in the future.

Italy and Roumania.

It would not be at all difficult to work up into quite a picturesque quarrel the cancellation of the Roumanian Royal visit to Italy; but we shall hope that the good sense of both countries, in spite of the temptation to the Press to make mountains out of molehills, will triumph before any real harm is done. King Ferdinand and Queen Marie had, it is stated, personal reasons for wishing to include Rome in the list of capitals that they are about to visit. Nothing would be more in keeping with a desire to make the most complete success of that visit than that the Italian Government should wish to see all outstanding questions between the two countries settled before the Roumanian Sovereigns arrived. This must have been the motive inspiring Signor Mussolini's communication to the Roumanian Government, and we find it hard to believe that the Note was so worded as to convey the impression that the King and Queen were not to come to Rome until the points at issue were settled rather than to urge the settlement of these points before Their Majesties arrived. It is the former interpretation, unfortunately, that has been given to Signor Mussolini's words in Roumania. Accordingly, the visit has been cancelled, and the Roumanians are very angry, as well they should be, if a deliberate insult to their King and Queen had been intended. The selection of this particular moment for conferring the highest Italian Order on King Ferdinand can hardly be considered happy; it may prove that the relations between the two Courts are correct and close, but it will certainly not placate public opinion in Roumania.

A Diplomatic Settlement.

The wisest plan for the Italian Government to adopt, we should imagine, would be to offer the most generous settlement possible for the Roumanian indebtedness to Italy. This indebtedness is shared both by private individuals and by the State. Immediately after the War Roumania was inundated with goods from Italy on terms far more favourable than would have been offered if the main consideration had not been to capture the market by hook or by crook. The collapse of the Roumanian leu followed, and payment for these goods has had to be deferred. The Roumanian State Debt in Italy is represented by Treasury bonds. Whereas both Britain and France have agreed to the consolidation of Roumanian bonds, Italy, or at least a section of the Italian bondholders, has refused consolidation, and it may have been the pressure of commercial interests and of unaccommodating bondholders that prevented Signor Mussolini from couching his Note to Roumania in the style usually associated with diplomatic correspondence. Relations between the two countries are liable to be strained until the question of Roumanian indebtedness is amicably settled. If, therefore, the Italian Prime Minister had no desire to wound Roumanian susceptibilities, he will know how to facilitate an adjustment relating to a sum of money which may be found not to exceed three millions sterling in all.

The Irak Parliament.

Rarely can Fabian tactics have found more complete vindication than in the case of the Irak elections. Fixed originally to be held three years ago, these have just been completed, and the Irak Constituent Assembly was opened by King Faisal last week. The result of the delay has been a very noticeable steadying of the new State. The excessive political excitement that promised to introduce the gravest complications has been eliminated. According to a message to The Times, "the electors have chosen middle-aged merchants or grey-haired landowners from the towns and the sheikhs from the countryside. . . . The townsmen have been elected by virtue of the business or property relationships which have made them known to the countryside. The Assembly will be mainly agrarian in character." In his speech from the Throne, King Faisal gave an admirable lead to the Assembly in urging them to work wisely, expeditiously, and patriotically. The three vital matters that would immediately demand its consideration were the Anglo-Irak Treaty, the Constitution, and the electoral law. King Faisal directed the special attention of the Deputies to the Treaty. Irak, he said, needed the help of Great Britain and of the League of Nations for her protection against threatening calamities. The allusion to the Mosul negotiations was obvious, and it is to be hoped that the Assembly will strengthen Great Britain's hands by a rapid and unanimous ratification of the Treaty.

The Indian Legislature.

In India the legislative session has ended with the acceptance of the substituted Finance Bill by an almost unanimous vote of the Council of State. There are divergent views regarding the result of the month's work at Delhi. We have heard it described as a tragedy, and also as a rather poor farce, but in our judgment a better analogy may be found in the school than in the theatre. The scene in the boardroom stands out clearly: the governing body, gloomy and perplexed, some of the younger members inclined to be a little querulous: the headmaster grave, but not seriously perturbed. A bad term undoubtedly, practically no tangible progress on paper, some tendency to wanton destruction, and to other vices of imperfectly disciplined youth. Perhaps, however, more has been learned than appears in the results: holidays give time for reflection, which is scarcely possible in the rush of term; at this stage it is progress, not achievement, that matters most. It would be premature to talk of wholesale expulsions, or a drastic revision of the curriculum; let us see how next term shapes. Such, we think, would be the gist of the headmaster's statement, and, to our mind, the attitude is not unreasonable in the existing situation.

Extremists and Independents.

One thing at least is clear, that the members of the bloc, which for the moment has obtained control of the Assembly, have plenty of topics for reflection during the recess. The extremists came to Delhi pledged beforehand to make a spectacular demonstration against the existing Constitution. They have made their demonstration, and now have time to consider what real good it has done, and also what they are going to do next. The Independents on their side have cause for some anxiety. When they joined the bloc they intended presumably to act as a drag; in point of fact, most of them, for the divisions show that a substantial portion held aloof, have been dragged at the heels of the Allahabad pandits, and a continuance of that process may result in some personal inconveniences. Again, many members of both wings are genuinely anxious to do something for India, and they now have an opportunity of judging the result from this standpoint of their initial activities. The recess will be shorter than usual, because a special session has been decided on to consider the question of assistance to the steel industry. We are not yet convinced that State assistance is indispensable, but, at any rate, it is obvious that obstruction can render the industry no service, and legislators will probably find themselves forced to assume the responsibilities of their position on this question.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Tuesday Morning.

The Settlement.

Unfeigned relief is the uppermost sensation of all those who were inconvenienced by the tramwaymen's strike, which was settled last night on the basis of a victory for the men. They get six shillings of the eight which they demanded, and the remaining two are to be decided in accordance with the cost of living. Although in all probability this will mean that their increase is finally but six shillings, it is, in view of the fact that the employers' maximum offer was one of five shillings, a triumph for the tramwaymen.

On the so-called bludgeoning methods used to obtain the increase this is hardly the place to comment, and upon the results of extracting an increase from a non-paying concern it is, of course, too early yet to write. The matter is one which certainly will be solved, probably by reorganisation, very improbably by the complete abolition of the tramways.

The Strike.

The topic that dominated the conversation of the whole of London last week was the tramway strike, which really did make things extremely unpleasant. When it takes forty minutes to get from Aldwych to King's Cross, when one has to walk from Brook Street to St. Pancras, and when one is the fifteenth standing on top of a bus, one begins to realise how artificially constructed is our modern life to be so easily upset by local traffic dislocation. On the whole, people's tempers stood it all remarkably well, although they were becoming perceptibly frayed towards the end of the week.

In any case, it was all excellent training for the next strike, which will have the disadvantage of taking place in warmer weather.

Our Present Discontents.

The tide of strikes that has ever since the War been flowing, ebbing, and flowing again has led many of the tossed and often water-logged mariners to wonder what it is all due to. If we believed most of the newspapers (it is a sign of our ineradicable sanity that we do not) we should murmur something about "trade union tyranny"; if we read the Daily Herald or no paper at all, we should debouch something about "the capitalist system"; and if, though reading as widely as possible, we confessed ourselves beaten for one explanation to cover the multitude of our national sins, we should probably gesticulate something about "the hidden hand."

It is useless to get angry over all these strikes, past, present, or to be; there is no universal condemnation sufficient to dispose of them all. That there is trade union tyranny, that there are anomalies in the capitalist system, that the influence of cosmopolitan finance is not always good, no reasonable person (and there are more reasonable persons in Great Britain than any other sort) would deny. All this talk of "industrial dictators," "starvers of children," and the rest, is, therefore, childish and wasteful. The day of dictators in England who publicly proclaim their intentions is not yet; the system of industrial organisation known as the "capitalist system" cannot in the nature of things be permanent; and the advantages that cosmopolitan adventurers are able to take of our present troubles are but temporary. "All things pass and all things go." A recent publicist tried the other day to prove that the British Empire was not to be subject to the law of the world, but although we bravely read his words we knew all the time that they were only the jeu of a very pitying esprit. To form a long view on the basis of the "close-up" to the present series of strikes is to do what the Romans were doing about 400 A.D.

Our Political All-Sorts.

It takes, they say, all sorts to make a world, but the world at the moment is too much with us, and obviously we have far too many sorts. Freaks and eccentrics abound as never before in our history. All due to the War, of course, but it is really a pity when they get a sufficient number like unto themselves to push them, not headlong, it would seem, but stern first, into Parliament. One sometimes wonders what members of the House are doing with their brains when they are speaking. The other day, for instance, when London's very heavens threatened to open, owing to the traffic strike, we had one Mr. Thurtle asking the Premier that, should any of the recruits to the Army at any time develop a wish to be a conscientious objector the Government would see that justice was done. Foresight, some people would call this request (which was with no great magnanimity declined); but there is, on the other hand, another name for it.

Then, again, in the Singapore debate, we had an extraordinarily fine, destructive speech by Commander Fletcher, whose case for the building of the Singapore dockyard no Conservative expositor could have improved upon. But, having shown to everybody that he knew what he was talking about, he turned round and explained that he had been bitten by the "gesture" malady—in other words, that he was going to vote with the Government. A member of immense but wrongly applied intelligence, Commander Fletcher; in short, a Liberal. His head is on the side of the Empire, but his heart on the side of the "world." And the Liberals have never satisfactorily incorporated the one in the other.

Parliament and Travelling Expenses.

A good deal of pother is being raised by the proposal to grant to all members of Parliament season tickets to London—which the Premier said the other day would cost £70,000 first-class and £47,000 third-class. The very suggestion arouses the ire of those who conceive the member of Parliament not as a public servant, but as a master of the permanent State functionaries. Parliament can, of course, vote to itself any money that it pleases.

In theory the member of Parliament is a public servant, serving that public, however, freely and because he likes it. In practice that servant is not always able to pay for the privilege of serving his country unrewarded: hence the £400 a year to members, and this further proposal to grant him free railway passes. The dichotomy is, of course, the direct and inevitable result of the application of the democratic theory to our modern life, and since those who are most numerous in our community cannot afford the expense of continually travelling to and staying in London, they must be paid out of State funds to enable them to do so. An excellent compromise, which would save our principles, but not our pockets, would be to make particular constituencies pay for their member's expenses; but that may be too much trouble for any Government. In any case, it is an uphill fight (and in the long run an impossible fight) to make political power coincide with economic power.

A Sporting Interregnum.

Football has a dying call in this weather, and interest, except in the "finals," has practically evaporated. There is nothing now that matters much—bar the Boat Race, over which many people still contrive to be enthusiastic—until cricket begins. These are curious weeks, when the only thing to do, if one cannot get away to hunt or something else that does not imply the cares of London, is to make imaginary cuts off a swinging fast bowler or to return impossible backhand half-volleys. The wind is, of course, far too keen to attempt to realise any of these fond dreams, but the sun, when it does arrive, will doubtless soften the blow that arises from the shattering of these dreams. For far too many of us our cricket and tennis immortal hours are lived in the first week or two of April.

Dress and the Man.

Nothing has been so productive of "good" stories as the description of the way in which our present political masters live, and particularly of the way in which they dress. We are told carefully who are the best-dressed men in the Cabinet (apparently there are only two of them), but we are told even more gleefully who are the worst dressed of them. It is all very petty, but so was the minute description of the eyeglass, the orchid, and the hat of former days. How So-and-so looked in his court dress, how long ago it was that So-and-so's trousers had had a crease in them—such are the details the publication of which secures a man's fame. It is the turning of the wheel. In distinction of dress is now the key to popular esteem.

Natural Singing.

It is often objected that singing nowadays is made too much a matter of art in the sense that the voice is not "naturally" produced. To dispose of this charge I knew that it was enough to go to one of Miss Megan Foster's recitals; and so last week, at the Æolian Hall, it proved. It seems rather a prerogative of Welsh singers to sing naturally and without affectation; certainly Miss Foster can induce in one a sense of ease and delight. Probably, too, this was the explanation of her superiority in children's songs and in nursery rhymes, which were better done than her Lieder and other songs of a more serious intent. Whether she has actually improved since I last heard her I rather doubt—there is, for example, still that lack of characterisation of vowels on her high notes—but of her charming and refreshing quality there is no question.

Racing.

The flat-racing season started last week at Lincoln, and with a French victory, too. French horses are supposed to be no better than ours, but they have won our races with distressing frequency lately, and the triumph of Sir Gallahad in the Lincolnshire did not catch a great number of people napping. In the Grand National, on the other hand, the English horses had the field to themselves, and backers experienced extreme difficulty in spotting the eventual winner. It was a relief to nobody but the bookmakers, who would have been nastily jarred had the double of Sir Gallahad and Conjuror II. come off, that a horse that had been put to the plough, Master Robert, should have shamed the seriously backed horses. However, it was all good copy for the newspapers, and what else in this life matters?

Plays of the Moment.

There are unfortunately all too many plays in London at the present time that can be classified under the heading of this paragraph, and it is these, presumably, that the strike has hit hardest. At one theatre last week, on Friday night, there were three people present, and one of these the Press agent! Plays with stuff in them, however, seem to be drawing well, and of these the chief are Shaw's "Saint Joan," Galsworthy's "The Forest," and Congreve's "Way of the World." This last play, at the Lyric, Hammersmith, is getting even better audiences than did "The Beggar's Opera."

Still, if London can have the choice of Shaw or Galsworthy, one must not, I suppose, grumble. Both their plays now being produced contain extremely good material; that they are marred by certain things is taken for granted by those who know the authors. But "Saint Joan" appears, from dramatic critics' comments, to be a really big play.

Alter Ego.

A ROUMANIAN ARTIST.

Among the pictures now being exhibited at the Alpine Club Gallery, Mill Street, W.1, are some by a young Roumanian artist, Mr. Hyam Myer. Mr. Myer, who is nineteen years of age, was born at Manchester, and was educated at the Slade School and at Munich. He is here represented by some fifty paintings and drawings, and it is at once evident from them that he has both energy and personality. Whether these qualities are pleasant or not will be variously decided, but it would seem to one observer at least that the undoubted force of his paintings does not disguise the thinness either of his treatment or of his subjects. His work is strong but unfinished. In his drawings, however, he seems to have discovered a more suitable medium for the presentation of his uncouth types, which, incidentally, often have an Oriental "bite."

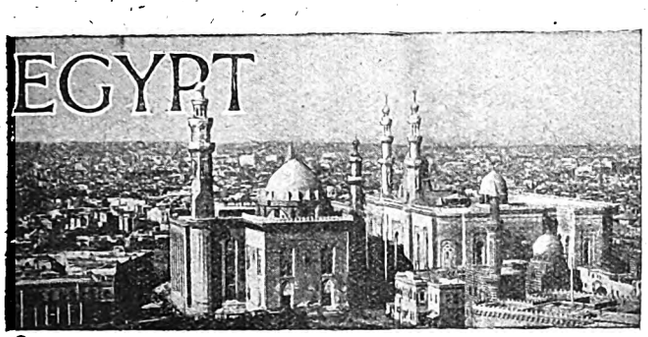
From Our Own Correspondents.



Cairo, March 23.

Political Paradoxes.

Few countries but Egypt, surely, could equal the extraordinary developments of the past week. A Government counting as its supporters at least 195 out of the 214 deputies in the Lower House finds itself threatened with defeat in the first important division. That the possibility of disaster was not purely a bogey invented by the opposition Press was proved by the fact that Zaghloul Pasha found it necessary to issue a statement to the Press warning his followers that the Ministry not only could not allow any amendment to be made to the Speech from the Throne (this was the cause of all the trouble), but would at once resign if it found that there were even a substantial minority in favour of such an amendment. This warning from the Prime Minister had the desired effect, and yesterday afternoon, when the Chamber of Deputies assembled for the first time after the disorderly session of Tuesday afternoon, which had led to a precipitate adjournment, after an hour's disorder, Zaghloul Pasha received an ovation, both within and without the House, which showed that all danger, for the time being, at least, had disappeared. Indeed, it is safe to say that there never was very much real risk of the Government's defeat on the Speech. The movement which has made itself felt during the last few days, and which necessitated the Premier's warning, was at least as much the outcome of ignorance as of real opposition. That there is a feeling throughout the country that the King's speech, at the inauguration of Parliament, was too vague in its references to the Sudan, is evident, and most of the deputies, like the general public, were so little acquainted with Parliamentary procedure that they thought it possible to amend the address in the ordinary course of debate, without thereby prejudicing the position of the Government. As soon as Zaghloul Pasha explained that to carry such an amendment would imply lack of confidence in the Ministry which had drafted the Speech and would entail that Ministry's resignation, the apparent opposition movement melted away like snow before the sun, and all is now again much as it was a week ago, with the prophets who predicted a Ministerial crisis for this week-end looking rather foolish, and explaining that they had been misunderstood.

The Birth of an Opposition.

But, if outwardly all is again peace and calm, and the Government still sitting as securely in the saddle as ever, this seeming serenity is deceptive. During the last few days the seeds of an opposition have been sown, and already the first green shoots of the new movement are visible above the ground. The young plant will doubtless come to maturity with a swiftness surprising to those not familiar with the forcing effect of the Egyptian climate, and may very likely just as quickly wither away. Anyhow, the sowing was accomplished on Friday afternoon at a meeting in the house of Mohammed Pasha Sidky, deputy for Wasta, Beni Suef province, who was elected as a Zaghloulist with a clear majority over the two other candidates, one a Zaghloulist, the other a neutral, but whose Zaghloulist creed is apparently not very deeply rooted, for he is to be the leader of the new Opposition Party which was formed on Friday, and whose first indication of existence will be to put forward an amendment to the Royal Address reference to the Sudan. The amendment was agreed upon at the meeting at Sidky Pasha's house, and among those who concurred in it and stated their intention of voting for it were Mohammed Pasha Mahmoud, the present leader of the Liberal Constitutional Party, Mahmoud Pasha Abdel Razek, at present Under-Secretary of State in the Ministry of the Interior, who is resigning his Government appointment in order to be able to sit in the House, in which he represents Beni Mazar (North), and who is also a Liberal Constitutional, Abdel Rahman Bey Rafei, Nationalist Deputy for Mansura, Abdel Latif Bey el Soufani, Nationalist Deputy for Kafr Daoud (Behera), and, up to the present, about twenty other deputies, mostly Liberal Constitutionals or Neutrals, but also including a sprinkling of disgruntled Zaghloulists. It will be seen that the new Opposition group is a coalition representative of all the hitherto recognised parties. Mohammed Pasha Sidky's position as the leader is somewhat surprising, for he, in addition to having been elected on the Zaghloulist ticket, is also a relative of Zaghloul Pasha. It had been expected that the leader of the Opposition would be either Mohammed Pasha Mahmoud or Mahmoud Pasha Abdel Razek, but, in leaving aside these two and selecting as chief a man who has hitherto supported the Government, and who also, incidentally, has behind him a distinguished career on the Bench, from which he retired as a judge of the Appeal Court, the new group have certainly taken a course more likely to attract to themselves the support of other malcontent Zaghloulists than if they had chosen as chief one of the better known, but also unpopular, leaders of the hitherto existing Opposition Parties.

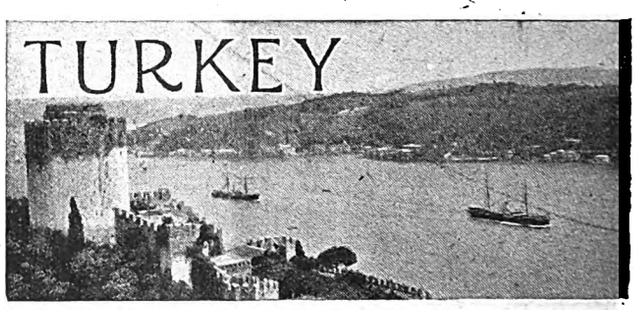
Lack of Stability.

The new political formation is decidely interesting, and more will certainly be heard of it in the near future; but that it represents the genesis of a permanent new party is difficult to believe. The present movement has been long foreseen as inevitable. Writing on January 20, immediately after the elections, in this correspondence I said: ". . . one of the Nationalist's war cries about complete independence for the whole of the Nile valley still makes an excellent propaganda weapon. It is almost certain that when the time comes for official negotiations there will be much talk about the Zaghloulists giving away the Sudan, and then will come the chance for the Nationalists, allied perhaps with the 'party for the liberation of the Sudan and Egypt,' which has been talked of for some time past, but has not yet hatched out, to gain for themselves a new lease of life, on the strength of a patriotism more ardent than that of the Zaghloulist negotiators." That prophecy is coming true now, for it is on the basis of the Nationalist slogan regarding the indivisibility of Egypt and the Sudan that the new group is planning its campaign. But, though the existence of a vigorous opposition will be of the greatest value in the Egyptian Parliament, of value even to the Government itself, the new party gives every indication of lacking, as much as its opponents, the essential characteristic of stability of which Egyptian politics and parties stand in such desperate need. Though for the moment professing a common formula, the supporters of Mohammed Pasha Sidky are a combination of incompatible elements. The Nationalists, even in the hour of humiliating defeat, have struck to the battle-cry of "No negotiations before complete evacuation of Egypt and the Sudan." The Liberal Constitutionals, so far as they have any definite policy regarding the Sudan, favour the Rushdy project, which is practically the continuation in perpetuity of the present nominal dual control. Such glaring differences may be overlooked in combining to oppose, but it is not by such a grouping that Egypt's crying need of a real political party, with principles and a programme, will be met. To the careful observer nothing else about Egyptian politics now at the beginning of constitutional government is so apparent as the unreality and impermanence of it all.

Egyptian Women's Aims.

The presence of Madame Hoda Sharawi Pasha, president of the Egyptian Women's Union, in a gallery of the Chamber of Deputies at yesterday afternoon's session was a reminder of the fight which the Moslem women of this country are making for a higher place in the social system. The exclusion of Egyptian ladies from the Parliamentary inauguration ceremony evoked vehement protests from Madame Sharawi's organisation, but the expression on the face of the Egyptian women's leader yesterday afternoon as she watched the somewhat disorderly scenes in the Chamber below suggested that she was thinking that, after all, she had not missed much by not having attended previous sessions. The women's movement here has not made very much apparent progress during recent months, but behind the scenes there is much going on, and it is highly probable that the harem ladies of this country, like their sisters in Turkey, will astonish their menfolk one of these fine days by a sudden irresistible offensive, sweeping away in one concerted movement the barriers which now appear impregnable. A little incident the other day typified what is now going on among the women of this country. An Egyptian, recently married, invited an English friend to tea to meet the bride, a charming girl belonging to one of the best families in the country. In return, an invitation to dine at one of the big hotels on the weekly dance night was accepted, and it was also arranged that the Englishman should propose the married couple for membership of a local sporting club, both husband and wife being anxious to play tennis. But on the day of the dinner a telephone message brought the news that the wife had a sore throat, and, furthermore, that joining the club would be postponed for a while. A mutual friend eventually furnished the explanation of the latter decision and of the "sore throat." The young wife's family had heard of the intention to dine and to play tennis with men other than her husband or relatives, and a family council had been summoned and banned both proposals. There, in a nutshell, is the story of the struggle now going on between the younger generation and the old. For the moment youth must submit, but it is long odds that within a twelvemonth the young lady in question will both dance well and play a good game of tennis. Egyptian women of to-day are determined that their country's independence shall not be exclusively masculine.



Constantinople, March 25.

Growth of an Opposition?

A good deal of uneasiness is manifesting itself in the political world, and the plain speaking in which the critics of the constituted authorities are indulging is a good deal plainer than is usually tolerated under these advanced republican institutions which are now blossoming in profusion in the Orient. There are two events in the Assembly and one in Constantinople during the past week which merit attention.

The main work of the Assembly has been the discussion of the Organic Charter, and all went merrily as a marriage-bell until Article 25 was reached: and then there were fireworks. The offending article confers upon the President the right of dissolution of the Assembly, which right is all of a piece with the Cabinet's known policy of supporting the doctrine of collective Cabinet responsibility and the institution of a Second Chamber. The Article roused a storm of opposition in the Chamber, which saw in it a bureaucratic device for entrenching upon its limitless powers, and rejected not only the original text but also a revised version which more nearly approached their own views. What the next move is cannot easily be predicted, but the importance of the present conjuncture is considerable. It would not be an exaggeration to see in the present uncompromising attitude of the Parliamentary majority a sign that the rank-and-file of the party have taken the bit between their teeth and revolted against the orders of the autocrats who have until now ruled the country in the name of the Assembly. The coincidence of this vote with a serious tussle between two groups for the administrative plums in the party organisation and the introduction of new blood into it cannot fail to strike even the casual observer, and make him wonder whether the Ismet-Mustapha Kemal combine will weather this storm, as it has weathered so many others during the past year. The refusal to allow the President the right of dissolution need not be interpreted as hostility to the person of Mustapha Kemal, but it would seem to be a gesture of hostility to Ismet. Part of the Turkish Press has for some time been dropping hints to the effect that Ismet's position is severely shaken, but at the present stage it is not clear whether the opposition to him in the Assembly is constructive—i.e., led by a coherent group or party with a core of potential Cabinet Ministers who have the necessary standing or could attain the necessary prestige; or destructive—i.e., a simple revolt of the back-bench members against authority. At the moment the latter hypothesis appears to be the correct one, first, because, apart from the Unionists, only a few of whom are Deputies, it is not easy to put one's finger upon a sufficient number of men of proved capacity to take the portfolios if the present Ministry goes, and, secondly, because the intoxicating fumes of independence have gone to the heads of our legislators.

Ismet Pasha's Speech.

The recent speech of Ismet Pasha on foreign affairs and the relations of the new Turkey with the rest of the world was eminently safe and not particularly informative. He laid stress on the pacific policy of the Government, mentioned the formal treaties renewing diplomatic relations with various States, made a few colourless remarks on the coming Mosul negotiations, and reassured the House on the subject of the recent utterances of Mussolini, whose words had been interpreted by some in this country as a menace to the economic or political independence of Turkey. There is little or no reason to assume that these declarations of the Premier are less sincere than similar declarations made by the Foreign Ministers of other countries in analogous circumstances. Turkey's absolute need of peace and retrenchment is as well realised by the sober members of the Turkish Government as it is by the rest of the world. Yet Angora is, and has long been, coquetting with so many unofficial or semi-official propaganda and komitaji organisations on the limits of her present territory, which are conterminous with provinces which she would wish to see drop back into her power, that one of these days she might find herself so irretrievably committed by the unauthorised activities of these free lances that she will reap a crop of troubles at most inconvenient moments. The encouragement of bands of komitajis on the Syrian frontier, the incitements to internal disturbance in the Mosul Vilayet, and the ill-concealed covetous gazing at Western Thrace are all, one might say, semi-official phenomena; nevertheless, they supply an efficient weapon to the hands of Turkey's enemies.

The Municipal Octroi Duty.

The third outstanding event of the week is a municipal affair in Constantinople, but it has created such a stir that it ranks high in importance, especially as it brings into the limelight once again the deplorable commercial situation of the town. The present Vali, Haidar Bey, has distinguished himself ever since he assumed office by the energy with which he has applied himself to the task of increasing the municipal revenues. He has certainly achieved a considerable measure of success in the collection of revenue, and his doings were greeted with vociferous applause by his compatriots at the beginning, for he applied himself principally to putting the foreigner under the same disabilities as the native in respect of municipal taxation. The Schadenfreude of his admirers has been very short-lived, for he has discovered that all the queer forms of exaction that his municipal agents have been practising until now are insufficient to keep the town's coffers reasonably full and pay for the normal necessities of municipal life, to say nothing of beautifying and sweetening it until it becomes one of the world's tourist centres, and is fed by a constant stream of foreign gold. Therefore, he has applied for, and obtained, the assent of the Assembly to the imposition of a municipal octroi duty, and he and his town councillors sat down one day to elaborate a beautiful tariff of a piastre or two on a pound of every necessity of life, and decreed that it should become operative on the next day, and that all tradesmen and merchants should have exactly eight hours and no more in which to make up true and complete lists of their stocks on which the tax was to be paid on the nail, under penalty, in case of non-compliance, of being forced to shut up shop. The storm of protest, led by the official commercial institutions, such as the Constantinople Chamber of Commerce and the Union Nationale de Commerce Turc, astonishes even the oldest inhabitant by its unanimity and the violence of its language. The main criticisms appear to be that nobody gets anything for the money he pays in municipal taxes; that such a measure as the octroi is a clumsy mediæval device which involves exasperating petty interference with every form of business, and costs as much to collect as it brings in; that by the time it has been exacted three times on the same goods—from the wholesale dealer, from the middleman, and from the retail trader—it will result in a rise in the cost of living of at least 20 per cent., especially as all these exactions will be passed on to the consumer with interest; that it falls indiscriminately upon the prime necessities of the poorest classes, and takes no account of whether the goods are produced in the country or imported from abroad. One cannot but concur in the justice of these complaints, and, knowing something of the dreadful conditions in which a large part of this population lives, and the hopelessness of their outlook on the future, which seems to promise a progressively more serious crisis and its corollaries of cut wages and lack of employment, one cannot help being apprehensive of the dangerous consequences of such a unanimous movement as that started by the most prominent Turkish papers and commercial men against the octroi.

Jerusalem, March 19.

The Tourist Season.

The "season" is now at its height, and the voice (predominantly American) of the tourist is heard in the land. Visitors are arriving almost daily—by boatloads to Haifa and by trainloads from Kantara, taxing the resources of the Palestine railway system and local hotel accommodation to the utmost. The weather has been quite tolerable, the country perfectly peaceful, and the tourist should be able to return with a fairly good report of present conditions. Last week's arrivals by train were unfortunate in finding the El-Arish bridge washed away, but that was a comparatively light hardship, and involved a wait only of a few hours till daylight appeared and till passengers and light luggage and mails could be transferred to a waiting train on the other side. This is the first time for three years that such a mishap has befallen the Palestine railway system.

Jewish Palestine is not pleased with present methods of showing Palestine to the tourist. The old-established tourist agencies follow old-established methods. routes, and programmes; they studiously ignore Jewish feelings and Jewish pride in the "National Home" and in Jewish achievement. The guides employed by the better-known agents are exclusively Arabs, mostly of the caricature dragoman type, vociferously and polyglottically misinformed and misinforming—though tourists generally get the guides they deserve. (It is a great pity that nothing ever came of the projected scheme planned three years ago by the Pro-Jerusalem Society and the Department of Antiquities for training and licensing competent guides. Such a scheme has, however, been completed by the Zionist Executive here, and the Jewish tourist can be well provided for if he appeals to the proper quarters.) Local Jews see a deliberate boycott of Jewish interests—whether of Jewish gharry-drivers and car owners, Jewish hotels, Jewish shops, and Jewish places of interest. All that the conducted three- or eight-day tourist is allowed to see of Jewish life and achievements is the Friday evening scene at the Wailing Wall and that most unpicturesque and unhealthy ghetto in the old city. He is not encouraged to go out of his way to see the new centres of Jewish life, urban or rural, in Palestine, though these have now, quite decisively, become a characteristic and often quite picturesque element of post-War Palestine.

The Resignations.

The outstanding feature of local interest is the ever-increasing effort at economy in the running of the Administration and the imminent resignations of officials of higher and lesser degree. The more conspicuous of these have already been reported in the English Press. In the majority of cases there is no question of any "political" reason in the background. It so happens that expiry of the contracts of certain officials, stringent need of economy in the general administration and "private reasons" have coincided.

The loss of Mr. H. C. Luke, the Assistant District Governor of Jerusalem, who is transferred to Sierra Leone, is especially felt. It may be no compliment to him to say so, but his peculiar gifts and interests seem so admirably apt and so particularly desirable in a higher Palestinian official that it seems a misapplication of human material to transfer him to Sierra Leone. Palestine is a particularly odd kind of country, with problems often petty and always perplexing; the ordinary rule-of-thumb official would only befuddle himself and the people if he ever attempted to penetrate beneath the surface of things to causes and motives, instead of carrying out his routine duties along the line of least resistance. But Mr. Luke's knowledge, experience, and personality are such as to give him a much firmer grasp of the complications and a much deeper sympathy with the seeming pettinesses of much of local difficulties than could fairly be expected in the average British official. The peace of Palestine badly needs officials of Mr. Luke's attainments, and it is greatly to be hoped that in due course the Colonial Office will see fit to transfer him back to us.

An interesting proof of the degree to which administrative economies can be pushed through without seriously affecting administrative efficiency is the fact that while the British Occupation at first saw fit to govern the country by dividing it into thirteen districts, each equipped with British Governor and staff complete (Jerusalem, Jaffa, Gaza, Hebron, Beersheba, Nablus, Jenin, Tulkeran, Haifa, Nazareth, Acre, Tiberias, and Safed), this number was reduced in 1919 to ten (by the amalgamation of Acre with Haifa and of Tiberias and Safed with Nazareth); in 1920 to seven (by the absorption of Jenin into Nablus, of Tulkeran into Haifa and Jaffa, and of Hebron in Jerusalem); last year to four (Phœnicia, Samaria, Jerusalem-Jaffa, and the Southern District—Gaza, Hebron, and Beersheba); and now the number is to be reduced to three by combining Samaria and Phœnicia. Lt.-Col. C. F. Cox, who was District Governor of Samaria, has been appointed British representative in Transjordan in succession to Mr. H. St. J. Philby, and the Jerusalem-Jaffa district is to have but one Assistant District Governor, Major Campbell.

of Khalif. It was expected long before the deposition of the Turkish Khalif, and so scarcely created more than a ripple of anything but formal interest when it became an actual fact—an actual fact, that is, from the point of view of local Arabs. King Hussein—and this is quite clearly recognised here—is not in the least likely to be accepted as Khalif by any beyond the Arab portions of the Moslem world; and so, morally, his importance and that of the Arabs of Palestine, Irak, and the Hejaz (who see in him the symbol of Arab unity and freedom) remain precisely what they were before in the eyes of the rest of the Moslem world.

PERSIA.

Teheran, March 2.

The Press and a Republic.

Since my last letter the question of the change in the régime of the country has been the absorbing, if not actually the sole, topic of discussion both in the Press and in other circles. The entire Press seems unanimous in demanding the substitution of a Republic for the present monarchy, and even the semi-official organ, Iran, hinted the other day that Persia is ripe for such a change, and suggested that the time has come to alter the fundamental law of the country, which would be necessary before a change of this nature can be effected. Another leading paper went so far as to address an open letter to the Crown Prince urging him to induce his brother, the Shah, to abdicate without delay, while there is yet time, and not wait for the Persian nation, whose will has been shown to be in favour of a Republic, to dethrone him. It likewise called on His Highness himself to leave Persia, and thus free the country of the Kajar dynasty (whose days, if we are to believe all that is written in the Press, are certainly numbered!). A significant point in the above letter was that the Shah was referred to as "Ahmed Mirza" (Prince Ahmed), and not "Ahmed Shah," which is, of course, His Majesty's proper title. In view of this violent anti-dynastic campaign in the Press, future events will be watched with great interest, and speculation is rife as to the trend affairs will take in the near future, as developments should not be long in coming to a head. The gutter Press has, of course, as usual, overstepped the bounds of decency, and one of the papers has descended so low as to resort to vulgar abuse of the Sovereign of the country. Honest criticism and discussion are another matter, and justifiable, but it is difficult to see how a policy of deliberate insults can further the Republican cause.

The same paper has resorted to a similar method in criticising the fifth quarterly report of the Administrator-General of the Finances, which has just been submitted to the Council of Ministers, and Dr. Millspaugh will do well to treat these attacks with the silent contempt they deserve. There is no doubt whatever that the American advisers are doing genuinely good work for the finances of the country, supported by a strong Government and backed up by an efficient military force, and these pinpricks in the irresponsible Press do not probably cause Dr. Millspaugh much loss of sleep!

General News.

Colonel Saunders, the Military Attaché at the Legation here for the past three years, left yesterday to take up his duties at Simla as Deputy Director of Military Intelligence at Army Headquarters, and Teheran society will lose in him a popular member and a keen sportsman.

The final for the Teheran Football Cup was played off last Sunday before a large gathering of the European colony, and resulted in a win for the Imperial Bank of Persia team against the combined Telegraphs XI., both of which had beaten the Legation team. Sir Percy Loraine, the British Minister, presented the Cup to the winners.

A somewhat tragic interest attaches to this Cup, which was presented by the then British Minister, Sir Cecil Spring-Rice, in 1907. When on its way out in charge of the King's Messenger, the cross-Channel boat on which he was travelling was wrecked, and the Cup went to the bottom with everything else on board, the King's Messenger losing his life. The Cup was afterwards salved and sent to Teheran, where it is competed for every year by teams from the different British institutions.

Some days ago Resht, in Ghilan, experienced a slight earthquake shock, which, however, caused no damage. A similar occurrence has also been reported from Ardebil, in Azerbaijan.

Moshaver el Mumalik, the Persian Minister to Moscow, who recently returned here from the latter place, has entered into negotiations with the Russian Legation with regard to the commercial treaty between the two countries, which has been the subject of much deliberation during the past two years, and it is hoped that all difficulties will be overcome, and that the agreement will be signed as soon as Moshaver el Mumalik returns to Russia.

It now appears that, in addition to the aeroplanes and armoured cars which have recently been landed at Bushire for the Persian Army, there is also a tank. The Minister of War means, indeed, to make the army thoroughly up to date!

KHORASSAN.

On March 12, at 74, Grosvenor Street, Lt.-Colonel W. G. Grey lectured to the Persia Society upon "Khorassan: 1916-1920." Colonel Grey, whose address was illustrated with lantern slides, dwelt for the most part on incidents that occurred during his four years' Consul-Generalship at Meshed. He found the native population extremely dissatisfied with the conduct of the Russian troops stationed in the capital of Khorassan—which was not surprising, in view of the intention, proclaimed by Russian officers to Colonel Grey, on the part of Russia at the end of the War to partition Persia. When, however, British troops (two Indian regiments) replaced the Russians, there was nothing but gratitude from the Persians, whose plight during the famine that left them stricken was greatly alleviated by the generosity of these British troops. The lecturer's task during these difficult years was greatly helped by the Persian Governor-General of Khorassan, particularly in 1919, when the advances proposed by the Afghans in their war with the British to enter Persia were courageously repelled. Colonel Grey did not paint the Persian's character highly, but he firmly believed that the British way of dealing with the Oriental was the best; pay him certainly, and well, for work done, but not otherwise.

After Lord Lamington, who presided, had stated his belief in the necessity of Persia's preserving her integrity and self-government, and Colonel A. C. Yate had stated his reminiscences of a journey thirty-nine years ago from Meshed to the Caspian, the lecturer briefly summarised his more recent impressions of Persia, gained mostly from visits to Teheran in 1921 and 1922. He thought that the anti-British feeling, which was still considerable up to a few months ago, was now dying down; that the present Premier (Riza Khan) was really installing some national feeling; and that, if the Shah ever returned to Persia, it would not be as Shah.

EGYPT AND THE SUDAN.

To the Editor of The Near East.

Sir,—I have been reading (yesterday) in the columns of The Times the warning of the Dean of Bristol against Egyptian pretensions in the Sudan, and to-day in The Near East the misrepresentations of M. Félix Välyi in regard to the work done by Great Britain in Egypt and the Sudan from 1882 onward. I had the pleasure of meeting M. Välyi in Oxford during the War in the rooms of a young Christ Church friend of mine who now holds a very responsible post in the employ of the League of Nations. From my memory of that meeting I did not carry away the forecast that M. Välyi would lay himself out unjustly to undervalue the great work done by Great Britain in Egypt during the last forty years, a work which, among other things, has exercised an invaluable influence on the Sudan. It is to be noticed, too, that this Välyian denunciation of British administration in Egypt and the Sudan was delivered to an assembly of Englishmen (the Near and Middle East Association), presided over by Lord Lamington. The brief account of the discussion which followed the lecture, as reported in The Near East, certainly does not impress me as dealing with sufficient vigour with the—in my opinion—calumnious attack made by M. Välyi on the great work done by such administrators as Lords Cromer and Kitchener. It is my sincere hope that the Central Asian Society, which numbers amongst its members all the most prominent Britons who have served in Egypt and the Sudan—to wit, Sir Reginald Wingate, Lord Allenby, Sir Lee Stack, Sir Edgar Bonham-Carter, Sir Gilbert Clayton, and many more, including Mr. Robert Williams—will, at an early date, avail itself of the wealth of knowledge and experience which is at its disposal, and tell the British nation and Empire, on the authority of those who have really lived and served in and ruled those countries, what Egypt and the Sudan are to Britain.—I am, etc.,

TURKEY OF TO-DAY.

A meeting of the Near and Middle East Association was held at 14, Hans Crescent (by the kindness of Mrs. L. Cobham) on March 28, when the subject of discussion was "Turkey As It Is." In the unavoidable absence of Sir Denison Ross, Captain E. N. Bennett presided. At the beginning of his paper, Captain Edward Walker, who has just returned from Angora, summed up briefly the reasons for Turkey's entry into the War on the side of the Central Powers and of the "massacres" associated with her name. He dealt fully with the question of the Patriarchate and with that of the Greeks and Armenians who, though they were nominally subjects of Turkey, yet intrigued against her in her hours of trouble. The treatment meted out to these "traitors" was sometimes severe, although he considered that the Greeks of Constantinople, at any rate, were treated with extreme moderation. The position of Britain vis-à-vis Turkey, which although very low at the time of the Mudania Conference was now high, depended, the lecturer contended, upon an early ratification of the Treaty of Lausanne. If there were delay in this he thought that the Germans, of whom he saw many in Angora, would regain their former supremacy. But if Englishmen would step in now all might yet be well.

Professor Toynbee dwelt more on the general aspect of Turkey. Although Angora's recent actions had been condemned in some quarters, it was obvious that, since Turkey had definitely decided to attempt to develop upon Western lines, all things that savoured of an old and obsolete past must be destroyed, and he thought that the Turks' endeavours to free themselves from an impossible heritage should be watched with sympathy. The main burdens that Turkey had had in the past to bear were her religious and Imperial burdens. She was resolved now to support no longer the responsibilities of the whole of Islam, and for ever to forgo the outlying provinces of the Ottoman Empire. This renunciation was, of course, a great experiment, which was bound to meet with certain opposition, but unless it succeeded the Turks were doomed to extinction.

PERSIA IN TRANSITION.

At the quarters of the Persia Society, 74, Grosvenor Street, on March 26, the Venerable Archdeacon Biddlecombe delivered a lecture upon "Persia in Transition." He began by contrasting the conditions in Persia as he first found them in Persia in 1904 with those prevailing to-day, laying stress on the excellence of the harbour on the Caspian which the Russians had built at Enzeli since that time. The native arts and crafts were dying out now, for the Persians preferred, on account of its cheapness, a Manchester cloth to their own exquisite work. In Ispahan, for instance, the secret of a certain beautiful type of curtain was known to but one man. The lecturer did not believe that the Persians would accept a Republic, for they did not know what it meant—in earlier days, when the agitation for a Constitution was at its height, they wished to know whether this Constitution for which they were fighting was a man or an animal—and if the Teheran extremists did succeed in their aim, he prophesied that Southern Persia would break off from the whole and form a Republic of her own. In testifying to the success which Riza Khan has had in subduing the various tribes, and to the excellence of the present Persian Army, he took leave to doubt whether the powerful tribal chiefs would ever completely submit to the Central Government.

THE GREEK REPUBLIC.

On March 25, the 103rd anniversary of Greek independence—the day on which the war of liberation against the Turks was begun in 1821—Greece was declared by a unanimous vote of the Chamber a Republic "subject to confirmation by plebiscite." Neither the Government nor any member of the crowd in Athens that enthusiastically celebrated the event appears to anticipate an adverse vote when the plebiscite is held on April 13. There may be reason for their optimism, although it will come as a surprise to many foreign observers if it can be shown that the Greek people is definitely opposed to a monarchical régime. A protest issued by the Monarchist leaders after the proclamation of the Republic is not without significance in view of the silence that the party had preserved for some time past. "Representatives of a constitutional people," runs this document, "confronted with such a flagrant contravention of the people's rights by the high-handed resolution putting an end to the Dynasty and establishing a Republic, feel the obligation to interpret the general protest of the Hellenic people against this most serious political crime committed by a Government representing only one particular oligarchy. They denounce this crime to the civilised world, and hold the Government responsible for its consequences, in the certainty that the people will defeat by all legal means any and every endeavour to deprive them of their constitutional rights." If this protest were to be followed up by an equally resolute canvass of the Greek people, the confidence of the Republican Government might well be shaken in the event of a free and impartial plebiscite. The nation, however, is weary of strife. An adverse verdict on April 13 would hardly suffice of itself to restore the Monarchy. Not many weeks ago the same Assembly which on March 25 acclaimed a Republic had voted against it. The advent to power of a strong Cabinet determined to establish a Republic had brought about the change. Is it likely, the voters may ask themselves, that a group of men who were ready to strain the Constitution for the sake of a provisional declaration of a Republic will do violence to their acts and their beliefs by tamely acquiescing in the restoration of the Monarchy? For the time being the only alternative to the Republic is civil war, and it may well be that in these circumstances an electorate, however strongly monarchical in spirit, will support the fait accompli.

Whatever the outcome of the plebiscite, M. Papanastasiou, the new Prime Minister, deserves credit for his masterly handling of the situation. Even his political opponents appear to recognise the sincerity of his convictions, while roundly denouncing his actions. With all his firmness, he has never ceased to be conciliatory. He refused to turn aside from his resolve to proclaim a Republic without waiting for the plebiscite, but he did all in his power to persuade the Monarchists to let the proclamation be by general consent. His offer was that King George II., in return for a voluntary abdication, should be pensioned by the Republic, and that the Monarchists, for accepting the new status quo, should be reinstated in their former official positions. This proposal was rejected. Although it is not difficult to understand how distasteful such acquiescence would be to the King and the upholders of the Monarchy, their decision can only be regretted. The Republic has been proclaimed, the Dynasty deposed and banished from Greece, its property declared forfeited, and it can hardly be expected that the protesting Monarchists will be given posts in the service of the Republic. M. Papanastasiou, however, has made a bold bid for internal peace. All political prisoners, and the exiled Monarchist leader, General Metaxas, have been amnestied. The Premier's actions, indeed, warrant the belief that he will prove himself capable of going still farther along the road to the complete healing of Greece's political wounds. First of all, there should not be the shadow of a suspicion attaching to the strict impartiality of the plebiscite on April 13. His future policy in the event of the Republicans being outvoted can be formulated later. Secondly, the confiscation of the Royal property should not be carried into effect. It is a harsh unjustifiable measure, far more likely to injure the Republican cause than to confer any practical benefit upon the State. No foundation has been shown to exist for any charge brought against King George II., nor in any particular has he manifested a desire to act otherwise than as a strictly constitutional monarch.

Given a favourable vote on April 13, has the Greek Republic come to stay? On this point, there will be no doubt in Greece itself. By the Republicans the question will be answered with an emphatic Yes, by the Monarchists with an equally emphatic No. Opinion outside Greece will be less positive. A year ago no foreigner with first-hand knowledge of Greece would, we believe, have entertained the possibility of the establishment of a Republic in Greece. What, then, is the new set of conditions that has suddenly made a Republic a reality? It will be found, unless we are mistaken, to be threefold. In the first place, the great majority of the Greek nation has been reduced to the numbness of despair by nine years of incessant domestic strife, and is prepared to accept almost anybody or anything that holds out a promise of internal peace. Secondly, a new spirit has arisen in Greece as the outcome of economic conditions. A wider distribution of wealth created many new aspirants to social prestige, who found their way barred by those who constituted the traditional entourage of the Court. They identified themselves with M. Venizelos, who had to create a party of his own, in the expectation that he would provide them with a political short-cut to their goal. At first as Royalist as the King himself, they were driven by force of circumstances into opposition against "the King's people," until they accepted as their own their leader's personal hostility to the Throne, the steps of which had been their social goal. A third factor in the situation may be found to have been the presence in Greece of so many refugees from Asia Minor, not all of whom will have been penniless and dependent on State or private charity. The first factor constitutes admittedly a passing phase. In regard to the second, the social equation has solved itself, as far as it ever can be solved, by the march of events. If a general amnesty can be declared in the hearts of the people as well as in the Statute Book, it will be strange indeed if the monarchical instinct does not flourish again as of old. If it were forced now, it must needs be a plant of weak growth and the true interests of Greece seem to call for an acceptance of what has been thrust upon her until she is able once more to write in a firm hand across her Constitution, "The Will of the People."

YUGOSLAVIA'S FOREIGN POLICY.

[The following article is extracted from the statement on March 17 of M. Nintchitch before the Skupshtina. After welcoming the prospect of a settlement of the Western European situation, the Yugoslav Foreign Minister went on to discuss the nearer relationships of Yugoslavia.—Ed.]

The Agreement with Italy.

Much attention has been excited throughout the political world by the conclusion of the pact of friendship and cordial collaboration with Italy. All those who see in the development of peaceful relations between peoples a favourable future for their own country were pleased. This feeling will be readily understood by all who were present in Geneva at the last meeting of the League of Nations when the so-called question of Corfu was the subject of animated discussion. Much was said about Corfu, but—as it seems to me—it was rather of Fiume that people were thinking. The view was expressed that the real danger to European peace lies in the Fiume question, and that in reality this question alone is capable of occasioning international conflicts, as it has entangled our relations with the Kingdom of Italy. In vain was the declaration at once made on our part and on behalf of Italy that the Fiume question could not possibly give rise to a conflict between our respective States, and that the question would, without any doubt, be settled by friendly agreement between the two Governments. A feeling of apprehension remained, nevertheless, and the representatives of the States belonging to the League of Nations carried it away with them to their respective countries. For this reason the news that the settlement of the Fiume question has not only removed the danger of conflict between us, but that it has enabled a friendly pact to be concluded, has excited a feeling of relief throughout the whole world.

Our pact of friendship with Italy is important not only on account of the obligations it contains—and which are known to the National Assembly—but also because it testifies to the desire of the two States to regulate their relations on the basis of friendship and mutual confidence, and to collaborate politically and diplomatically in their international action. This shows both States to be peace factors in Europe and heightens their international standing throughout the world. Our friends, being duly informed of the pact, declared their pleasure and satisfaction. M. Benesh and M. Duca unhesitatingly expressed their agreement on the subject at the meeting of the Little Entente at Belgrade, being of opinion that our pact of friendship with Italy increases the importance of the Little Entente as a whole, and is of benefit to each of our countries separately. In France the satisfaction which has been clearly expressed has been equally great, and everyone knows how favourable this work of peace of ours has been received in England, in America, and in the other States which are amicably disposed towards us.

The Little Entente and Poland.

Our Government has had the pleasure of receiving in Belgrade the representatives of our Allies, Czecho-Slovakia and Roumania. The idea of the Little Entente is gaining ground more and more, and is constantly becoming more concrete and broad in its meaning. Thus it may be said with truth that it has become a serious peace factor in Central Europe and a necessary collaborator of the Great Powers in the preservation of the situation resulting from the War, and also of the authority of the obligations resulting from the existing international treaties. It can now be stated freely that the grouping of national democracies in the Little Entente, bound together by the concrete interest of safeguarding peace and the inviolability of the treaties upon which that peace is founded, is a creation of liberal-minded tendencies, solid because it is based upon the mutual respect of the political individuality of each of the three States, and upon a free co-ordination of their external policy. The Little Entente has even demonstrated its value in practice; on the occasion of the two "Putsches" of Charles of Hapsburg. It has proved its solidarity at the conferences of Porto Rosa and Genoa, where its importance was for the first time understood in the field of world politics. In the question of the Hungarian loan its aid was sought for the purpose of securing the political atmosphere requisite for the success of the enterprise. But, apart from these concrete cases demonstrating its practical value, its moral value is equally great, for the very knowledge of its existence is alone sufficient to appease the more extreme political elements within its sphere of interest, and thus it is an influence towards the gradual consolidation of the situation created by the Treaties. In order to arrive the more speedily at a unity of views, to elucidate the more important political questions, and to take note of the principal political projects and tendencies of each of the three States, the Little Entente has enlarged its field of action, and now meets periodically as a sort of congress, in which are discussed all questions relating to peace and order in the political world at present. Hitherto such meetings have been held at Prague, Sinaia, and Belgrade, and in future they will be continued with the same cordiality and the conviction that they disseminate the idea of the Little Entente for the benefit of the peace of our respective countries and their assured development.

At Belgrade the subjects discussed were the defensive alliance between France and Czecho-Slovakia, the question of reparations, events in Russia, towards whose people our country cherishes wholehearted sympathies and sentiments of gratitude, events in the Balkans, and the question of the Hungarian loan, regarding which decisions were reached. The mutual acquaintance with each other and the subordination of particular views to a common interest have on several occasions led us to results at which each of our States alone would probably not have arrived. For these reasons our Government notes with satisfaction the progress of the idea of the Little Entente and the standing which it has acquired in the world, and it regards with full confidence its future activities in the direction of consolidating the situation created by the treaties and in that of political progress. . . .

portant. The aim of our policy has been to consolidate the conditions established by the Peace Treaties—to set up again in this manner as normal and as good relations as possible between the States of the Balkan Peninsula, and thus to ensure for the peoples inhabiting these regions normal conditions of life and as long a period of peace as possible. Unfortunately, our efforts have met with only partial success.

(a) Albania:—Our relations with Albania have continued friendly. After the elections on January 21 last the Constituent Assembly was solemnly opened at Tirana. As none of the political groups had obtained the necessary majority the first days of the Assembly were spent in calming the discontent and in forming the new Government. Only a few days ago was the point reached of appointing a Commission to draw up a scheme for the Constitution and formulate proposals relating to the form of the State.

On February 26 the Government of Ahmed Bey resigned. On March 3 a new Government was formed under the presidency of Shefket-Bey Vrlatsi.

Owing to the divergence of the different Parliamentary groups—none of which is in a position to assume the government of the country by its own strength—the political conditions in Albania have become somewhat troubled. The development of these conditions is the subject of our careful attention, and any legal Albanian Government which sincerely intends to maintain the relations of a good and friendly neighbour can reckon upon our sincere and friendly support.

The situation in regard to the safety of the frontier and security against boundary disorders has sensibly improved. The number of incursions by outlaws has been materially lessened, although all the elements of insecurity have not yet disappeared.

With regard to the Macedonian Committee's action against our State engineered from Albania, it may be said that its activity has been mainly concentrated in Southern Albania. Although we have information of rather an important nature regarding the preparations, we expect and hope that, by friendly collaboration with the Albanian Government, and by means of the energetic steps which it undoubtedly proposes to take, all the foreign agents will be removed from its territory. In view of this, we hope and desire that Albania is establishing a Constitution, and, by consolidating her internal situation, will become an element of peace in the Balkans and a sincere collaborator with our country with that object.

(b) Greece.—The political conditions in allied Greece have recently developed very quickly, and have attracted the attention of public opinion throughout the world, exciting special interest in our friendly country. The events which succeeded the war in Asia Minor exercised an influence on the rapid conclusion of the Peace of Lausanne, and upon the settlement of the internal political conditions brought about by the vicissitudes of war. Our attitude towards this important neighbour had already been indicated by the declarations of the Government to the National Assembly. Our unwillingness to interfere in the internal affairs of Greece must on no account be interpreted as indicating that our country is not interested in what is happening in that country. We are following events in that country with a watchful eye; it is our desire and it is to our interest that conditions there should be arranged as speedily as possible, and that Greece should, in the near future, once more become an influential political factor in the Balkans. A feeble Greece is a temptation to the various irresponsible elements and organisations of her immediate neighbours to indulge in adventure, and thus she might easily prove the occasion of a fresh menace to peace in the Balkan Peninsula.

(c) Bulgaria.—As a result of the military revolution of June 9 last year in Bulgaria, a new Government assumed control of the country. Without altering our policy towards the Bulgarian nation, we waited until the new Government should get to work. Not desiring to interfere in their internal affairs on the occasion of the revolution in June, as also with regard to the Communist movement in September last, we merely undertook such measures as were necessary for the sole purpose of preventing the disturbance of peace on our frontier.

The new Bulgarian Government has declared on several occasions that it desires to foster good relations with all its neighbours, and particularly with ourselves, that it will conscientiously fulfil the obligations of the Treaty of Neuilly, and that it will assume all the liabilities contracted by the late Government. This meant, inter alia, the recognition of the Nish Agreement and the obligations arising from it. Thus came about the meeting of the second Serbo-Bulgarian Commission at Sofia on October 1 last. The purpose of this Commission, in addition to the settlement of certain economic, financial, and judicial questions, was to devise and determine measures which would put an end to the so-called revolutionary organisations established on Bulgarian territory and directed against order and public safety in our southern provinces. The discussion of this subject has, unfortunately, been adjourned.

As I have already declared in this place several times, the chief and fundamental obstacle to the improvement of Serbo-Bulgarian relations is the illegal organisations existing on Bulgarian territory and their activities on our side of the frontier. A sincere desire for rapprochement between the two peoples presupposes at the outset the stoppage of this absolutely abnormal situation and the putting of an end to the subversive operations of the illegal organisations. Since June 9 until the present day, however, these operations have been accentuated. New preparations of an important nature have been made, money has been collected, and so on. Until recently the leader of this organisation, and the organisation itself, carefully evaded publicity and public discussion. Now, however, the leader gives interviews to the correspondents of foreign journals and news agencies. These journals publish the official communiqués of the organisation relating to its policy and its attitude towards the Government and State organisation in Bulgaria. At the same time, in order to increase the financial resources requisite for its activities, the organisation not only levies imposts upon its own members, but also upon other wealthy persons, on the various financial undertakings, and even on the foreign banks. Thus the diplomatic representatives of certain States have been obliged to intervene in order to safeguard the interests of their nationals.

This organisation has perpetuated similar acts before, but at that time it did them more circumspectly, avoiding publicity. To-day it no longer takes such precautions. The explanation is probably that it now feels more sure of itself and more free to act under the present Government than under its predecessor, and that it does not trouble about any measures such as ought to be taken by the Bulgarian authorities against it. Moreover, the bands from Bulgaria are constantly making their appearance in our Southern provinces; there they commit pillage and other crimes; they kill our civilians, soldiers, and officers, and when we follow them up and are about to fall on them, they take refuge on Bulgarian territory.

Generally speaking, for several months past an increasing activity has been observed on the part of all the Bulgarian authorities for the purpose of raising questions which have been definitely settled in our favour in the course of three bloody wars, and the settlement of which has been ratified by three international treaties. What is important is that even in speeches of an official nature there is a tendency to raise these questions. While, on the one hand, declarations are made expressing a desire to respect and execute the peace treaties, on the other the discussion of questions definitely settled by the peace treaties is accentuated.

M. Zankoff, President of the Bulgarian Government, himself speaks before the Bulgarian Parliament of "Bulgarian minorities" in Macedonia. It ought, however, to be known in Sofia that there are no Bulgarian minorities in Southern Serbia, and that it is likewise impossible, on the basis of agreements as to minorities, to formulate rights for the Slav minorities in Southern Serbia. Our public opinion considers that these declarations are in harmony with all those preparations being made abroad and in the country to raise once again in one way or another the so-called Macedonian question. We do not yet know whether anything is concealed behind these indications and whether the preparations in question mean anything. But, although we do not yet know what sort of year the Macedonian Committee—which has hitherto worked unhampered from Bulgarian territory—is preparing for us in the Balkans, we will not lose our presence of mind, and our Government will endeavour to remain faithful to its policy of doing everything possible to ensure for as long a term as possible the peaceful development of our people.

One thing, however, ought to be known: the Revolutionary Committee in Bulgaria, with its activities, is not, and cannot be, a danger to our country. It can only succeed in momentarily disturbing peace and tranquillity in certain remote districts. But while the Committee does not represent a danger to our country, it is a real danger to Serbo-Bulgarian relations and to Bulgaria itself, in which country its activities will be more and more concentrated.

It would appear that of late the Bulgarian Government has come to understand this, for it has taken certain steps and put in prison certain persons who might, as it says, disturb peace on the frontier and on the other side of the frontier. We consider that by these imprisonments the possibility of action by the principal factors of the organisation has not been prevented, and that, generally speaking, the steps so taken are neither sufficient nor efficacious. We shall, however, rejoice if they should prove to be the first step of the Bulgarian Government towards the settlement of a vital question, and if it should not stop merely at these measures.

From this survey it may be seen what great efforts our Government has made, and is still making, to secure better relations with the neighbouring kingdom, but it will also be seen that it is not our fault that the results do not correspond with what has been done. Yet a sincere readiness on the Bulgarian side to bring about friendly relations with our State will at all times meet with a good reception from our people. The more so because we believe that the people of Bulgaria have not the smallest inclination for adventures, but that, after the active movement conducted for the rapprochement of our two peoples, they wish as a whole for friendly relations with their Slav brothers.

NEAR EAST BOOKSHELF.

ANCIENT TIMES IN THE NEAR EAST.

"CAMBRIDGE ANCIENT HISTORY." Vol. 1. Egypt to Babylonia. 1580 B.C. Edited by V. B. Bury, S. A. Cook, and F. E. Adcock. (Cambridge: The University Press. 35s.)

The reviewer well remembers the chorus of critics which attacked the earlier volumes of the Cambridge Modern History, or, rather, the method adopted for their production. It was objected that a system of cutting up the subject matter into separate treatises, each entrusted to a specialist on the subject, necessarily led to overlapping and to a want of uniformity of treatment, amounting in some cases to contradictions between chapter and chapter. Again, it was felt that the various writers, however equal in learning, did not necessarily impart their learning equally well, while the necessities of the case allowed so little space to some writers that their contributions were mere pemmican. And it is true that these defects existed, and that they continued to some extent throughout the work. The next venture, the Mediæval History, is not altogether free from them, and it cannot be expected that the Ancient History will entirely avoid them either. These defects are inseparable from the system, and it says very much for the skill of the editors that they have gradually become less and less evident.

Now, the reviewer has been a reader of these histories ever since they began to appear, and the appearance of a new volume has not ceased to be an event for him. He is of opinion that far too much has been made of the drawbacks. After all, look at what the reader gets, and he is, when all is said and done, the most important person in connection with literature of this kind. Not only does he have his ground mapped out for him by the united skill of editors of the greatest eminence in their line, but he gets the framework thus set up filled in by men and women who are thorough masters of their subject and are frequently the greatest authorities possible. He is in possession of a diamond with many facets, and should be grateful.

The fourteen volumes of the Modern History are complete, and the Mediæval History has recently reached its fourth volume, its progress having been sadly checked by the War. And here we have the first volume of the Ancient History. And what a task it undertakes! Within 615 pages we pass from the mists of palæolithic times to B.C. 1580, when the Hyksos kings were evicted from Egypt. The countries mainly treated are Egypt; Mesopotamia and its neighbours to the North, East, and West; Crete, with Greece and the Cyclades; concluding with Thessaly. In fact, the volume treats of very much the same tract of country as THE NEAR EAST, but it treats of its history some fifty to thirty-five centuries ago. The work is extraordinarily well done, so well done that it leaves one longing for the next volume to give the continuations of the narrative. Of course, it cannot, in the nature of things, be right up to date. Excavations are going on all the time, and new discoveries are constantly being made. But this cannot be helped, and, at all events, here we have the means for appreciating the meaning of discoveries as we read of them. If we have any grumble, it is that Professor Langdon in his chapters has chosen so difficult and almost repellent a style to wrap his marvellous learning in.

The book is, like its companions, beautifully produced and liberally supplied with many useful tables of all kinds, exhaustive bibliographies, maps, and a really good index. It is a thousand pities that expense forbade the use of illustrations.

To give the briefest account of the contents would require far more space than is available, but the reviewer hopes that he has made it clear that the work is one of the greatest value and one which should be bought and read. C. S.-W.

The Exhibition.

It would be difficult to give any adequate comparison between the appearance of the Exhibition grounds at Wembley as I saw them last week and the vista they presented at my first visit in the autumn. Then it was only possible to form a vague idea of what the Exhibition would ultimately look like; now one can visualise it in broad outline. In a sense, I was pleasantly surprised, in a sense, disappointed. It was already evident last year that the spacious conception of those responsible for planning the Exhibition would result in a highly imposing group of buildings, but the finished product (if so one may term it) surpasses expectations, and those who are not entranced by the view towards the Stadium from the entrance by Wembley Park station must be indeed hard to please. On the other hand, I never imagined that the Exhibition, viewed from certain angles, could be so ugly. The long series of scenic railways, or whatever they are, which line a long stretch of the Metropolitan Railway are a blot on the landscape, and, in my opinion, the huge advertisements on the Stadium are only one degree better.

The Near East at Wembley.

The Near East will be fairly well represented at Wembley by the Sudan, Palestine, Malta, and Cyprus. Irak is, unfortunately, not represented, nor, of course, is Egypt. Palestine and Cyprus are sharing a pavilion near the Stadium, and an annexe is, I understand, being provided to meet the demand for additional accommodation for Palestinian products. Not very far away is the East African pavilion, where the Sudan exhibits will be housed. There is to be a separate cotton exhibit, in which, needless to say, the Sudan will figure largely. Before leaving the subject a tribute must be paid to the Indian pavilion. It has strong claims to be regarded as the most graceful structure in the Exhibition, and it is safe to say that, whatever sections visitors ignore, India will irresistibly appeal to them. When one says it is worthy of India one has said all.

The Turkish Market.

I wish to draw the special attention of British traders to the article on the Turkish market by Mr. Edward Walker which appears on another page in this issue. As in the case of so many Near Eastern countries, our merchants have been showing no special enthusiasm to enter this market since the signing of the Lausanne Treaty made commercial relations possible, the argument being the uncertainty of the position. But, as Mr. Walker points out, it is now that we have our real opportunity in Turkey, and if any advantage is to be taken of the relative absence of German competition, it must be by enterprise at the present time. In a comparatively short period the position may have undergone a vital change, to the detriment of British trade prospects.

Eastern Bank.

At the meeting of the Eastern Bank, Mr. Haskell, the chairman, said that though, thanks to another good monsoon and excellent crops, India had been prosperous, there were many factors which had not made it easy for profits to be earned commensurate with the turnover. Generally speaking, the conditions of Indian trade during the past year had been of a favourable character, but he pointed out that while there had been an increase of something like £32,000,000 in exports, imports showed a decline of about £10,000.000. Turning to Irak, he remarked that trade in that country during the year had been far from brisk. Mr. Haskell concluded by saying that the trade outlook in the East, and more particularly in India, is encouraging.

National Bank of India.

Sir Charles C. McLeod in his speech at the meeting of the National Bank of India commented on the expanding balance of trade in favour of India, and pointed out that it is a satisfactory feature, "for it is an established fact that the greater the exports from India the more she will purchase from this side." For 1923 exports amounted in value to 342 crores—easily a record. Sir Charles referred to the continued fluctuations in rupee exchange, and said that the question of stability appears to be as far off as ever.

Stock Exchange and Foreign Loans.

It is announced by the Committee of the London Stock Exchange that, failing compliance with certain conditions, various foreign Government loans will be removed from the daily official list as from May 2. Among the loans in question is the Roumanian 4½ per cent. Gold Loan of 1913. As regards this loan, the payment of coupons of British-owned bonds of the London issue due from October 1, 1918, has been made conditional on whether the coupons due from 1914 to 1918 were presented and paid in London during that period.

THE TURKISH MARKET.

A Plea for Enterprise.

By EDWARD WALKER.

The moment would appear opportune for British merchants and financiers to review the whole Turkish question: and this for two reasons—first, because, during the present state of depression in trade, no opportunity should be lost of gaining any possible overseas market for our goods, and, secondly, because to neglect Turkey at the present moment would be to concede an advantage to our commercial rivals from which we may never be able to recover.

I was in Angora as recently as February 5, and I met some twenty business men of different nationalities—American, French, German, Italian, and Swiss—but I was the only Englishman in the place. If one discusses the commercial possibilities existing in Turkey at the present time, one almost invariably meets with the same answer: "Owing to the unstable conditions prevailing in that country at the moment, etc." For this reason, therefore, it would seem desirable to try to define the actual conditions prevailing.

A political revolution has taken place in Turkey which has been as far reaching in its results as that which took place in Russia. The Government of Ghazi Mustapha Kemal Pasha, after accomplishing miracles in the military sphere, has now settled down to the work of economic reconstruction. In this connection it should be borne in mind that the Treaty of Lausanne was only signed seven months ago, and that the Allied Armies of Occupation only evacuated Turkish territory five months ago, and it would, therefore, be absurd to expect miracles in the economic sphere as well in so short a space of time. Turkey has been at war almost continuously for over twelve years, during which period her agriculture and industry have been almost entirely neglected, and the economic problems confronting the rulers of the new Turkey are, consequently, of the most formidable nature. Yet a great deal has already been accomplished. The Economic Congress of Smyrna laid down a definite policy for the future; steps have been taken to regulate economic conditions in the port of Constantinople, and while I was at Angora a lecture was delivered to a number of Deputies by the Secretary of the Constantinople Chamber of Commerce, at the "Foyer Turc," under the auspices of that excellent organiser, Hamdoullah Soubhy Bey, on this latter question.

The financial position of Turkey is better than that of any other ex-enemy State; this year's budget shows a deficit of £T8,000,000 (£1,000,000), which the Government are confident of being able to cover. This deficit is proportionately far less than that of some of the victorious powers. The Turkish pound has only depreciated by 700 per cent., in striking contrast to the German mark and the Austrian crown. Confidence in Turkey very largely depends on the latter's attitude towards her exterior debt. It will be remembered that it was decided at Lausanne that the various outstanding questions concerning the debt should be settled by direct negotiations between the Government and the representatives of the bondholders; these negotiations will begin as soon as the Treaty is ratified. The most important question to be settled is that of the currency, in which the coupons of the debt are to be paid. The condition attached to the payment of the interest on the majority of the loans arranged for such payments in sterling in London, francs in Paris, and marks in Berlin, etc., to suit the convenience of the bondholders. Therefore, before the War, the question of currency did not crop up since all the different currencies were at par. The majority of the bondholders are French, and, owing to the depreciation of the franc, they now demand that their coupons should be paid entirely in sterling; on the other hand, the Turkish currency has depreciated by 700 per cent., so that one can well imagine what it would mean to the Turks if they were obliged to pay the entire interest on their exterior debt in sterling. There is no doubt that when the conditions of the various loans were drawn up before the War, it was never contemplated that the Turks should be called upon to pay the whole of the interest in sterling, for the simple reason that a complete disruption of the European financial system was never contemplated nor provided for at the time when the loans were contracted. Undoubtedly there is a great deal to be said from the Turkish point of view.

But another much more serious question of principle is that of the loan of 1909 to the Municipality of Constantinople. On the face of it, there is nothing that can be said as an excuse for the action taken from a business point of view; nevertheless, the Turks themselves will tell you, when questioned on the subject, that they are so suspicious of European diplomacy, owing to the way they have been treated in the past, that they are afraid of creating a precedent which the French might use against them in the future negotiations concerning the Public Debt. They fear that if they consent to pay the interest on the Municipal Loan of 1909 in sterling they will be obliged to pay the interest on the whole of their exterior debt in sterling.

This suspicious attitude on the part of the Turks may seem strange; but anyone who followed the proceedings of the Conference of Lausanne closely will have realised that it was just this attitude on the part of the Turkish delegation which caused the Conference to be protracted through eight weary months.

Another reason put forward for not risking money in Turkey at the present time is the instability of the Government. My own impression is that Kemal and Ismet Pashas have never been in a stronger position since they began their movement than that in which they find themselves to-day. In any case, the possible instability of the Kemalist régime in no way constitutes a danger for the employment of British capital in Turkey. The most powerful reason which should induce British business men seriously to consider the Turkish question—a reason on which it is impossible to lay too much stress—is that the present is the crucial time. To hang back now would be to abandon all the advantages which we have gained by the fact that the Germans have been excluded from Turkey during the Allied Occupation. A Treaty has just been concluded at Angora between the German and Turkish Governments, and we may be sure that the former will not be slow to seize their opportunity. They have never abandoned the "Drang nach Oesten" idea, or that of the Berlin-Baghdad Railway, and these are additional reasons which are sure to induce them to try to regain their former grip on Turkey. The question is: Are we going to stand aside and let them do it? British capitalists have already shown their willingness to risk their money in Russia, between which country and Turkey there is no comparison as regards security for property and facilities for trade; why, then, do they hesitate to open up in the latter country, in which no real obstacle exists to the success of their enterprise?

COTTON AND COTTON GOODS.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended March 26:—

Egyptian Spot.—The demand for Egyptian cotton has continued unabated, a further fall of nearly one penny per pound in prices being practically ignored by the trade. Spinners, particularly those producing "combed" yarn, are in a more optimistic vein than we have seen since the boom year, and every break in the futures market is seized upon as an opportunity for "fixing." The statistical position of Egyptian cotton, taken by itself, is undoubtedly very "bullish," and spinners are at last beginning to realise the fact. The selection of staple cotton is becoming increasingly difficult on our market, which is hardly surprising when one remembers the amount of buying which has taken place here during the past few months.

The inquiry for Sakellaridis has been mostly for cotton over 100 on contracts, and it is only when the 150 on figure has been passed that anything like good staple is obtained. Cotton below 100 on is almost invariably of an irregular and wasty description, without even grade to recommend it, and the bulk of the business has been done at an average figure of about 175 on. This is an abnormal situation for this period of the season, and makes one wonder what will happen in another two months or so. There is, of course, the Alexandria stock to draw upon, but the parity between the two markets is not such as to encourage consignments being sent to this country, and spinners who are compelled to fill their requirements in the Alexandria market will find, we are afraid, that the Egyptian shippers are fully alive to the strength of their position, and will inevitably exact their pound of flesh. Nor can we see any easing of the situation in that quarter. The Alexandria stock to-day stands at approximately 200,000 bales, to which can be added about 50,000 bales of cotton not yet come "into sight," making a total of 250,000 bales. This is only a moderate figure for this time of the year, and Continental spinners are making steady inroads upon it week by week.

The finer qualities of Sakel have been rather neglected this week, which may be partly accounted for by the arrival of the early shipments of Sudan Sakellaridis, which are much in favour at the moment, and in which a good business has been done at about 250 to 350 on contracts. In uppers, a very fair inquiry has been met with, but fancy prices are not being paid. Fully good fair can be bought at about 25 on May Egyptian and good at about 75 on. There are rumours to the effect that several firms here are holding stocks of upper, which, for the present, they are not offering. This is quite likely, and certainly it is remarkable how the stock of good to fine upper has disappeared from sight recently. In the low qualities (8d.-15d.) a slightly improved business has been noticeable. Brown, white, and pilion have been neglected, but a certain amount of business has taken place in White Sudan at from 200 to 300 on American contracts. Forwardings to spinners for the week ending 21st instant were returned as 11,024 bales. In c.i.f. business there has been rather more doing. Estimated sales, 5,200 bales Egyptian and 1,610 Sudan. Quotations are reduced 70 points for Sakel and 80 points for brown and upper. Fully good fair Sakellaridis to-day 20.70d.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Futures Firmer.

The Alexandria Commercial Company, in their report for the week ended March 21, state:—

Since our last report the futures market has been much firmer. The advance may be attributed to the steadier tone of the New York market and the somewhat improved demand from abroad. The Liverpool market has also shown a firmer tone, and spot sales there keep fairly heavy. The final American ginners' figures published yesterday by the U.S.A. Department of Agriculture are about as expected. B/s 10,160,000 against B/s 9,729,000 last year. Local speculators have endeavoured to break prices during the last two weeks, but their efforts have proved unsuccessful, the statistical position is too strong; stocks are daily decreasing, and holders are not at all anxious to part with what is left. On the spot market there are already indications of scarcity in certain qualities, and there is no doubt that as the season advances the position as far as supplies are concerned will become tighter. New crop options have eased in comparison to the old ones, but their relative cheapness has attracted the attention of a few spinners recently. Selling of new crop options is mainly for account of straddlers; very few growers here will hedge their crop before it is grown. The market for the moment looks as if it would stabilise around about the present level of prices, but we are of the opinion that the slightest upward tendency in New York will easily provoke a sharp advance here, owing to the exceptionally strong statistical position. The week's receipts amount to 44,779 krs., against exports 59,273 krs.; the stock stands at 1,511,004 krs.

Spot.—We have had a rather better week at Minet-el-Bassal, and sales amount, for the five business days. to about 10,200 B/s, of which we estimate 6,300 B/s Sakel, 3,600 B/s Uppers, 300 B/s Brown and Pilion, and a few bales of White. Both exports and arrivals are small, and the stock is just over one and a-half million kantars. Holders of spot cotton show no disposition to press sales, and, in general, cotton is not easy to buy.

Sakellarides.—There has been business in all styles but the grades from good fair to fully good fair to good have received most attention. Prices of spot against contracts are somewhat dearer for fully good fair and good, unchanged for fully fair and good fair, and inclined to ease a little for fair and fully good. Fully good fair spot is now worth quite $\frac{3}{4}$ dol. over May contracts.

Uppers.—All styles have been dealt in. The lower grades have been in small request, spinners being more interested in better qualities. Except for fair and fully fair, which are rather easier, prices of spot against contracts are generally dearer, especially so for cotton over fully good fair.

Brown and Pilion.—A fair business has been done. Prices of spot against contracts are generally dearer, except fully fair and below, which are rather cheaper.

White.—Only a few bales have been done. Prices of spot against contracts are generally dearer.

Crop 1924.—The weather has been variable. In the southern districts of the Delta only insignificant areas are now left unsown. In the northern districts sowing is proceeding normally. A good water supply is reported all over the Delta. The Government report on the Nile for February reads:—"The Bahr el Jebel fell at almost normal rate throughout the month. The White Nile fell slowly the first nineteen days, and faster than usual during the rest of the month. The Blue Nile at Roseires was almost steady during the first ten days, but fell sharply afterwards, being at the end only 12 cms. above normal. At Khartoum it fell practically at a normal rate throughout the month. The Nile at Wadi Halfa fell sharply throughout the month; it was identical with the normal at the beginning of the month, but 34 cms. below it at the end."

The London Branch of the Standard Commercial Trading Corporation of New York has been discontinued. Mr. G. Mills, formerly manager of the Standard Commercial Trading Corporation in London, has started his own business at 10, Coleman Street, E.C.2, as a tobacco leaf importer and exporter, specialising in Oriental and Turkish leaf tobaccos.

EASTERN BANK.

The Indian Trade Position.

The fourteenth annual general meeting of the Eastern Bank, Ltd., was held on March 26 at the office of the bank, 2 and 3, Crosby Square, E.C. Mr. J. S. Haskell (Chairman of the company) presided.

The Secretary (Mr. R. Carter) read the notice convening the meeting and the report of the auditors.

The Chairman said:—Ladies and Gentlemen,—Before proceeding with the special business of the meeting, I should like to express the pleasure your directors feel, in which, I am sure, you will join, at having to-day initiated the holding of our annual general meeting in our own bank offices. I am confident that you will agree with me that our new building reflects great credit on our architects, Messrs. Blomfield and Driver. The building is commodious, well designed as to light, and the whole scheme of decoration is pleasing and restrained, very suitable for the conditions under which present-day banking is carried on. I anticipate definite practical advantages from our improved surroundings, and I hope that shareholders will make an inspection at their convenience. It will be seen that we have a reserve space for expansion, sufficient, we believe, to meet our requirements for a few years, and, additionally, we have several floors available for letting, some of which are already engaged at satisfactory rentals. While we have not expected to obtain a high interest yield on the original outlay, we are pleased to say that, when the building is fully let, we shall stand at a fair rental, having regard to the valuable space occupied.

The report which we are considering to-day does not vary much from its immediate predecessor. Although, thanks to another good monsoon and bountiful crops, India has been prosperous, there were many factors which have not made it easy for profits to be earned commensurate with the turnover. We are still labouring under the effect of the great depression, and I think we may congratulate ourselves that the outcome of the bank's operations during the year is well up to the level of the preceding twelve months.

After making ample provision for bad and doubtful accounts, we are enabled to recommend payment of the same dividend as last year—namely, 5s. per share for the six months, less tax at 3s. 9d. in the £ (after allowing for relief in respect of Indian taxation), making, with the interim dividend of 4s. paid last October, 9 per cent., less tax. We also propose placing £20,000 to the reserve fund, which will then stand at £340,000, and writing £10,000 off premises account, leaving £33,348 9s. 10d. to be carried forward, which is somewhat of an improvement on the previous account.

The figures in the balance-sheet call for no special comment. The drop in current and deposit accounts of £490,000 is explained by the stringency in the money market in India at the end of the year. Bills payable are down £75,000. Acceptances on account of customers show a satisfactory increase of £300,000, and loans payable are £645,000 more. I need not trouble you with the other items, as no material change has taken place.

As you will have seen from the report, we have opened a branch of the bank at Karachi. This is one of the chief ports of India, which of late years has become of steadily increasing importance, and has a great future before it. The long-discussed Sukkur barrage scheme has now been sanctioned, and when completed it is calculated that it will add 6,000,000 acres of land for cultivation. In addition, a commencement has already been made with the Sutlej Valley scheme, and experts estimate that its completion will bring to the port the produce of 3,500,000 acres. In view of the expansion of Karachi which these projects foreshadow, and which will undoubtedly take place in the next few years, the prospects of this branch may be regarded as promising.

The conditions of Indian trade during the past year have been, generally speaking, of a favourable character, but while the exports show an increase of something like £32,000,000 over those of the previous year, the imports were about £10,000,000 down. The increase in the exports was largely accounted for by raw cotton, which gained about £12,000,000, and the decline in imports was observable in coal, sugar, and machinery. Manchester goods have shown no revival; the enhanced price of the raw material consequent on the shortage of the American cotton crop has made it nearly impossible to produce goods at prices within the resources of the Eastern markets.

The balance of trade in favour of India, which amounted to, in round figures, £76,000,000, has been nearly offset by purchases of precious metals (gold to the value of £27,000,000 and silver £13,700,000), by the sale of Council drafts, purchases of sterling in India, and transfers from the gold reserve. The £27,000,000 provided for in the Indian Budget for sterling requirements, which appeared such a formidable item, was more than covered long before the close of the financial year.

For a considerable period—about six months of the year under review—trade in India remained very slack. The Imperial Bank rate of discount did not rule above 4 per cent., and funds could not be profitably employed; but towards the end of the year the great demand for currency to move the crops caused considerable tightness in the money market, the discount rate rapidly rising to 9 per cent., accompanied by a rise in the rupee exchange from about 1s. 4d. to 1s. 5¼d., but there has been all along a lack of confidence as to its stability at the higher level, with the consequence that a big discount has prevailed for forward rates, which has rendered exchange operations most difficut. Since then the rupee exchange has dropped to 1s. 4¾d., which is the present rate.

Taking it altogether, it has been a trying and strenuous year, and I think great credit is due to the managers and staffs for the results attained. I should like to express here the thanks of the directors to the local board in Bombay, and its chairman, Mr. A. J. Raymond, who has for many years displayed the greatest interest in the affairs of the bank, and whose experience and knowledge of local conditions have been very valuable.

As regards Mesopotamia, it will be recalled that in May of last year it was announced that a protocol had been signed between Great Britain and Irak, whereby the responsibility of H.M. Government would be terminated upon Irak becoming a member of the League of Nations, and in any case not later than four years from the ratification of peace with Turkey. A fresh agreement was also foreshadowed to regulate the subsequent relations between the two countries. The situation to-day remains substantially the same; the Treaty with Turkey still awaits ratification by Parliament, while in Irak the Constituent Assembly has not yet been formed. The elections are now proceeding, and we may hope that some time this year it will come into being.

The intentions of the present Government, so far as may be judged, appear to be in the direction of maintaining this arrangement, but everything will depend on the nature of the fresh agreement to be concluded. I sincerely trust that H.M. Government are alive to the necessity of guarding and consolidating British interests in that region. The importance of keeping Irak open and secure for British commerce and industry cannot be sufficiently emphasised.

Trade in that country during the year has been far from brisk. Owing to the strained relations between Irak and Persia there has been practically no business doing between the two countries. This has seriously affected the imports of piece-goods, North Persia having taken much larger quantities direct instead of obtaining her requirements mainly through Irak as heretofore. A satisfactory feature is the increased exports of grain, amounting to £1,300,000, against £600,000 in the previous year, and the prospect of further expansion in this direction is considerably improved.

Without attempting to prophesy as to the future, I have no hesitation in saying that the outlook of improved trade generally in the East, and more particularly in India, is distinctly encouraging. Stocks in warehouses show satisfactory reductions. The accumulations in the "boom" years have been well distributed, leaving the market open for fresh business.

Another welcome feature is the financial position of India as revealed in the Budget for the fiscal year just closing. This, for the first time, after many successive years of deficits, showed a tangible surplus and relief in taxation. These factors should tend to a trade revival, and, given a continuance of the favourable monsoons, there should be every prospect of increased activity in imports from this side, which is much to be desired after four years of more or less stagnation.

In conclusion, I may say that your bank has never been in a better position than it is to-day for taking full advantage of any such revival when it comes.

The report and accounts were unanimously adopted, the dividend recommended was declared, the retiring directors were re-elected and the auditors reappointed, and the meeting closed with a cordial vote of thanks to the chairman.

NATIONAL BANK OF INDIA.

India's Favourable Trade Balance.

The ordinary general meeting of the National Bank of India, Ltd., was held at the Wesleyan Hall, Bishopsgate, London, E.C., on April 1, Sir Charles C. McLeod (the deputy chairman) presiding.

The General Manager (Mr. Nicoll) having read the notice convening the meeting and the report of the auditors,

The Chairman said: Gentlemen, the report of the directors and the accounts for the year ending December 31, 1923, have been before you for some days, and I presume we may, as usual, take them as read. Your chairman, Mr. Campbell, I am sorry to say, has not been able to come back, as we fondly expected, but he is able to give most valuable assistance in the conduct of the bank's affairs. He receives our daily telegrams, and is keenly interested in everything that goes on from day to day. I also regret to say that Mr. Robert Miller is to-day absent owing to illness.

We are glad again to be able to place before you results which we, and we trust you will, consider satisfactory, bearing in mind the times through which Eastern exchange banking has passed. Our net profit of £534,798 19s. 11d. is practically the same as a year ago. Adding the sum brought forward of £155,289 18s. 1d., the total amount available for disposal amounts to £694,054 18s., which is about £5,000 less than a year ago, owing to the fact that we brought forward that amount less to 1923 compared with 1922. I may add that our figures are arrived at after making full provision for all bad and doubtful debts. We propose on this occasion to place £50,000 to credit of our reserve fund, raising it to the satisfactory total of £2,750,000, £25,000 to the officers' pension fund, and to write down house property account £20,000. We propose paying a further dividend at the rate of 20 per cent. free of income-tax, which together with the interim dividend absorbs £400,000, leaving £199,054 18s. to be carried forward.

Turning to the balance-sheet, on the liabilities side the items of current, fixed deposits and other accounts, bills payable and acceptances all show a moderate falling off compared with the previous year, but you will agree that the total of current and fixed deposits is a satisfactory one. On the assets side, our cash position remains strong, showing a total of £5,205,801, about the same as a year ago. Our holdings of Indian Government, British Government and other securities amount to the large total of £12,612,805, an increase on the previous year of nearly four millions. These securities, I may inform you, are all gilt-edged and mostly short dated and stand in our books at or under market value. Our bills of exchange, totalling £6,840,102, show a considerable shrinkage compared with the previous year, which reflects a smaller volume of bills passing through our hands (as you are probably aware, a good deal of the business is now done by means of telegraphic transfer, which does not involve bills of exchange). I would also point out that the reduction is further accounted for by the fact that a great part of our large holding of Indian and British Government Treasury Bills, held at December 31, 1922, and included in bills of exchange, has been converted into short-dated securities. This is reflected in the substantial increase in our holding of securities to which I have already referred. I may state that the Government of India discontinued the issue of Treasury Bills in the latter half of last year. Our total liquid assets, consisting of cash, securities and bills of exchange, amount to £24,657,000 against deposits of £31,254,516, which I feel sure you will agree indicates a position of great strength and liquidity. The only other figure to which I need refer is that of discounts, loans, etc., which show a reduction.

Last year your chairman gave you some interesting statistics about gold and silver movements and I am able to add the 1923 figures. The Indian imports and exports of gold and silver for the year 1923 were as follows:—

Gold imported in 1923	£26,228,898
Gold exported in 1923	90,488
Surplus of imports	£26,138,410

This is about one-third of the estimated world's production.

Silver imported in 1923	£15,620,535
Silver exported in 1923	2,306,149
Surplus of imports	£13,314,386

The surplus imports of both metals in 1923 were therefore over £39,000,000, as against about £30,000,000 in 1922. Furthermore, between November and February last, a portion of the bazaar demand was met by sales of gold by the Government of India out of the currency reserves to the extent of about £2,000,000. The price of gold continues to be based on American dollar exchange, the fluctuations of which have not been so wide as in previous years. The highest price for gold in 1923 was on November 19, namely 96s. 11d. per fine ounce, and the lowest 87s. 5d. on February 21. The highest price for silver was on December 18, namely, 33 11-16d., and the lowest 30½d. on February 8. During the current year (1924) the exports of gold to India amount to about £2,000,000 to the middle of March, and from South Africa to the same date they are estimated at about £1,000,000.

Our old friend the rupee continues to fluctuate. The year started with a rupee rate of 1s. 4 1-32d., and ended with the rate of 1s. 5¼d. The highest touched was 1s. 5 9-32d. on December 28, and the lowest touched was 1s. 3 29-32d. on August 22. The question of stability in exchange appears to be as far off as ever, but I am glad to note the sound attitude taken up by the present Finance Minister, Sir Basil Blackett, in addressing the Associated Chambers of Commerce of India and Ceylon in Bombay on December 4 last. He said: "The Government of India fully appreciate the immense advantages which would accrue from a stable exchange, not only to the trading community, but to the country as a whole. Whatever there may be to say against stabilisation, there can be nothing whatever to say against stability. Exchange fluctuations introduce into business an additional and extraneous risk, which leads almost inevitably to a diminution in the volume of trade. In business the breath of life is confidence; and what is required for confidence is certainty. In this matter of exchange, nothing short of certainty would be of any use. You require to know that, unless something happens which shakes the financial system of the country to its foundations, the currency in which trade debts are paid will have a value that can only vary within known and narrow limits."

The balance of trade in favour of India continues to expand, and with the exception of two months of the past year, February and October, when adverse balances were recorded, the increase has been considerable, showing a net total of just over 48 crores or, say, £33,600,000, as against last year's figures of Rs.11.35.00.000, or £7,600,000. This is a satisfactory feature, for it is an established fact that the greater the exports from India the more she will purchase from this side.

The monsoon has been, for the third year in succession, a favourable one, and increases are shown in cereals, jute, tea, and various other crops which have greatly helped to restore the balance of trade in India's favour. American cotton continues at a very high price, which militates against the export of Lancashire cotton goods. The following figures are of interest:—

Indian imports of merchandise.	Crores.
5 years' pre-war average	146
5 years' war average	148
1920	323
1923	227

Indian exports of merchandise.	Crores.
5 years' pre-war average	224
5 years' war average	224
1920	292

which latter figure constitutes a record export from that country in value.

The year 1923 opened with the Imperial Bank of India rate of discount at 7 per cent., which was further increased to 8 per cent. in the early part of that year. Our funds were in consequence well employed at remunerative rates at that time. The rate gradually came down to 4 per cent. in June and remained at that figure until November. Bank funds during that period were difficult to employ, but in December the demand for money became more active and a gradual advance to 9 per cent. was established, at which figure it now stands. The want of stability in exchange and the uncertainties of the market have made it somewhat difficult to employ London funds in India, but the Indian Government has met the market freely as regards Council Bills and home remittances and thereby afforded considerable relief in times of pressure.

Conditions in British East Africa have the appearance of becoming more favourable, and I am inclined to think we may see an improvement in that direction within the next few years. Cotton growing is expanding in Uganda, and with the proposed extension of the railway into the interior facilities for getting the cotton down to the shipping port (Mombasa) are calculated to stimulate the trade. The increase since 1904 is of a most encouraging nature. From Uganda the export figure was only 50 bales of 400 lbs. each in that year. Ten years later it had reached 21,000 bales. In 1923 the substantial figure of 92,642 bales of 400 lbs. each were exported, and 1924 is estimated to show a somewhat similar figure. It is to be hoped that the Government may at some early date see their way to reduce or totally abolish the very heavy export duty on cotton, which at 6 cents per pound represents a sum of £111,171. Coffee estates are coming into maturity and sisal exports are increasing. Maize shipments are also of importance, and generally speaking I am not without hope that conditions in that part of the world may show improvement.

In concluding my remarks I desire to place on record on behalf of my colleagues and myself a warm appreciation of the zeal and loyal work of our managers and staff at home and abroad during the past year. To them is due great credit in being able to produce what I trust you will consider a satisfactory result attained under rather difficult circumstances.

I beg to propose:—"That the report of the directors and statement of accounts for the year ended December 31, 1923, be received and adopted, and that a dividend for the six months to December 31, 1923, at the rate of 20 per cent. per annum be paid on the shares of the company registered at this date, the same to be payable, free of income-tax, on and after April 1, 1924."

Mr. R. Williamson seconded the resolution, which was carried unanimously.

Mr. F. Tomkinson said the report of the year's working was most satisfactory, and, on behalf of friends unable to be present and on his own behalf, he would like to thank the chairman for his most lucid and interesting speech. They always heard at the National Bank's general meetings information useful to them as shareholders and also to merchants and traders with the countries covered by the bank's activities. Inviting some comment from the chairman on the political situation in India, he said that people were getting nervous about India; they were disinclined to buy, and were selling securities. He did not share this feeling, but would like to hear the chairman's opinion on the subject. He pointed out that shareholders had a matter for congratulation in the fact that Government securities were of considerably more value now than at the date of the balance-sheet, the rise in the last few days of War Loan to 102§, to instance only one, and other Government securities were relatively higher.

The Chairman, in reply to Mr. Tomkinson's request for a statement on the political situation in India, said that he was afraid at a meeting of that nature it was not advisable to discuss the matter. Shareholders all read their daily papers, and were quite competent to form their own opinions. He was not without confidence that things would right themselves in time.

The retiring directors (Mr. Robert Williamson, Mr. Robert Miller, and Sir John P. Hewett) were re-elected, and the auditors were reappointed; the meeting then terminated with a cordial vote of thanks to the directors and staff both at home and abroad, which the chairman briefly acknowledged.

NATIONAL BANK OF EGYPT.

Increased Net Profit.

The twenty-fourth annual general meeting of the shareholders in the National Bank of Egypt was held on March 19 at the head office of the bank in Cairo.

Mr. B. Hornsby, C.B.E. (the Governor), presided.

The Governor said: Gentlemen,—You will see from the accounts in your hands that the gross profit for last year was £902,452, which is about £4,000 less than in 1922. On the other hand, expenses are down by £29,000, so that the net profit of £527,687 is about £25,000 more. We propose to place £75,000 to special reserve as against £50,000 a year ago, and to distribute the same dividend of 15 per cent., requiring £450,000. The balance of £2,600 will be added to the carry forward, which will then amount to £185,000.

The total of our balance-sheet is £5,500,000 greater than in 1922, due in part to an increase in the amount of the Egyptian Government's balance, and partly to an increase in deposits of the public.

These increases are reflected on the other side of the accounts by a larger holding of Government securities, of which a considerable part consists of short-term bonds. These bonds can be readily liquidated in case of need, and do not involve that risk of depreciation inherent to longer-dated securities. Our whole holding of Government securities appears in our books at a figure considerably lower than their market value, and we have thus a valuable reserve against the future.

The total of our advances does not show much variation. As usual, our accounts have been carefully examined, and full provision has been made wherever there appeared to be the slightest necessity for doing so.

Our holding of foreign bills, which, almost without exception, represent exports of cotton, is again larger than the preceding year, due in part to the higher price of cotton, and also to an expansion of our business in Alexandria.

Ex-Enemy Debts.

As we stated last year, we were obliged to institute legal proceedings for the recovery of the sums due to us in Germany and Austria, before the Mixed Arbitral Tribunals constituted in virtue of the Peace Treaties. In one case we arrived at a settlement by compromise; in another case we obtained a favourable judgment from the Anglo-Austrian Mixed Arbitral Tribunal, and the amount of our claim has been settled since the date of our balance-sheet. In the third, and most important, case our German debtors contested the competence of the Anglo-German Mixed Arbitral Tribunal, and a preliminary hearing on that point took place in London last December, but so far judgment has not been given. These long delays are very annoying, but they are due to causes entirely beyond our control. No effort has been lacking on our part to bring matters to a speedier conclusion.

The note issue has shown the usual seasonal movement. At the beginning of 1923 the issue stood at £E33,200,000, falling gradually to its lower point of £E24,000,000 during the month of August. During the months of September and October the needs for financing a larger crop and at higher prices caused a rapid expansion, the highest point of £E38,700,000 being reached early in December.

The following figures show the maximum and minimum points of the issue during the last five years; this period still includes the two abnormal years which followed the war, but the last three years show a comparatively steady movement:—

Year.	Highest.	Lowest.
1919	£E68,200,000	£E39,900,000
1920	66,000,000	39,400,000
1921	39,900,000	30,400,000
1922	37,300,000	26,300, 00
1923	38,700,000	24,000,000

The cotton crop of the season 1922-23 was disappointing as regards both quality and price. Nevertheless, it is satisfactory to find, as the statistics show, that the year showed a favourable trade balance of just over £E9,000,000, and in view of the larger crop this season and the better prices which have ruled, it may be expected that the current year will show even more favourable results.

After giving the figures of the imports and exports for the last five years, the Governor continued:—The steady influx of securities from abroad to which I made allusion a year ago has continued during the last twelve months. Judging from our own experience, these securities are not purchased with borrowed money, and they therefore indicate a real increase in the country's wealth. The steady growth of our deposits confirms this indication, and we can safely say that the financial and economic situation of Egypt compares very favourably with that of any other country.

The Sudan.

The following table gives the annual figures of the exports and imports of the Sudan from 1919 to 1923:—

Year.	Imports.	Exports.
1919	£E4,805,745	£E3,029,569
1920	7,006,865	5,075,971
1921	5,806,070	2,318,533
1922	4,252,890	2,298,770
1923	4,669,004	2,758,425

The increase in the exports this year is due entirely to increased trade; that of imports is largely due to the resumption of work on the Sennar Dam, which had been suspended, and to the commencement of the work for linking up Kassala by rail with Port-Sudan. The completion of these two schemes, which should take place in 1925, will give a new impulse to the country from which all classes will profit.

The directors retiring this year are Mr. M. Salvago and Sir Joseph Saba Pacha, who offer themselves for re-election.

The board desire to thank the sub-governors, the managers and the staff for the services they have rendered during the year.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The Lausanne Treaty.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald brought a considerable amount of common sense to bear upon the debate in the House of Commons on the ratification of the Lausanne Treaty. There had been much criticism of the Treaty, he said, but there had been no indication as to what the opponents of ratification proposed to do in the event of the Treaty's not being ratified. A fresh peace conference was out of the question, and non-ratification would entail the perpetuation of a perfectly intolerable situation in the Near and Middle East. On the other hand, although conscious of the weak spots in the Treaty, for which his Government had had no responsibility, the Prime Minister was satisfied that the Treaty could be made the basis of a good understanding, a working understanding between Turkey and Great Britain. Future relations between the two countries, he very wisely realised, depended not so much on the letter of the written agreement as on the spirit actuating both nations. For this reason he would favour an attitude of complete candour towards Turkey, which he summed up in the following words that he imagined we might address to the Turks: "Work this Treaty like gentlemen, and we will meet you; we will help you; we will counsel you; but remember always that the one way by which you are going to be accepted by every European nation as a nation with which co-operation is possible is that you do not abuse your powers, that every promise you give us will be carried out, that every authority you have got by those provisions will be exercised discreetly, and we now promise to observe to you precisely the same standard of conduct." When the day of the Angora extremists has passed it should not be difficult to reach such a stage of mutual confidence. In spite of certain exceptions there is a very general readiness in Great Britain to recognise that the old Turkey is dead and a willingness to adopt complete impartiality while the new Turkey is trying to find herself. The main obstacle to a good understanding is the difficulty experienced by the Turks themselves in realising that their suspicions of Great Britain have absolutely no foundation in fact.

Objections to the Treaty.

Opposition to the Lausanne Treaty has concentrated on the Straits Convention, the abolition of the Capitulations, and the measure of protection afforded to non-Moslem minorities in Turkey. It may be doubted whether any argument can be addressed on any of these points that was not pressed as far as it possibly could be by Lord Curzon at Lausanne. The reason why the latter could not do much of what he tried to do, Mr. MacDonald reminded the House of Commons, was that a policy had been launched and carried to an end which deprived him of the power that the Allies had in Paris when they were treating with the Turks before. It is quite true, as Mr. Fisher pointed out, that the British community in Turkey has been left to the tender mercies of the Ottoman Courts and Ottoman law; but it has yet to be proved that, in the long run, when existing bitternesses have passed, this community will fare worse than its fellow countrymen have in other countries which have taken over the unrestricted management of their own affairs.

The Straits Guarantee.

The only amendment moved last week to the Treaty Bill was one which purported, in the interests of the Dominions and India, to make a bogey of the guarantee given by France, Great Britain, Italy, and Japan in connection with the demilitarised zones on both sides of the Straits. The Powers in question pledge themselves that, acting in conjunction in the event of the freedom of navigation of the Straits or the security of the demilitarised zones being imperilled by others, they "will meet such violation, attack, or other act of war or threat of war, by all the means that the Council of the League of Nations may decide for this purpose." It was sought to prove that this might be a serious commitment for the British Empire, which ought not to be incurred until all the Dominions and India had definitely accepted it. Even if Mr. MacDonald had not been able to point out that acceptances had been notified by all concerned, that of Canada alone being in any way qualified, it would be difficult to see how Great Britain's share in the guarantee, limited, at the worst, to a quarter, or, rather, with Turkey involved, to one-fifth, of the effort required to bring the defaulting nation to book, would gravely prejudice the Empire. Such support as was given to the amendment was concerned with the risk attaching to general guarantees directly involving the country in war, and failed to show that Article 18 of the Straits Convention committed this country to anything more than did membership of the League of Nations.

The Vienna Conference.

The Russo-Roumanian Conference at Vienna has been broken off because the two parties could come to no agreement in regard to the question of Bessarabia. A number of outstanding questions, economic and political, affecting Russia and Roumania, called for settlement; but when the delegates met it was found that the Russians were as resolved to have the Bessarabian question discussed as the Roumanians were to keep it off the agenda. The Russian view was that Bessarabia had been forcibly annexed by Roumania, and that the Soviet Government could not recognise the present status of the province until it had been shown that the inhabitants desired incorporation with Roumania. To settle this point, the Russians demanded that an impartial plebiscite should be held. As the Roumanian delegates would not consent to this proposal, they found themselves compelled to break off the negotiations, and they returned to Roumania. The controversy is one that concerns only the two countries involved, as it is unlikely that Soviet Russia will seek to challenge by force of arms the present status of Bessarabia. Its object in urging a plebiscite is clear; by such means it will "save its face," as it will make a virtue of necessity in accepting the expression of the people's will instead of acquiescing in forcible occupation by a weaker State. It is for the Roumanians to decide whether they will humour the Russians to this extent, or whether they prefer to have a permanently estranged Russia as a neighbour, with a number of unsettled questions as a constant source of friction between the two countries.

A Bucharest Outbreak.

A regrettable incident, the importance of which, no doubt, can easily be exaggerated, but which is calculated to injure Roumania's reputation abroad, is reported to have occurred in Bucharest on March 29. On that day a number of students were being tried in connection with an attempt to kill a Jewish newspaper editor, and with an alleged plot against a number of prominent Roumanians. At the same time, an economic conference was being held on the currency question, and the appearance before this conference of a prominent banker seems to have given umbrage to a group of University students, who started an anti-Jewish demonstration. The trouble spread from the conference hall to the streets, where a certain amount of Jew-baiting was indulged in, and the windows of Jewish business houses were broken. The students on trial were subsequently acquitted. One of the charges against the Jews is that they became rich during the War by helping the German invaders, with the result that 75 per cent.—or so it is alleged—of the students in Roumanian universities are Jews, although the Jews comprise only one-tenth of the population; it is held that they are opposed to the Nationalist movement, and that they may ultimately dominate the country. There must be many Roumanians who are well aware that the best way for the country to rise superior to its difficulties in this connection is for the remaining nine-tenths of the population to apply themselves with as much seriousness as do the Jews in their various walks in life, schools and universities included, rather than to seek a solution—where it will never be found—in street rioting. Roumania's problem is on a par with that of Turkey and her non-Moslem minorities; but Europe has a right to expect a more statesmanlike settlement from Bucharest than from Angora.

Islam and a Republic.

A curious volte face on the part of the Sardar Sipah prevented Persia from becoming a republic at the moment when the country seemed irrevocably launched on precisely the same path as that which Turkey had traversed a few months before. Riza Khan himself was reported to want a republic; there had been the familiar Press campaign in favour of the proposal, with the inevitable attacks on the Dynasty; the Mejliss seemed to be only waiting for the day when it would be called upon to proclaim the Republic. At this point the ecclesiastical authorities in Persia asserted themselves, demonstrations were started against the proposed change, and the subject was hurriedly dropped. The Prime Minister even went further still. After consultation with the Ulema, he issued a proclamation that the establishment of a republic in Persia would be contrary to the Moslem religion, and all further mention of the subject was prohibited. Now comes the report of the Sardar Sipah's resignation, but at the moment of going to press the information available is too meagre to enable any judgment to be formed on what is happening in Persia. In an article on the Turkish Khalifate, in this issue, Mr. Thomas Lyell advances the contention that the course of events in Turkey is equivalent to the suppression of the Moslem religion in that country, or, at least, to its abandonment by the Turks who now control the destinies of the Republic. His point that, owing to the Koran a modernistic Islam is a contradiction in terms, seems to find support from the Shiah Ulema of Persia, and it will be of interest to see whether the Moslem Congress summoned by the Egyptian ecclesiastical authorities for March, 1925, will approach this question with a view to creating for Islam the elasticity required to substantiate the claim of those who regard it as one of the greatest moral and spiritual forces for the modern world.

A Question of Passports.

The vexed question of the issue or withholding of passports has cropped up in India in regard to the application of Mohamed Ali and Shaukat Ali for passports to proceed to Turkey in connection with the subject of the future of the Khalifate. Here we have two men openly hostile to the India Government devoting their lives to challenging its authority and legitimacy, yet claiming its protection in the face of the outside world. It is not unnatural that the Government should feel tempted to refuse the request. By means of a passport a country or Government throws its protecting mantle over one of its nationals and calls upon all other countries to respect its interest in the holder. The anomaly of the Ali brothers being armed with such documents requires no emphasis. A passport, however, has also come to be in effect little more than a form of authorisation for leaving a country, in so far as it is not possible to leave one's native land for a foreign country without being in possession of one. We may suppose that the Ali brothers are less concerned with the measure of protection that the India Government may afford them in Turkey than they are anxious to leave India for the journey to Turkey. Their capacity for harm is probably as great or as little in one country as in the other, whether present or absent, and in these circumstances it may be doubtful whether any advantage is gained by allowing them to pose as martyrs in connection with their Khalifate campaign, which must have gone a long way towards wrecking their reputation with even the most credulous of their deluded followers. From what is known of the Turks' opinion of their Indian fellow Moslems we should be tempted to hope that the Ali brothers will not only go to Angora but will also be compelled to stay there for a year or two, to the lasting benefit of Turkey, India, and Great Britain.

The Week in India.

The end of the legislative session at Delhi has been followed by the usual lull, and during the past week the cable has brought us no important news. The position in India continues, however, to be the subject of a fair amount of comment in this country, nearly all of it grave in tone, and some of it so pessimistic that one turns with relief to the reports of the meetings of the exchange banks, where, happily, pessimism is at present out of fashion. A sound balance-sheet is, of course, a good excuse for cheerfulness, but to produce one requires an accurate appreciation of existing conditions and probable changes in the near future, and it is from this standpoint that we consider the views of the directorates to be worthy of attention, more so than much of what attains prominence or even notoriety in the Press. It is particularly cheering to read the appreciation of the position offered by the chairman of the Chartered Bank, to the effect that the existing political difficulties must worry the Government, but need not alarm the shareholders. This attitude of hopeful steadiness is, in our opinion, one which may be adopted with advantage by those of our readers who have to look at Indian problems from the outside.

Pessimism and Progress.

The fact is that India is in greater danger from her own inbred pessimism than from any other single cause. Reading the debates in the various legislatures, or glancing over the files of any of the prominent journals, one is almost tempted to conclude that the true division of parties is between the men who think that things are as bad as possible and those who hold that any change must be for the worse. The practical result of the prevalent mental attitude is to render progress almost impossible, because each concrete proposal for improvement is promptly smothered under a mass of hypothetical objections, minimising the real advantages, and blighting the prospect with swarms of "Gorgons, and Hydras, and Chimeras dire"—the products of a too prolific imagination. What Delhi really needs is a breeze from the cheerful atmosphere of Canberra or Ottawa to dispel the gloom cast by the shadows of a long unhappy past. Englishmen resident in India are too apt to yield to the predominant influences, and it is all the more important that the rest of the Empire should contribute to the solution of Indian problems a steady stream of the cautious, constructive optimism which, as a matter of experience, is effective in getting things done.

Agrarian Reform.

An illustration of the truth on which we are insisting comes aptly from the Punjab. For years agrarian reformers in India have urged the vital importance of reducing what is called the 'fragmentation" of the land—that is to say, its distribution into an immense number of microscopic plots, too small to be cultivated effectively. No one has denied the existence of the evil, but as soon as anyone proposed to attack it the entire forces of pessimism were mustered to prove that nothing could be done. Law and religion, social prejudices and economic conditions, all were invoked, until most of the reformers seemed to be tired out. Now Mr. Calvert, working in the Punjab, where the evil is exceptionally great, has ventured to make a beginning, and, relying only on the peasants' business sense, has reorganised some villages into effective agricultural units, giving each cultivator a compact farm in place of patches scattered all over the map. It is a beginning only, but it may mean the beginning of a new economic era for the North of India, and it shows how the West can most effectively help the East by practising the gospel of hope, courage, and experiment.

The Lee Commission.

Lord Lee of Fareham has accomplished the tour de force which he determined to effect, and the Royal Commission on the Indian Services has agreed finally on its report within six months of its first meeting in India. The cabled news that the report is unanimous is just a little surprising, for there has been persistent rumour of more or less serious divergence: prima facie the news is satisfactory, but until the report is published some uncertainty must remain on the question whether agreement has been reached without slurring over difficulties which must ultimately be decided. On the assumption that this danger has been avoided, the important thing now is that the recommendations should be translated into action with the least possible delay. The questions at issue are in essence purely administrative, and their transfer to the field of politics has produced deplorable results. It would be too much to hope that the evil can be immediately eradicated, but our point is that it is growing worse all the time, and must continue to do so until the recommendations have been turned into rules, and the rules are actually being applied in practice. Then perhaps it would be possible for the elimination of political considerations to begin.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Tuesday Morning.

The Rents Bill.

The Government is floundering badly over its new Rents Bill, the object of which is to prevent the eviction of unemployed from their houses, and the Labour Party is in a fair way to being split on the question. At first the proposal, which was supported by all the Clydeside extremists, was simply to rob the landlord of his rent, but the obvious injustice of this, together with the demonstrated fact that many of the landlords who would be hit by such a measure are in possession of very small incomes, brought the Liberals swirling to the Conservatives' side. Then Mr. Clynes proposed to put the charge on the local authorities—which in effect implied the creation of a few more Poplars. Finally, they have sought to put the whole onus on the State.

This matter of evicted unemployed concerns Scotland more than England, and the Scottish adherents of the Labour Party are fervently in favour of challenging the nation on the question. Certain defeat lies that way, and it is not clear at the moment how the Government is to prevent its tail from swinging the whole body round and, perhaps, over. It is a real division and a real test, for this Rents Bill is the first attempt to introduce what is undoubtedly partisan legislation. No doubt, because neither the Liberals nor the Conservatives seem ready to take office, the Government will get through the crisis somehow, but they are already considerably discredited by the affair.

Labour and the Army.

The Rents Bill, however, was not the only thing in the last week which showed how out of touch with reality a by no means negligible part of the Labour Party is, for in a discussion on discipline in the Army—a discussion which went on far into the weary dawn—some of the leading Socialist lights showed how difficult must be the task of Mr. Ramsay MacDonald in keeping his flock together. When a Government official in the Ministry for War speaks of "seconded" and "Commandant" as words whose accents are on the first and second syllables respectively, one can scarcely hope for much enlightenment on Army topics. Last Thursday many of the Premier's followers wished to abolish the death penalty from the Army. Few of them have any right to talk of the Army in conditions of war, and in conditions of peace they could point to no abuses.

Another bright suggestion (which really made one wonder whether one was awake or dreaming) was that a recruit on enlistment should be given the option to decide whether or not he would be willing to take duty in aid of the civil power in connection with a trade dispute. It is by such manifestly ridiculous measures as these that the Socialist would seek to mix up politics with the Army. The fact that sixty-seven men voted for this suggestion is some indication of the pass to which we have now come.

The Wembley Strike.

Discontent hung heavily in the air last week, and even touched the head of the Empire Exhibition at Wembley with its clammy hand. An unofficial strike there on the part of the builders provided, until its inevitable collapse, intense excitement, particularly with those who have maintained that the Exhibition would be opened on April 23, and with those who denied that this was possible.

The Press took up the matter with all the gusto at its command, and for a day or two we were regaled with pictures, verbal and photographic, of the intimidated fellows of the strikers, although, to judge by the Press reports, one would think that the only other people at Wembley besides the strikers were the girl artists.

The Boat Race.

Every year one declares that never again will one trust the opinion of the racing experts, but every year one invariably reads what they have to say, and, incidentally, forms one's own estimate from them. But even the wisest of us, who knows to a nicety what to discount in the writings of the rowing experts, must have been staggered by the way Cambridge beat Oxford on Saturday. One reads after the race that there were people who thought that Cambridge would win, but certainly one never met them beforehand.

For Cambridge to get within twelve seconds of Oxford's 1911 record, and that without being pressed by Oxford, shows how pitifully inadequate and indeed misleading were all the written accounts of the two crews' possibilities. Since Cambridge had but one old Blue, their chances of winning again next year must be very good. Their tails have been right up since the War.

Spring Weather.

Only the historian should write about the English weather, for any words concerning anything else than past weather are extremely unreliable. Nobody knows what is coming next; it may be sunshine, it may be snow. Last week, after suffering for five whole days and nights the most discomforting easterly winds (which the more ruggedly faithful among us attributed to Berlin, and then, when they still persisted, to Moscow), we had a perfectly spring-like week-end, with sun and balminess in abundance. The harrowed fields are now a joy to behold, the smell of the meadows gives heady delight, and, above all, are the larks singing like mad. In a few days, however, it may be sleeting. No wonder we are a nation of opportunists. There is no month like April for "moments after."

Waterloo Bridge.

Far more than over Singapore are the experts at variance over the proposed widening of Waterloo Bridge. This very beautiful structure, to whose loveliness even the Londoner is not insensitive, has for some time past been in need of repair. Not only is its masonry showing cracks, but it sags in the middle just where most bridges rise.

The argument has been very fierce. All sorts of eminent men, some of them architects, some of them literary men, some of them politicians, have rushed into the fray. Wordsworth and his "Earth has not anything to show more fair" have been flung hard in the face of the utilitarians, and the struggle between the æsthetics and the practicals is waging terrifically. If other bridges are built, and Waterloo Bridge is repaired but retained in its present proportions, all will be well; but if Waterloo Bridge is altered and other structures (sure to be not half as beautiful) usurp its place, the literary outcry may last into the next generation.

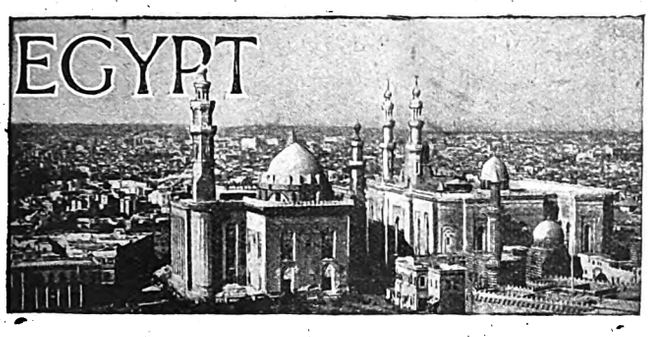
The Near and Middle East.*

From Our Own Correspondents.



Cairo, March 30.

The First Important Debate.

The Chamber of Deputies had its first big day yesterday, when the committee appointed to draft the reply to the Speech from the Throne presented the result of its labours. It had previously become known that three members of the committee of fifteen had been in a minority in wishing to have the speech amended so as to make the reference to Egypt's claims in the Sudan more explicit. Notice, too, had been given by Mohammed Pasha Sidky, a Zaghloulist Deputy from Upper Egypt, of his intention to move such an amendment in the House. It was known, furthermore, that, at a recent meeting in Mohammed Pasha's house, he had obtained the support of a score or so of members, representative of all parties, to his amendment. On the strength of these facts has been built up a story about the Government's being in a critical position in the Chamber, and exposed to risk of defeat on the first occasion when the Sudan should be the subject under discussion. But, as was pointed out in this correspondence last week, there never was any real risk for the Ministry, and this was abundantly shown by what happened yesterday evening. After the committee had reported the result of its labours, Mohammed Pasha Sidky moved his amendment, and was supported by two other speakers. There seemed, too, to be evidence of support by a number of Deputies for the views being put forward. But, when Zaghloul Pasha rose to wind up the debate, everything else faded out of significance, and it was evident that he was swaying with him the whole house just as effectively as he has always swayed his audiences. In the end, when it came to the voting, Sidky Pasha and most of his supporters slipped out of the Chamber just before the President put the vote, leaving only three plucky stalwarts to answer the President's invitation that the "Noes" should stand up. It was all just one more wonderful tribute to the power of Zaghloul Pasha's oratory and personality. Though old, and, yesterday, looking very tired and rather sick, his voice had its old ring, and, to judge by results, all its ancient power. The more one sees of the man the more is one forced to confess the amazing power of his personality.

Egypt and Islam.

Probably the most interesting point in connection with the decision by Egyptian ulema to hold an Islamic Congress in Cairo next year is that it constitutes another step along the road which the local Moslem world is treading, or hopes that it is treading, towards making Egypt the centre of the Mohammedan faith. For years past—and especially since, soon after the Armistice and the Allied occupation of Constantinople, it became evident that the Turkish Khalifate had been shorn for ever of much of its prestige, and that Constantinople must, as a religious centre, lose much too—the leading Moslem divines of this country have cherished the ambition to make of Cairo the centre towards which the eyes of the faithful shall turn. There is much to be said for the scheme. Cairo's geographical position, more central to the Arabic-speaking world, if not to the whole of Islam, than that of any other large city; its size and importance; the fact that it was once the seat of the Khalifate, and, perhaps, most important of all, the presence of Al Azhar University, a real centre of Islamic culture and learning, whose influence radiates through every Mohammedan country, furnish ample support to the claim being put forward in its behalf. The old objection that, politically, Egypt was under the control of a foreign Christian Power has now almost entirely disappeared. All the circumstances, therefore, were favourable to the move which the ulema have just made. What will be the practical result of their decision to hold next year's conference remains to be seen; but it seems fairly safe to predict that, if the idea ever comes to realisation, the gathering will be nothing like so representative as its promoters hope. Despite the fact that the resolution to hold the congress was followed up by the appointment of a permanent secretariat, to make propaganda throughout the Mohammedan world in favour of the conference scheme, it seems at least doubtful that, by next March, Islam will have so far composed its present differences that existing rivalries will have been composed sufficiently to allow of a really pan-Islamic congress being held. In the first place, there will, naturally, be no representation of the Shiah section of Islam. Then, again, it is certain that the Moslems of Arabia will be hardly represented at all, for it is inconceivable that King Hussein will wish to send delegates to discuss the proper guardianship of an office which he already claims to hold. Nor would the Wahabis of Nejd, or the Zeidis of Yemen care to send their emissaries to Cairo. Syria and Palestine seem to have endorsed King Hussein's claims to the Khalifate, and although, by next year, it will probably be easy to find delegates who will come to Cairo claiming to represent Syrian and Palestinian Moslems, the mandates of these Deputies will probably not be very clear. Irak, from the point of view of the congress promoters, seems likely to be no more encouraging, while the attitude of Morocco and the rest of the North African Moslem countries is, at the moment, doubtful. There are, therefore, great difficulties in the way of holding this conference, which, even if it materialises, is likely to give rise to considerable differences of opinion among those attending it. The odds, at the moment, are against its ever materialising. But, even so, the Egyptian religious chiefs have undoubtedly made an astute move. In taking the initiative with the conference proposal, they have asserted the leadership of Egypt in matters Mohammedan, and thus done much to help forward their ideal of Egypt as the leading and central country of Islam.

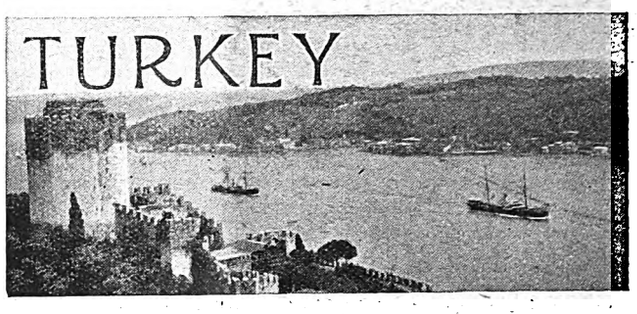
Harrying the Communists.

The Government's hunt for Communists goes on, and during the past week several new arrests have been made, including one of a resident in a distant part of Upper Egypt. Exactly what has been discovered has not been made public, but, presumably, it is something of importance, for otherwise it would be hard to understand the Government's action. An example of the arrests is that of a young man named Goldenberg, the secretary of a shop-workers' organisation in the capital. He was taken from his bed in the middle of the night to gaol, where he has been ever since (his arrest occurred a fortnight ago), without any charge being brought against him, but subjected to continual interrogations. A brief statement has been issued by the Public Security Department with regard to these arrests, saying that, although nothing definite has been discovered against the persons who are at present in confinement, there are sufficient "moral presumptions" to justify the steps which have been taken. These steps, it may be observed, are based on Law No. 37 of 1923, a most reactionary enactment which the Yehia Ministry passed shortly before the end of the year. It is a law which, designed to ensure the stability of the State, can be read to mean that it is a crime for anyone to hold advanced political views. Such an interpretation appears to have been made in the present instance. The more the foreign community here sees of the use which Egyptian authority can and does make of wide powers over Egyptian subjects, the more does the conviction grow that Egypt without the Capitulations would certainly, at the present time, and probably for many more years to come, be no very comfortable land for a foreigner to live in.



Constantinople, March 31.

The Opposition to the Government.

The explanation of the political thunderstorm which I gave last week has turned out to be the correct one, and it may be worth while to revert to the question of the position and power of Ismet Pasha and Mustapha Kemal Pasha in the new Turkey in order to clear away any misunderstandings concerning the real state of affairs in Turkey that may exist in the minds of Europeans who are accustomed to think in terms of constitutions.

The practically unanimous bloc of straight-voting satellites of the People's Party which constitutes the National Assembly has been gradually disintegrating itself by the temporary defection of ephemeral groups, which owe their short-lived existence to a variety of causes and incidents, often trivial and not uncommonly purely personal. What strikes the looker-on is that the various storms that have arisen can by no stretch of the imagination ever be attributed to a conflict of principles between the Government and the malcontents of the moment. It also strikes him, as a corollary to the above, that the malcontents have never been guilty of producing a positive constructive alternative to the Government's proposals to which they appear to take exception.

It did appear, however, a week or two ago, when the crisis about Article 25 of the Constitutional Charter was forming, that the hitherto submissive caucus was up in arms and boiling with righteous indignation at the proposal to whittle down the inalienable rights of the Anointed of the People. The solution of the incident has shown that this estimate of the situation was wrong, for, after Ismet Pasha had treated the deputies to a long burst of oratory on every phase of the Government's policy except the constitutional question in dispute, and after he bluntly told them that he would not submit to their dictation and dismiss the three or four Ministers whose faces they seemed to dislike, they took it in turns to rush up to the tribune to disavow in the strongest terms what they have been saying and writing for the last fortnight and then voting unanimously for the continuance in power of Ismet with any collaborators he may like, and letting it be known that a new text of the offending Article 25, which will, after all, give the President the right of veto, will, when put to the vote, receive the support of the mighty party organisation which refused to look at it last week.

The Angora Autocracy.

The conclusion to be drawn from this episode is obvious; if the soiled trappings of ultra-democracy are stripped off, one sees underneath the purest autocracy exercised by a very small clique of strong men. Whether the autocrats are governing well or badly is not the point; they are governing. Whether a democracy in Turkey would do better or worse than its present governors is also not the point, because, as far as one is able to read the signs of the times, there is not the slightest chance of a real democracy in the accepted sense of the term ever constituting itself in our time. Apart from a few verbal and formal differences, one cannot detect the much-vaunted evolution from the execrated serfdom of the Imperial régime to the democratic freedom of the Republic. Under both régimes there is a practically irresponsible executive whose devoted and equally irresponsible agents are first a well-disciplined, unintelligent army which gets its pay and is therefore to be relied upon to serve the masters who provide the pay; and, secondly, an ill-disciplined, equally unintelligent bureaucracy which does not always get its pay through official channels. The army does not differ from the old army, except that it is probably rather more efficient; the bureaucracy does not differ from the old bureaucracy except that it is undoubtedly very much less efficient, which does not prevent it from being just as autocratic towards its new masters—the public—as it ever was under the most autocratic of the sultans.

The Octroi of Constantinople.

Another example of the complete disregard of the constituted authorities for the opinion of the public is the attitude of the municipal councillors of Constantinople to the chorus of protest about the octroi. Notwithstanding the unanimity of the outcry and the high standing of the protesters, the council has not deigned to take the faintest notice of the matter, but has simply proceeded to carry out its pre-arranged scheme. Its action may be due to inability to read the signs of the times or to a truer perception of the real value of the clamour than is possessed by the European, who may be excused for thinking that the people, if pressed too far, will turn in its wrath from words to deeds.

Municipal Prospects.

One cannot, however, gloss over the fact that whatever statistics are available serve to prove not only the absolute reduction of the trade of this port to less than 50 per cent. of pre-War figures, but also the relative reduction of the proportion of the whole of the Turkish trade which was previously claimed by Constantinople. Nevertheless the population of the town remains as large as ever; the reductions that have taken place have affected almost entirely the non-Turk communities whose members have gone to other countries and there used their energy and enterprise to good purpose under more favourable conditions. What increase of population there has been has affected almost entirely the Moslem element, and it is the Moslems more than any other section of the populace who are struggling in hopeless penury and steadily spending what little savings they have. The prospect is a black one, although the results of spasmodic efforts at modernising the town are apt to create a temporary unjustifiable optimism. The fire brigade has been reorganised and equipped with motor engines and accessories; attempts are being made to repair the streets; street lighting has been considerably extended; the municipal slaughter-houses are working satisfactorily, and the distribution of meat is carried out in a comparatively hygienic manner. All this is admittedly to the good, but until fundamental changes are made in the administration of the country and of this town it is a forlorn hope to expect that the tide of emigration of the most capable elements of this population will be stemmed.

General News.

While on this subject it may be well to note one or two further facts which serve to lend more colour to these rather lugubrious prophecies. A Bill is now being introduced into the Assembly to declare the territory east of the line running roughly from Adana to Samsoun as forbidden to Armenians in order to dispose once for all of the question of an Armenian National Home. The arrangements for supplying the new Moslem immigrants with seed grain are limping badly; a cargo just arrived from Roumania is held up here for an indefinite period because, owing to a shortage of coal, the Anatolian railway has been forced to suspend its service of goods trains to the Eskishehir region. The Constantinople branch of the Ministry of Commerce refused to accept the other day a commercial document attested by the signature and seal of the Turkish Consul in Paris on the ground that it did not recognise the seal, and required that it should be sent to the Ministry of Angora for approval. A Turkish court of law recently delivered a judgment in favour of a Turkish claimant who claimed from an insurance company the reimbursement of the premium he had paid to cover the risk of loss or damage of goods travelling from Europe to Constantinople, on the ground that the goods had turned up safe and sound and corresponded exactly with the invoice!

Teheran, March 15.

The Mejliss.

Parliament met last Thursday for the first time since it was reopened, and proceeded with the examination of the Deputies' credentials. This is usually a long business, but the present Mejliss seems to be wasting no time and to be determined to expedite matters as much as possible in this direction, as the nominations of thirty-five Deputies were approved and passed the first day. The majority party will be the newly formed Reform Party, with some forty-six members of the ninety-five at present in the capital. The first number of the official organ of this party, the Tajaddod, appeared on Thursday, and will be issued during the present session of the Mejliss. As its name implies, the party is in favour of reforms in the administration of the country's affairs, and, judging from the views of most of its constituents, the question of a change in the régime of the country from the present monarchy to a republic would appear to be prominent in its programme. With the support of this party, the Prime Minister should encounter no difficulty in carrying out the many reforms on which he has set his heart.

A Republic?

This question of the change to a republican form of government is daily attracting more and more attention, not only in the capital, but also in the provinces, to which the movement has quickly spread, judging from the numerous telegrams received here every day from political and other parties all over the country demanding the Shah's abdication and clamouring for a republic. Here in Teheran public meetings have been organised during the last few days, one in the Artillery Square and another in the Sepah Salar Mosque. The former does not appear to have been so harmonious as the Republicans wished, and, in fact, the part of the crowd loyal to the Shah seem to have very successfully prevented the orators of the opposite party from delivering their speeches! The movement, although, as I have said, it appears to be spreading, can hardly yet be called a popular one, and it is only natural that to the average Persian who has been accustomed to acknowledge, until the last few years, the absolute sway of the "King of Kings," the idea of such a radical change, which has been so suddenly and unexpectedly sprung upon him, requires a good deal of consideration, and is not to be decided hurriedly, which appears to be what the Press desire to do. One of the leading papers here, the Setareh Iran, appeared the other day printed entirely in red, which, it states, it will continue to do until Norooz, in order to encourage and foster the idea of a Republic! Doubtless a hint from the Bolshevists, who are naturally watching the movement with much interest, and would welcome the change in régime, has had something to do with the paper's praiseworthy motive.

Executions in Luristan.

A few days ago an official telegram from Khoramabad, the capital of Luristan, reported the execution of three chiefs of the tribe of Biranvand, one of the most important of the Lur tribes, and twelve minor chieftains, by order of the Commander of the Western Army, some being shot and others hanged, in accordance with the sentence passed on them by the court-martial. These chiefs were among those captured by the Government forces in their recent successful campaign against the Lurs, who have always defied the Central Government, and the fact that they have now been made to pay the extreme penalty for their defiance should go far towards the subduing and disarming of all the tribes, and the subsequent restoration and maintenance of tranquillity and security throughout the country, by which the Minister of War rightly sets so much store with a view to the future development of Persia.

General News.

The British Minister, Sir Percy Loraine, left last week on six months' leave of absence, and will be replaced by Mr. Esmond Ovey as Chargé d'Affaires. Sir Percy is travelling by the Russian route, which appears to be quite practicable now, and is likely to be favoured by the majority of people going to Europe in future, as being much more direct and quicker than the alternative routes across the desert from Baghdad to Beyrouth or Damascus, by the Nairn or Eastern Transport Companies. In this connection, the representative of the latter company is at present in Teheran, endeavouring to obtain from the Persian Government the Concession for the road from the Mesopotamian frontier to Enzeli, thus linking up the Syrian ports with the Caspian.

The Japanese Mission, after three months' stay in Teheran, left here this morning, after paying official visits of farewell to the Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs. Some of the party proceed from here to Angora, and the rest return to Japan.

The Weather.

A good deal more rain has fallen here, and the past winter has been the wettest and dampest experienced for many years. Last week-end it rained incessantly for thirty hours, a very unusual rainfall for Teheran, and the mud roofs and walls, especially in the native quarters, suffered considerably in consequence. Reports from the provinces mention a similar state of affairs, resulting in serious damage to property, and in some cases loss of life, especially in the South. Even Resht has just experienced a snowfall of several inches, a most infrequent occurrence for that part of the country, lying as it does so many feet below the level of the sea. The great charm of the climate of Persia, practically throughout the country, has always been its extreme dryness, both in summer and winter, but this year the latter has belied its reputation, and we have missed many of those bright, crisp, sunny days we have been accustomed to, which make the winter climate of Teheran so delightful, and, in fact, these have been the exception rather than the rule. The winter, however, now seems to have passed, and with the approach of Norooz, the Persian New Year (March 21), spring has begun to set in. The Persians have most appropriately chosen this date for the celebration of their New Year festivities, and the feeling of spring in the air, the first appearance of the flowers and fruit blossom, and the fresh green of the leaves on the trees are, indeed, cause enough for rejoicing, after the cold winter weather and its attendant discomforts.

BYRON'S LAST DAYS.

"BYRON: THE LAST JOURNEY, 1823-1824." By Harold Nicolson. (London: Constable. 12s. 6d.)

Mr. Harold Nicolson, whose books on Verlaine, and more especially on Tennyson, will not soon be superseded, modestly claims that this examination by him of the last year of Byron's life may be useful when reconsiderations are made of the poet during the forthcoming centenary celebrations of his death, but his study will score much more than a merely practical purpose. For it is a literary narrative excellent in all respects, dispassionate but keen, tempered but moving, critical but illuminating. He has had access to unique sources, and he has personally visited the lands wherein the subject of his book during his last year lingered. And when to these advantages he adds his own nice judgment, the success of his new estimate may be taken for granted.

Byron has hitherto suffered a surfeit of hero-worship. His squalid death from malaria or typhoid at Missolonghi has been dramatised out of all recognition—it is extraordinary indeed that the cinema people have not already made a "story" out of it; and his tritest and worst verses on the virtues of the Greeks have been fondly lauded by some of our unquestioning Phil-Hellenes. Above all, Continental opinion is responsible for many errors of judgment on him in this country.

Mr. Nicolson, however, is under no illusions concerning either the literary or the personal accomplishment of Byron. The scant regard which he shows for such men as Leigh Hunt and Trelawney does not, moreover, blind him to the fact that Byron actually accomplished nothing, at least nothing visible at the time of his death, in the cause of Greek independence: "I have," he says, "discarded the legend that Byron went to Greece inspired solely by Phil-Hellenic enthusiasms, or that his sojourn in Missolonghi was anything but a succession of humiliating failures. . . . Lord Byron accomplished nothing at Missolonghi except his own suicide; but by that single act of heroism he secured the liberation of Greece. Had Byron, as he was urged, deserted the Helienic cause in February, 1824, there would, I feel convinced, have been no Navarino; the whole history of South-Eastern Europe would have developed differently." Mr. Nicolson has been so acute in judging the man Byron, that he almost owes us an amplification of the last sentences quoted. Certainly no one more than he is qualified to write an account of the Byron legend and of Byron's influence on Greek history. One feels that he links up the Greece of the eighteen-twenties with the Greece of M. Venizelos, to whom, incidentally but also significantly, the book is dedicated.

This picture of Byron's last year, from his eager leaving of Italy to the last stormy, fevered hours at Missolonghi, is composed with a craftsman's skill, a skill which, enabling the author to hold straight to his purpose of making a realistic presentation, achieves a memorable balance between background and foreground. There can be few narratives more affecting than this which shows the accountable purposelessness of Byron's sorry venture and end: the internal strife of the Greeks, more intent on securing Byron's gold than the more difficult independence of their country, the indiscipline and patent unreliability of the poet's absurd Suliote band, the jarring determinations of other Englishmen both in and out of Greece—all these details and many more are sketched in proper proportion as they prompted the actions and inactions of Byron. Mr. Nicolson seems to live, to withdraw from, and then to re-live the last months of Byron's life; in other words, his book is an intense appreciation. Intense because he is realistic, accurate, ringing true; and an appreciation because he surveys the tragedy with an adequate insight.

AN EASTERN DREAM.

"SILK. A LEGEND." By Samuel Merwin. (London: Constable. 7s. 6d. net.)

When Yan Po, who was a mandarin of the eighth rank, in the first century A.D., travelled north to the frontier of the Chinese Empire, in order to take up a post under General Pan Cha'o, he was amazed to see the endless stream of the caravans carrying silk away from China. He was still further amazed when he came to the frontier and learned that there were known to be empires and seas and more empires beyond what his map told him was the edge of the world. The symmetrical pattern of his life was to be broken up and arranged anew because of the desire of these empires to learn the secret of the origin of silk, and so to deprive China of her greatest source of wealth. General Pan sends him as a spy to Balkh to find out the schemes of the Wazir, Ibn Shu Ber Din, who, threatened by Rome, is in desperate need of discovering the secret of the silk. The ruler of Balkh is a young girl, Roxana, descended from Alexander and the Princess of Samarcand, proud, spoilt, and beautiful. The cunning Wazir has sent proposals for a marriage between Roxana and the Chinese Heir Apparent, which have been treated with scorn.

The story is of the adventures of the young Chinaman, a stranger in a fabulously beautiful city of marble, surrounded by intrigue and danger. He finds that, against his will, he has come to love desperately the slave girl Mosulla, who has been given to him. And then, to his horror, his beloved young Prince appears in disguise, having come to see for himself the Queen whose picture and ring have reached him through the Wazir's messengers.

Mr. Merwin has arranged a perfect setting in which these ideal figures of romance can act their drama. But he gains his effect of beauty and passion, not by exaggeration, but by restraint. Yan Po is made to tell his own story, and, through all his dangers and anguish of spirit, through the tragedy of his Prince and the proud girl Queen, we never forget that he is one by nature "content to go along his simple way as a philosopher and poet of humble attainment."

It is a turmoil of love and hate and adventure seen through the inscrutably calm and ordered mind of one who is firmly bound by the ties of the ancient Chinese civilisation. The result is a dream-like quality which is strangely arresting, and leaves one with that haunting sadness which dreams sometimes give. When Mr. Merwin allows his words, as it were, to break their bonds and rush out, as he does in the description of the treasure which the Prince Imperial brings to lay at the feet of Roxana, the effect is quite startling in its vividness.

FOREIGNERS IN TURKEY.

The work that Turkey is deeming it necessary to undertake in order to enable her to assume a not unworthy place in the Western comity of nations is proceeding apace, at such a pace, indeed, that observers from States accustomed to all sorts of checking or back-pedalling devices may wonder whether this terrific speed attained, so to speak, on a fixed wheel, will not eventuate in a puncture or in a heart collapse of the rider. However that may be, the certainty and steadiness with which the new Republic tackles one hill after another are impressive. Having renounced—and we should here say, in spite of rumours to the contrary, finally renounced—her Imperial responsibilities, and having rid herself of her religious commitments, she is now turning inwards and looking to the political security of the State. The sources of internal danger to Turkey, which have in past years been a continual menace to the stability and even the integrity of Anatolia, have been in the non-Moslem elements. Particularly, the place that the Greeks and Armenians held until the War was an anomaly, and it is mainly with their position that the Nationalists are now concerned. But it is not only from them that the Turks fear internal complications. There is before the Assembly at this moment a Bill, drawn up by the Ministry of the Interior, to regulate the position of the Arabs and the Georgians on Turkey's frontiers, as well as that of the Greeks and the Armenians. It is being proposed that there be in Eastern Anatolia a forbidden zone for Armenians; that Greeks may be domiciled only in the Constantinople area; that in the border vilayets of Syria and Irak Arabs may not instal themselves; that Georgians may not establish themselves in the vilayets of Riza, Kars, or Ardahan; and that, with the exception of the Kurds, no foreign communities may form separate communes. If any arrangement could at once inhibit the growth of foreign intrigue and make the Turks depend almost wholly upon themselves, it is surely this arrangement. The sweeping-up of foreigners is drastic, indeed; the implied reliance upon Turkish effort nearly complete.

What is the cause of these disturbing proposals, unparalleled in modern times? It is part, of course, of the determined Westernisation of Turkey, a natural consequence of the resolve to be a real master in a real house. Although from the point of view of the world Turkey has never been in the twilight, politically she has long lain in a kind of mediæval obscurity, which is but now dissolving into the light of modern day. In the history, therefore, of more advanced States may be found some explanation of the actions which Turkey is now proposing to take, or has already taken. These acts may seem a little crude, or even barbaric, but it should be remembered that she is dealing with admitted anachronisms, and that she has to cycle many miles uphill before she can get on a level with more Western States. But this, in a general sense, is what she is obviously resolved to do—it was, in fact, her only chance of survival at all—and if she is now committing acts that must inevitably involve some hardships, they should be set against the fact that she permitted foreigners in the past in such numbers and in such organisation as have been seen in no other State. Her rigorous restrictive proposals for foreigners are, therefore, to be sympathised with by every lover of national independence. It is true that in these proposals, as in the earlier actions in connection with the religious organisation of Turkey, some people see the all-pervading hand of the Bolshevist; but, although we should be far from denying that the atheistic complex of Moscow has projected itself more deeply than is commonly imagined into the minds of Angora, it would seem that in this vital matter of foreigners in Turkey, at any rate, it is the unaided sense of national independence and integrity that is shaping the salutary or fatal proposals. Turkish realisation of Turkey's decline may have existed for over a hundred years, but the wide entertainment of the idea that Turkey is doomed has only coincided with the manifestation of foreign intrigue in Turkey—and that, of course, belongs to more recent history. It is inevitable, now that the movement to save Turkey is fairly under way, that the question that has, perhaps, more than any other preyed upon the mind of the ordinary Turk should have to undergo a drastic answering. And there is no need to attribute the cruelties attendant upon it to Bolshevist influence.

Whether this great experiment will lead to the revivification or to the disintegration of Turkey we are unable to say. It has been asserted by some expert observers that the Turks themselves are incapable of running a State, and that without the assistance of the Greeks and Armenians, upon whom they have for centuries depended for the management of many higher State appointments, they will fall into decay. They plead, in fact, the historical necessity of certain anachronisms. It may be so; but it is patent that, had the Turks not done what they are now doing, death would have pushed open their door. There was not the slightest chance of their continuing along their old lines into modern times, so that, at worst, they will be flying from the frying-pan into the fire. And, so the Nationalists may be arguing, better be burned at your own open bonfire than be guyed on the pile of somebody else. On this question of foreigners within a State history is not a certain guide, although it is probable that on balance those States which have thought fit, after long reliance on the services of foreigners, to dispense with them, have not benefited. Take Spain, for instance, whose expulsion of the Moors can scarcely be said to have had the results intended. On the other hand, take England, whose banishment of the Jews from the thirteenth to the seventeenth centuries had no permanent adverse effects. It may be that the success of the experiment turns on the character of the dominant face: one's judgment of Turkey's action will depend on one's estimate of the Turk's adaptibility. From most points of view it is better that the Anatolian State should succeed, for if it should fail, its failure will create chaos in a very vital and nervous part of the world. If, however, Turkey makes perceptible approach to the standard of modern States, she will certainly deserve the thanks of those who have the interests of world peace at heart.

A NEW ISLAM?

By THOMAS LYELL.

It can hardly be said that the abolition of the Khalifate by the Turkish Government has come as a complete surprise. Such action was foreshadowed when the predecessor of Abdul Mejid succumbed to force and went into voluntary exile. Much has been made of the fact that his retirement was voluntary, that by his action he surrendered the title and office of Khalif. The fact that the sacrosanct personage of the Khalif could be submitted to such pressure as to produce a voluntary retirement was extraordinarily significant. It showed that a profound change was taking place in the religious consciousness of Islam as represented by the headquarters of the orthodox. The only astonishing factor about the present situation in Turkey is the rapidity with which that change has developed.

We are apt to look only at external symptoms and to disregard the causes underlying them. If we summarise the former we have the dismissal and banishment of Abdul Mejid, the abolition of the Khalifate, the suppression of the Sheikh ul Islam in all things political, the confiscation of Wakf funds, the suppression of all religious teaching in schools and preaching Ramadan by licence only. And all this from Turkey, the home of the orthodox!

Now one thing can be considered certain. There is no one in the world so sensitive touching his Faith as the Moslem, and, therefore, we may rightly conclude that Mustapha Kemal could not have introduced one of these reforms had he not the mass of the people and the army behind him. In other words, we find a change towards their Faith in the national consciousness, not merely among the individual leaders.

And what is the reason for this change—for these reforms? It is the Ghazi Mustapha Kemal who tells us. "Religion," he says, "has nothing whatever to do with politics in a lay republic." The term politics certainly has a wide application if that is the reason for suppressing religious teaching in schools. Now this sounds a very simple, a very innocent and frank statement. "Religion has nothing to do with politics." From a Moslem, however, it comes with a positive shock, for a little thought and examination will show that it means that Islam, as we have always known it and so far as Turkey is concerned, has ceased to exist. "The unchanging East," so far as this Faith is concerned, is now an untrue criticism. There is probably no part of the world where changes are following one upon another in so rapid a succession as in Islamic countries. Persia, Egypt, Turkey, Mesopotamia, each are evolving along their own lines after centuries of stagnation. True, much may be put down to the War as an approximate reason for this manifestation, but the real cause is far deeper. The clue to it lies in the Koran.

A confusion often arises through people's comparing the Koran with the Bible. The Christian is apt to consider that the Koran to the Moslem holds the same position as the Bible to himself. It is not so.

The authors of the various books of the Bible claimed no exalted position for themselves other than that they were interpreters of the will of the Almighty to their people. They were essentially human and subject to error, which fact has rendered the Higher Criticism possible.

Mohammed primarily was not an author nor an interpreter. He was a transcriber. It is his own claim. Through Gabriel he transcribed the actual words of Allah. It is generally taught that the whole of the Koran has existed before time was, written on golden tablets in the Heavenly Kaaba. The Koran as we know it was dictated from these tablets to Mohammed. The origin is therefore Divine, its contents perfect, and, like the Author, subject to no change nor alteration. It is, therefore, comprehensive, and deals with every department of life. Its resulting rigidity renders anything like a modernistic Islam a contradiction in terms. It is the final revelation for the world, and it is full of social and political decisions. The state of government outlined therein is theocratic: politics and religion are welded together into one complete whole.

The source of the Koran has always been the rock upon which Islam has stood. It is only less holy than its Author. Moreover, the Koran could never have existed without the Prophet, nor would Mohammed have been the Prophet were it not for the Koran. If the directions contained in the latter are called into question in the smallest manner, then the whole edifice tumbles. A simple example may be cited. Allah has given a final revelation to the world. Let me repeat, Mohammed merely took it down at dictation. In this revelation it is laid down that women must be veiled. To disobey this perfectly clear order implies either that the offender cares nothing for the order of Allah, or that the revelation of the Koran is not final, or that it is not a revelation.

However, this is a small matter compared with the new spirit seen to be abroad in Turkey, the home of the orthodox. Here the attack on religion is only comparable with that which took place at the commencement of the Soviet régime in Russia. The Khalif was only a figure-head. But his very presence was an embarrassment to a country that meant to eliminate religion from its life. He was indeed a pathetic figure, deprived of every particle of power. How curious that this deprivation raised no kind of protest in Islamic circles! Where is the outburst we might naturally expect when the successor of Abu Bekr, Othman, and Ali is contemptuously dismissed from his office and exiled from his country at twenty-four hours' notice?

One of the reasons is perhaps that the very large majority of Islamic peoples are illiterate and cannot make themselves heard, but another more important reason is that the intelligentsia were for the most part Moslems only in name, while they were Agnostics in fact. The leaders of the Turkish republic have translated this changing spirit into practice and in no uncertain way. When the directions of the Koran are seen to interfere with the progress of the nation they are ruthlessly put on one side.

The voice of the nation, under the guidance of Mustapha Kemal, has decided that the Koran is not composed of the words of Allah. The orthodox have destroyed the foundation of Orthodoxy, the Prophet has been dethroned.

This is the real significant factor underlying the deportation of the Khalif, which in itself is a comparatively insignificant incident in world politics. A new outlook has been born among the Islamic peoples. As they cast from them the shackles with which they have been burdened for years we shall find a new people with whom we have to deal, and a people on whom we must look from an entirely new angle of vision.

EGYPT AND THE SUDAN.

To the Editor of The Near East.

Sir,—From the necessarily brief report of M. Felix Valyi's lecture, which appeared in your columns, Colonel A. C. Yate is surely wrong in concluding that the lecturer made a "calumnious attack" on the great work done by Lord Cromer and Lord Kitchener. Moreover, if he had been present at the meeting, Colonel Yate would have known that Lord Lamington, who presided, questioned several statements of the lecturer, and in his speech at the conclusion of the lecture made quite clear that M. Valyi had been giving personal views and conclusions which, interesting as they might be from the point of view of information, were not necessarily endorsed by the Near and Middle East Association.

One of the chief points of interest in M. Valyi's lecture was his reference to Zaghlul Pasha's recent declarations, which he was able to give with some authority after long conversations he had had with the Egyptian Prime Minister. And as the purpose of our meeting was to gain information on an extremely important question, there was surely nothing extraordinary in the fact that the lecturer spoke to an assembly of Englishmen who might be interested to hear a report of the present trend of thought in Egypt based on conversations with the Prime Minister of Egypt and other official people. Meanwhile, it might have been more consonant with the English instinct for fair play if Colonel Yate had suspended judgment, since he was not present at the meeting, and could not know from the necessarily brief report in your columns what Lord Lamington said. While I join with Colonel Yate in hoping that the distinguished men he mentions, whose work has so powerfully influenced Anglo-Egyptian relations, will consent to speak at an early date on the problem of Egypt, I also venture to hope that what they say will not be criticised adversely on such evidence as Colonel Yate has considered sufficient.

It is not without interest to note that the letter in The Times from the Dean of Bristol, to which Colonel Yate refers as a warning, contained an attack on Islam calculated to offend millions of loyal Moslem citizens of the Empire, a spirited endorsement of Mr. Lloyd George's Near Eastern policy in 1922, and an exhortation to the present Prime Minister to revert to a similar policy. From such premises it is not easy to deduce the satisfactory settlement of outstanding questions between Great Britain and Egypt which the Near and Middle East Association desires, or, indeed, any permanent and peaceful settlement of these questions at all.

—I am, etc.,

E. H. Griffin, Hon. Secretary.

NOTES AND NEWS.

Aviation in the Near East.

However much divided in other respects, the Near East is at one in the attention that it is paying to the subject of aviation. At the present moment there are in Great Britain aeronautical missions from Greece and Turkey, and at least one other Balkan State is adding to its air fleet. The first object of both the Greek and Turkish missions is to study the British system of air administration and generally the development of the aircraft industry. The Greek Mission represents the naval branch of the Air Service, and is particularly interested in training and technical questions. As a result of the Asia Minor campaign, Greece has practically to make a fresh start in aviation, and is anxious to benefit by the latest developments. The visitors are inspecting all the chief aircraft factories in the country, and it is to be expected that orders will follow in due course. Turkey is reported to be trying her hand at commercial aviation; but, to judge from experience elsewhere, it will be some time before travel by air becomes sufficiently popular in that part of the world to make the venture self-supporting.

Bulgarian Oil Shale.

It is reported from Sofia that the Sobranje has passed the third reading of a Bill awarding a large oil shale concession to Mr. A. H. Jackson, representing a British syndicate. The concession is understood to comprise oil rights over an extensive tract of land between Sofia and the Yugoslav frontier. It was originally granted before the War, and was renewed after the Armistice; but development of the property has been delayed by one cause or another. If a clear title has now been secured, it is to be hoped that the work of exploitation on a commercial basis will be begun this year. A cheap and adequate supply of oil fuel should enable Bulgaria to open up other mineral resources and give a useful impetus to a number of Bulgarian industries.

The Budget.

In view of the surplus revenue in the past financial year it will require a very ingenious explanation from the Government to satisfy the average citizen if there is to be no remission of the taxation that matters, and present indications suggest that this is to be the case. Something off sugar and a little off tea appears to sum up the possibilities, but that kind of thing will not lighten the burden of the taxpayer, and will simply increase his exasperation. Of course, it will be argued that last year's surplus no longer exists, which is naturally the case, but the taxation that brought it into being is still with us, and if the current year shows a further similar surplus, so far from it being evidence of prudent administration it will simply indicate the continuance of unsound financial methods. Before the war it was the practice of Chancellors of the Exchequer to estimate on lines that made no provision for unnecessary margins, and the sooner we get back to that the better.

A Great Year.

This month should see the commencement of what everyone hopes will be a wonderful year for this country. On April 23, provided nothing unforeseen happens (one feels bound to make that proviso in these uncertain times), the British Empire Exhibition will be opened at Wembley, and on the following Monday the White City section of the British Industries Fair will open its doors, to be followed not many days after by the Birmingham section. In a few days, therefore, the invasion that is promised from abroad will begin—already, indeed, those whose ways lie in the Strand and other similar thoroughfares have noticed a growing number of very obvious visitors—and one is justified in trusting that the effect of the two events—the Fair and the Exhibition—will be to give at long last an impetus to British trade endeavour. Very much will depend, as regards the Fair of course, on the extent to which our firms are ready to follow up opportunities in the Near East and elsewhere. As an introduction to markets the Fair is an invaluable medium, but it is not the be-all and end-all of trade endeavour, as some business men seem to think. To be of the fullest utility it must be supplemented by a prolonged and most careful campaign overseas, and it is only by this policy that the utmost will be made of markets such as are to be found in the Near East. The watchword for the business community now and henceforward must, in short, be "Enterprise." That way lies the restoration of British commercial supremacy.

The British Empire Exhibition.

The function of the Exhibition is to some extent different from that of the Fair—to some extent the same. At Wembley, just as at the White City, there will be extremely comprehensive exhibits of the products of British industry, and this part of the Exhibition may not unjustly be regarded as a continuation of the Fair. The main purpose of the Exhibition is, however, to show how the different parts of the Empire can meet their requirements at home, so to speak—using the term as meaning within the Empire—and to demonstrate the industrial potentialities of the Empire to other countries. In both respects it is possible to look for excellent results. While Wembley is still incomplete, may, indeed, not be finished by the selected day, it is very evident from what is to be seen there that visitors will be singularly unimpressionable if the Exhibition fails to appeal. It had been thought that as regards visitors from abroad it might suffer to some extent by the rival attraction of the Olympic Games in Paris; but it is far more probable that it will benefit by them, for those who go to Paris are extremely likely to be induced also to go to Wembley.

Chartered Bank of India.

As usual, the meeting of the Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China was rendered notable by an interesting review of the Eastern trade situation by the chairman, Sir Montagu Turner. He is not inclined to take an adverse view of the position, and points out that, taking everything into consideration, the general position of business in the East is in a far healthier state than it was a year or eighteen months ago. "The old stocks of goods have been gradually worked off," he added, "and when prices of commodities have been levelled between the producer, the exporter, and the consumer, there should be an improvement in business." As regards the outlook in this country, Sir Montagu was rather guarded, pointing out that how far an improvement in business might be looked for was really rather problematical in view of the industrial unrest. He emphasised the point that the increased cost of production without an increased output makes it very doubtful whether Great Britain will be able to hold its own with other competing countries.

Commentator.

Reuter's Bucharest Correspondent, in a message dated April 1, says:—At to-day's auction for the sale of oil products accruing to the State in respect of royalties and the 2 per cent. mining tax, offers were received from five concerns. A Roumanian refiners' syndicate, the chief of which is the Redeventza Company, bid 5,000,000 dols., payable immediately, for all the oil received in this way by the State for the next five years. This bid, which was the most favourable received, will be submitted for the approval of the Cabinet.

Turkey's foreign trade for 1923 amounted in value to £T64,008,024, of which £T38,474,981 represents imports and £T25,533,043 exports.

The British Commercial Secretary at Bucharest has forwarded to the Department of Overseas Trade a translation of the conditions applicable to all contracts for supplies made by the Roumanian General Post Office. A copy of these conditions can be obtained by United Kingdom firms interested upon application to the Department. The Commercial Secretary remarks that as a general rule supplies contracted for by the Roumanian Post Office are small and of a varied character, and the official calls for tenders are not usually issued sufficiently early for firms not represented by an agent in Roumania to submit tenders in time for the adjudication.

AGRICULTURE IN IRAK.

The Agricultural Bulletin of Irak for the month ended February 15 gives the following particulars:

The seasonal rains, though late, were of considerable benefit to the cereal crops of wheat and barley. As a result of the favourable rains of January the sowing of cereals continued to the second week of February. The gross area under cereals is reported to be slightly in excess of that of the previous season, but the crop is more backward. In Upper Irak large areas of cereals sown in the late autumn germinated, but died off owing to the rainfall being insufficient to keep the crop alive. These areas have been resown with the later rains. An appreciable extension is noticeable in the area under cultivation on the right bank of the Tigris in Upper Irak. In Lower Irak the proportion of wheat to barley is much higher than is usual as a result of the scarcity of early rains which are necessary to the proper cultivation of barley. The January rains have been sufficiently heavy to suffice for the needs of the cereal crop up to the flood season. A cloudburst, followed by exceptionally high flood, in the Karun Valley has effected very considerable damage to the cereal crop in this area.

Climatic conditions have so far been favourable to the formation of flowering spathes of the date palm.

Locust breeding sites have been reported from the northern part of the Ba'qubah Liwa and Kirkuk Liwa. The Department of Agriculture is not able, in the existing circumstances, to undertake active steps to combat the locust outbreak of the coming season. The necessary advice has been given as to the steps which the Liwa authorities should be able to undertake without expert assistance.

There is already a brisk demand for cotton seed, though sowing will not commence before the second week in March. Arrangements have been made with the British Cotton Growing Association to open seed supply depots at suitable centres in the outlying districts. The sale price of cotton seed is Rs. 200 per ton, as compared with Rs. 350 for the previous season. The cultivation of rice in the Ba'qubah Liwa has been restricted in the interests of cotton cultivation.

The weekly demonstration of flax scutching at Baghdad continues. A number of visitors representing the British Chamber of Commerce in Baghdad attended at a special demonstration during the month. A number of cultivators have undertaken the cultivation of small areas of flax as an experiment.

The July to January exports of wheat from Irak were 59,454 and of barley 73,462 tons; total, 132,916 tons, as compared with 112,690 tons for the same period in 1922-23. The total exports of the 1923 crop of dates to the end of January, 1924, was 116,027 tons, valued at Rs. 135,22,424, as compared with 97,408 tons, valued at Rs. 118,90,410 for the corresponding season last year. The July to January exports of wool were 3,006 tons, as compared with 1,274 tons for the same period in 1922-1923.

Cotton and Cotton Goods.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Futures Weaker.

The Alexandria Commercial Company, in their report for the week ended March 28, state :—

Since our last report the futures market has been somewhat weaker. New York has again shown a very poor tone, and quotations there have now touched the lowest level since the beginning of the season. The reasons for this break are stated to be the unsatisfactory state of the textile industry and weather favourable to the planting of the new crop. The tendency in New York has of late been rather weak, but we are of opinion that a turn for the better is likely to occur shortly. Stocks of manufactured goods are reported to be very low, and the first sign of a revival in the demand is bound to affect the cotton markets appreciably, owing to the comparatively small supplies. Despite the heavy drop in New York, and the rather limited demand from abroad, our futures market has kept relatively firm, and the difference between America and Alexandria has further widened. The firmness of our spot market has been the cause of the strong tone of the futures market : the turnover of business has been small, but the prices asked in relation to contracts have been very high ; as we have previously said, whatever cotton is left is very firmly held, and the scarcity of good style cotton is likely to be acutely felt during the summer. Manchester advices are fairly satisfactory, and the Liverpool spot market has continued to be active, large sales being registered almost daily. At the third March tender 17,750 krs. dockets were issued. The exporter who took up the first two tenders of March also received the whole of the third one. The week's receipts amount to 32,648 krs., against exports 37,547 krs. ; the stock stands at 1,506,105 krs.

Spot.—We have had a week of poor markets at Minet el Bassal, and sales for the five business days amount to about 5,700 bales, of which we estimate 3,800 B/s Sakel, 1,700 B/s Uppers, 150 B/s Brown and Pilion, and 50 B/s of White. Demand from spinners has been very limited, and the poorest we have experienced for many weeks. Both arrivals and exports are small, and the stock shows a small decrease from last week. In spite of declining prices and a very poor offtake, holders of actual cotton continue to show no desire to push sales, and spot cotton is far from easy to buy, especially in desirable styles of cotton.

Sakellarides.—The bulk of the business done has been in cotton from Good Fair to Fully Good Fair to Good, the lower and finer grades being somewhat neglected.

Uppers.—All styles have been dealt in, but the medium and high grades have been most in request. The better grades are becoming scarce and dear.

Brown and Pilion.—A moderate business has been done. Prices of spot against contracts are generally unchanged.

White.—A retail business has been done. Prices of spot against contracts are unchanged.

Crop, 1924.—The weather has been favourable, and the state of the crop is about normal. Sowing in the northern districts is proceeding on a large scale. The germination of the early sown fields is very good, and the proportion of failures is small. Water supply is ample in all the canals of the Delta. Estimates of the proportion of varieties other than Sakel planted in the Delta this season are contradictory ; one would probably not be far from the truth in estimating this proportion at 30 to 40 per cent.

LIVERPOOL COTTON REPORT.

Business on Good Scale.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended April 2 :—

Egyptian Spot.—Quite a good business has taken place again, although sales have fallen away somewhat from the large total reached during the previous week. The inquiry, which has been on a large scale, has covered more ground than usual ; but, in spite of an all-round increase in prices, there would seem to have been a slight easing in the actual basis, both for uppers and Sakellaridis. This is probably accounted for by the appearance on the market of rather more cotton, which merchants (and speculators) have been holding off for higher prices, but which, now that carrying premiums for hedges are no longer obtainable, they are anxious to sell in order to avoid incurring further charges. Fundamentally, the position remains unchanged, and in Sakel, at all events, it seems certain that, as the season progresses, the basis will harden still further.

Uppers are a somewhat different proposition, and, whilst it is admitted that the present supply is small and will grow smaller as time goes on, experience shows that spinners object to paying fancy prices for this cotton and have a habit of turning on to substitutes after a certain figure (say, roughly, 300 on American) has been passed. It is common knowledge, also, that many spinners of American, who for a time were attracted by the comparative cheapness of Upper Egyptian cotton, and spun it more or less satisfactorily, have since reverted to their normal procedure, and are again spinning American staple cotton, which they can now obtain on a satisfactory basis. To-day, fully good fair-to-good uppers are fetching about 75 on May Egyptian, and business at anything over this figure is difficult to find.

A feature of the inquiry this week has been the request for "uppers 250 off to pass," but even in "off" cotton the supply seems to be of a very limited character, and transactions have been only small. In Sakellaridis, the inquiry has been divided about equally between cotton at 50 to 100 on, and cotton at 150 to 200 on. In the former, as we mentioned above, rather more cotton has been on offer, and it is in this quality that the basis has eased slightly. In the latter and better qualities, the basis has fully maintained its position, and it is significant at this time of the year to find that Alexandria shippers are keeping their prices well up when offering shipments of new crop. This position may become modified later on, but at present all indications point to the fact that previous rumours and estimates of a small Sakel acreage being planted this year have a fairly solid foundation.

A very fair trade has taken place in Sudan cotton, both descriptions being in request. For white, the position remains about the same, but in the better Sakel qualities there has been a tendency for the price to harden; up to 23.00d. has been paid this week. Brown, pilion, white and low cottons have all been comparatively neglected. In c.i.f. business there has been rather more doing, and offers have been somewhat irregular, with the result that an added interest has been taken. Forwardings to spinners for the week ending March 28 were returned as 10,948 bales. Estimated sales, 4,000 bales Egyptian and 1,000 bales Sudan. Quotations of Sakel are advanced 40 points, those of upper and brown are 35 points higher. Fully good fair Sakellaridis to-day 21.00d.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

Business on Quiet Side.

The Manchester Cotton Trade Review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended March 28 states :—

A quiet state of affairs has again prevailed. There has been a good inquiry, but sellers have fully maintained their firmer attitude, and buyers are still hesitating about paying the prices demanded, so that the actual turnover resulting is unsatisfactory. Nevertheless, it cannot be doubted that in the last month or so producers have strengthened their position, and the very low prices at which it was possible to do business a little while ago are now seldom heard of. There seems to be a feeling that raw cotton will be cheaper rather than dearer, and this, of course, militates against any extensive operations for delivery ahead.

Yarn.—Spinners have taken advantage of the fall in raw cotton, and have increased their margins by probably ½d. per lb. in the week, since, although the former has fallen by approximately 1d. per lb., yarn quotations are only lower by about half of that amount. In yarn spun from American cotton the demand has probably exceeded the production of the "short time" week. Egyptian spinnings continue to meet with a moderately active demand and a fair business has transpired.

Cloth.—A more general inquiry has been experienced, but negotiations have been difficult owing to the strength with which producers hold to their quotations. India has done quite an encouraging trade, but China has been rather quiet. Egypt and the Near East have done very little.

Raw Cotton.—This has been a falling market throughout the week, and it cannot be said that there is any great confidence that even the lower prices now ruling will be maintained. The spot sales in Liverpool have been moderate. Stocks are somewhat reduced. Closing prices yesterday were as follows: American Fully Middling. 16.46d.; Egyptian Fully Good Fair, 20.60d.

A further report, dated April 5, states :—

A more cheerful feeling has prevailed this week. Either buyers have found it necessary to replenish their stocks, or they have come to the conclusion that there is nothing to be gained by postponing any further the orders which the increased inquiry of recent weeks showed to have been in the offing. At any rate, business, in spite of higher prices, has not been so difficult to arrange as recently.

From some points of view it is unfortunate that at this juncture Raw Cotton should have become considerably dearer. This is attributed in part to the improved tone here, but with spinners on short time it can hardly be due to any great volume of demand.

Yarn.—The higher quotations given by spinners last week have had to be still further increased owing to the strength of raw cotton. Nevertheless, the reduced output of American spinners is being cleared, and there is an actual shortage of yarn of certain qualities. In Egyptian spinnings there has been a brisk demand, and producers have, if anything, improved their position somewhat.

Cloth.—Quite a good business has been done, which might possibly have been more extensive but for the difficulty of obtaining certain qualities of yarn. Whilst, in some cases, looms which have been idle for a considerable period are being restarted, in others manufacturers with good orders are unable to run their machinery full time because they cannot obtain the yarns required. Most markets abroad have shown increased interest, and the larger business has been well spread over them.

Raw Cotton.—As already mentioned, a considerable rise has taken place in quotations. This is probably due more to expectations than to any extensive present demand. "Spot" sales during the past week have been moderate, and stocks in Liverpool are again slightly lower. Closing prices yesterday were as follows :—American Fully Middling, 18.13; Egyptian Fully Good Fair, 21.55.

The handsome new steamer City of Venice, which has just been completed by Messrs. Workman, Clark and Co., Ltd., for the City Line fleet of the Ellerman Line, Ltd., ran a series of very successful trials in Belfast Lough on April 4, at the conclusion of which she left for Glasgow.

Company Meeting.

CHARTERED BANK OF INDIA, AUSTRALIA, AND CHINA.

Sir Montagu Turner's Speech.

The seventieth ordinary general meeting of the shareholders of the Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China was held on April 2 on the bank's premises, 38, Bishopsgate, E.C. Sir Montagu Cornish Turner (the chairman) presided.

The Chief Manager (Mr. W. E. Preston) having read the notice convening the meeting and the report of the auditors,

The Chairman said:—Gentlemen,—I should like to explain, in regard to the concluding part of the auditors' certificate, that the reason why the full details of the Yokohama Agency have not been received is that nearly all our accounts and books were destroyed at the time of the earthquake in Japan. The earthquake occurred in the middle of the day, when business was in full swing. In the space of six seconds the bank's premises were destroyed. It is hardly to be wondered at that the books and papers which were then being used were destroyed by the earthquake and by the fire which followed it; but, thanks to the energy of our staff out there, we are pretty well prepared with all details and statements, so that there is no trouble arising from the destruction of our records.

Before dealing with the business before us, I would refer briefly to the loss sustained by the board of directors in the very sudden death of their much-valued and respected colleague, the late Sir Duncan Carmichael. With his long and varied business experience, added to a sound and impartial judgment, although a comparatively young member of the board, Sir Duncan proved himself to be of substantial assistance in the deliberations of the court of directors, especially in all questions connected with Eastern trade. Apart from that, he was to some of us an intimate and appreciated friend of many years' standing, and his passing away created a void which it is not easy to fill.

The vacancy on the board has been filled by the election of Mr. Colin F. Campbell, of Messrs. Forbes, Forbes, Campbell, and Co., Limited, of London and Bombay. Mr. Campbell has had a long and honourable business career in London and in the East, and has a deserved reputation as one of the leading figures in banking and commercial life in the City of London. I am sure you will agree with me we are fortunate to secure his services, and you will be asked to-day to confirm his election.

Referring to the report and balance-sheet now submitted for your approval, I trust you will agree that, in view of all that happened in 1923 and all that did not happen in the way of revival of trade, and in spite of keen competition, the results shown are not unsatisfactory. The year 1923 was a year of disappointment, and, perhaps, of disillusion, in that we did not experience a substantial revival in trade, nor did we witness any marked improvement in the unsettled political condition or in the financial condition of Central Europe. This state of unsettlement permeated both East and West, and in consequence we experienced a period of great difficulty and, at times, no small anxiety. Thanks, however, to careful and capable management and unremitting attention on the part of our managers and staff, at home and abroad, we have emerged from that period of anxiety and perplexity with some profit and without any serious loss.

The Balance-sheet.

Turning to our balance-sheet, our total figures at £58,765,537 11s. 10d., showing a reduction of £1,387,835 4s. as compared with those for 1922, merely reflect the general slacker state of trade during the past year. It is pleasing, however, to note that our current accounts and fixed deposits at £41,590,027 1s. 2d. compare so favourably with the £42,408,289 10s. 11d. of the preceding year. Our cash in hand and at bankers at £4,673,004 16s. is £157,199 19s. 3d. higher than the same item for 1922—viz., £4,515,804 16s. 9d., whilst bullion on hand and in transit at £1,060,190 4s. exceeded our 1922 figure by £504,498 9s. 5d. Our holdings of Government and other securities totalled £14,385,289 11s. 4d., an excess of £2,226,275 13s. 4d. over our closing figures for 1922, due to the fact that we took advantage of a change from Treasury Bills to somewhat longer-dated securities, giving a better return, which accounts for part of the decline of £3,987,842 6s. 3d. in our bills of exchange, including Treasury Bills, from £17,932,445 in 1922 to £13,944,602 13s. 9d. at the end of last year Our bank premises at £971,050 14s. 9d. show a small increase over our 1922 figures, but this year's allocation will bring that down.

The net profit is just about the same as in 1922, and enables us to pay the same dividend and bonus to shareholders and to make the same allocations to reserve, officers' superannuation fund, and premises account.

The outstanding feature in the Far East has been the disastrous earthquake which visited Japan on September 1 last. No disaster of such a magnitude involving such an appalling loss of life and property, both in Tokyo and Yokohama, has, I believe, previously happened in our generation. Material damage, caused partly by fire resulting from the earthquake, to the extent of many millions sterling has resulted, but thanks to the marvellous energy and indomitable courage of the Japanese nation, their Government at once took in hand the reconstruction of the two cities, and in a wonderfully short time business was resumed.

From a speech recently delivered in London by Mr. Inouyé, recently Finance Minister in Japan, it would appear that in Tokyo the number of lives lost was about 85,000, and the number of houses burnt 350,000, but against this loss about 150,000 temporary dwellings had been erected, and of the 1,000,000 people who had left the city during the earthquake about 600,000 had returned. Their energies were splendid.

It speaks volumes for Japan as a nation that the recent loans issued in London and New York—loans issued entirely on the credit of Japan and without any collateral security—met with such a wonderful response and with such a success. It is testimony to the honesty and high commercial standard of Japan as one of the great Powers of the world.

As far as this bank is concerned, I regret to say that, although the material loss in Yokohama resulting from the earthquake was no more than might reasonably have been expected, and which has been fully provided for, we sustained a grievous loss in the most regrettable death of our manager, Mr. A. H. Tait, unfortunately killed when a short distance from the bank building. Mr. Tait had done excellent service in the bank. He was a man of great promise, an indefatigable worker, and a most faithful servant. His death is a distinct loss to the bank and to all who knew him as a friend. The board of directors and management have already expressed their sympathy with Mrs. Tait, but I would take this opportunity of doing so publicly, and also expressing very great sympathy with Mr. Nicholl, one of our assistants, in the disaster which befell him in the death of Mrs. and Miss Nicholl. We would also sympathise with the relations of those members of our local staff—ten in number—who lost their lives when at their post of duty in the bank building.

In spite of the disaster and all the consequences resulting therefrom, the bank's business, which had been transferred temporarily from Yokohama to Kobe, has been again transferred to Yokohama, where we have a temporary office, and an agency has also been opened at Tokyo to meet the requirements of our friends and customers. Our staff, both at Yokohama and Kobe, deserve the highest praise for the manner in which they carried on in circumstances of the greatest difficulty and danger.

As might be expected, the balance of trade is at the moment against Japan, partly due to national causes, such as the import of material necessary to reconstruct the cities of Tokyo and Yokohama, but also the importation of sundry goods, which would seem to have been due to speculation and not to the legitimate requirements of trade. This undoubtedly has caused the fall of the yen to a level below 2s., and is only of a temporary character.

The position in China, I regret to say, shows no signs of improvement. Civil war is rife, and huge sums are taken from the revenues of the country to maintain vast bodies of troops, who are a danger to all peaceable citizens and who consume the revenues which are required for the economic development of the country, after due payment has been made of interest on foreign and domestic loans. Both imports and exports are suffering from the want of security in the transit of goods inland, and business both in North China and in Hong Kong is deplorably dull.

This state of things, I fear, will continue until China is blessed with a really powerful Government, determined to rule and to put an end to the disturbed state of the country.

Situation in India.

As regards India, too much importance should not be attached to the political troubles which at present exist and must cause some anxiety to the Viceroy and those responsible for the good and peaceful government of the country. India is sound at heart and loyal, despite the occasional blasts of hot air which at times cause an overheated atmosphere in the Council Chambers of our great Dependency. The financial position has much improved and practically the deficit in her Budget no longer exists.

The tea industry is very prosperous, and jute holds its own. There have been good crops of wheat, cereals, and oil-seeds, but prices require adjustment, quotations from the East being above the level of those ruling in Western markets, and business is thereby restricted. It is interesting to note that the local consumption of certain seeds is on the increase, especially edible oil-seeds, and the quantity available for export is, therefore, not so large as usual.

The cotton crop of India at 5,000,000 bales was quite normal, and it is rather interesting to note that the total cotton crop of the world is about 17,000,000 bales. Of that America supplies 10,000,000 to 11,000,000; India comes next with 5,000,000; China supplies about 1,750,000, and Egypt 1,250,000, and now we have, as mentioned in the speech of Sir Charles McLeod yesterday at the meeting of the National Bank of India, East African cotton coming into the market to the extent of about 100,000 bales; that is most promising.

Out of the 5,000,000 bales grown in India, Europe takes about 1,050,000 and China and Japan 1,700,000 bales. Taking the ordinary current price of to-day for 2,700,000 bales, it means about £65,000,000, and that sum has to be found chiefly by the exchange bankers for financing the export. In fact, owing to the additional price of cotton, the extra accommodation which the banks have had to provide this year has been about 35 crores of rupees.

Taking everything into consideration, the general position of business in the East is in a far healthier state than it was twelve months or eighteen months ago. The old stocks of goods have been gradually worked off, and when prices of commodities have been levelled between the producer, the exporter, and the consumer, there should be an improvement in business. How far we may look for an improvement in business in this country is really rather problematical in view of the incessant industrial unrest and the incessant strikes which are really the heaviest cloud overhanging the horizon of our present and future trade. This increased cost of production with no increase in the output of manufactured articles, makes it extremely doubtful whether we as a nation can hold our own with other competing countries, especially Germany, France, and Belgium. In any case we must hope for the best, and we can rely on our management and staff at home and abroad continuing to show that zeal, energy, and ability which have resulted in the success of this bank, and for which we directors beg to thank them.

The financial position of this bank is such that we are prepared to meet, at any point, and at any minute, the increased demands of our friends and customers when the hoped-for revival of trade in the East and in the West has come to pass.

With these remarks, ladies and gentlemen, I beg to move "That the report now presented, together with the balance-sheet and profit and loss account, be approved and adopted." I will call on Mr. Cuthbertson to second that motion.

Mr. Thomas Cuthbertson seconded the resolution, which was carried unanimously.

The proposed dividend and bonus were adopted, the election to the board of Mr. Colin F. Campbell was confirmed, the retiring directors were re-elected, the auditors were re-appointed, and the meeting closed with cordial votes of thanks to the chairman, the directors, and staff.

TRADE CONDITIONS IN SALONIKA.

H.M. Consul-General at Salonika, in a recent report on the state of British trade, reports that knitting machines are being sent from Germany in large quantities, and are being introduced into the villages of Macedonia. The existence of these machines offers a valuable opening for British yarns, as yarns of British manufacture are generally accepted as the best for knitting purposes. The yarn trade is at present in the hands of agents, who, owing to the number of houses to which they have to attend and the extent of the ground to be covered, are unable in many cases to give satisfactory service. A traveller from the United Kingdom is rarely to be met with in Salonika, although travellers from other countries are frequently to be found. There would appear also to be a good market for woollen goods (draperies).

H.M. Consul further reports that it has been brought to his notice that 16,000 well-to-do Armenian traders, chiefly merchants and shopkeepers, have recently migrated to Salonika from various parts of Turkey. New shops with Armenian names are constantly appearing in the town, and, with the usual Armenian push and acumen, these people will prove an important factor in the market, and much of the trade will eventually pass into their hands. Manchester and Bradford firms should lose no time in getting into direct touch with these merchants through their travellers.

It is considered that, as regards commercial morality, Salonika probably offers the best market in the Near East. In this connection it may be mentioned that not only was there a drop of 50 per cent. in the exchange during last year, but every merchant discharged his liabilities, some even sold their stock to pay their debts, and there were no failures.

The Il Sole of Milan states that a new Italo-Yugoslav bank has been established in Belgrade, with a capital of 100,000,000 lire

The output of the Indo-Burma oilfields for January was 4,253 barrels, being 2,874 barrels from Yenanma and 1,379 barrels from Padaukpin.

DRIED FRUIT REPORT.

Messrs. J. C. Houghton and Co. report as follows, under date April 1 :—

Currants.—The market has continued its waiting attitude, with nothing to stimulate activity; in fact, the reverse has been the case. Threats of further industrial troubles are producing a disturbing influence in the minds of potential buyers, shaking their confidence, and thus helping to keep alive the feeling of uncertainty which has dominated the market for the past two months. Business has dwindled to very meagre proportions, and the position at the moment is one of an almost complete standstill—any tendency to force sales is restrained by the strength of the Greek market, and the strong statistical position in the United Kingdom. The only arrival during the month has been the Maronian, with 750 tons. General business :—Zante, 47s. to 50s.; Gulf, 48s. to 52s.; Smalls, 53s. to 55s.; Panariti, 54s. to 56s.; Vostizza, 60s. to 72s.; Smalls, 60s. to 70s. Cleaned bold fruit, 47s. to 52s.; cleaned small fruit, 49s. to 53s. Quotations :—Calamata, 45s.; Zante, 47s. to 52s.; Gulf and Panariti, 48s. to 56s.; Vostizza, 58s. to 72s. Australian Currants.—A little forward business has been transacted in 3 Crown quality at 54s. to 55s. 6d., c.i.f., shipment first week in April, and s.s. Ulysses is afloat for Liverpool with new crop.

Raisins.—Quite a dragging sale, 42s. to 45s. quarter-boxes. Buyers are taking practically no interest in the article. Australian Lexias.—Neglected. Cape Raisins.—The first arrival of the new season came to hand per s.s. Kildonan Castle, and was quickly disposed of, f.a.q. 48s. and g.a.q. 56s., the quality of the latter grade being exceptionally good.

Sultanas.—Very little of new interest developed, the home demand failing to give buyers any encouragement, and it has been very difficult to maintain prices. There was evidence at one period of the Continental demand springing up again, but the dock strike at Hamburg checked this. Now the strike is finishing there are hopes of the export demand reviving again. The little trade passing has been principally in cleaned, 57s., 58s., to 60s., and in Cretans at 55s. to 62s. Greek Sultanas, 56s., some old crop sold at 44s. 6d. to 48s. 6d. Australian Sultanas.—Some business was transacted in new crop on the basis of 50s. c.i.f. for 3 Crowns, and 45s. c.i.f. for 2 Crowns, April shipment. Latest cables advise quotations advanced 10s. per cwt. Cape Sultanas.—The first new crop ex Kildonan Castle realised 50s. to 70s. for sulphured variety.

Figs.—Genuine were sold at 36s. to 37s. Stocks almost exhausted.

BUILDING PROJECTS IN JERUSALEM.

Two large construction projects are being proposed in Jerusalem (says an American Consular report). The first involves the erection of about fifty shops and office buildings two stories in height at the commercial centre of the city in a section known as "Merkaz Mishari." It is reported that French capital will participate to a large extent in this project. The other project involves the building of at least ninety houses in a residential section of the city, in what is known as the "Montefiore" quarter. In addition, there will be at least twenty homes built during 1924 in the recently established section of "Beth-Hakerem." The buildings planned will be constructed of stone and concrete with tile roofs.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The Greek Plebiscite.

According to the first reports, the plebiscite taken in Greece last Sunday has shown 70 per cent. of the voters to be in favour of a republic. When it was made known that votes had to be recorded on different coloured papers, those for a republic on white, those for the monarchy on yellow, a verdict in favour of the former was almost a foregone conclusion. As if to make doubly sure, the Republican Government on the eve of the plebiscite ordered the arrest of a number of Monarchists. The reason given for this action is that those who have been arrested—all of them superior military or naval officers—were known to be contemplating an outbreak after the plebiscite. M. Papanastasiou, the Prime Minister, has undertaken to investigate the matter, and it will not occasion surprise if all those who were detained during the plebiscite are released immediately afterwards.

Greece as a Republic.

General Metaxas, the Greek Monarchist leader, is stated to have agreed to abide by the result of the plebiscite, and it is, therefore, to be hoped that Greece will now settle down to a period of tranquillity as a republic. It would be folly and unpatriotic on the part of the Monarchists to attempt any immediate challenge of the results of the appeal to the electorate. The introduction of different coloured voting papers would be contrary to Western ideas of an impartial plebiscite, as it would prevent a secret ballot; but in other respects the Opposition appears to have satisfied itself that no undue influence would be exercised on the voters. M. Papanastasiou has certainly made an excellent impression by the obvious sincerity of his desire to bring about complete reconciliation between the two warring factions under the ægis of a republic. If, therefore, he continues to direct the destinies of Greece, there may be a chance of some of the harm done by the political feuds of recent years being repaired. Monarchists will not be expected to abandon their beliefs, but they should recognise that, for one reason or another, they have not been able to carry the majority of the nation with them, and that it is their duty to accept the republican system until such time as they have sufficient support to ensure an orderly constitutional change, if ever that time should come.

"Political Motives."

Brigands hold up the leisurely train which does duty as an "express" between Athens and Salonika; others of their fraternity in Albania kill two Americans, who had unhappily been lured into a sense of false security by the glowing accounts of the peaceful condition of the country. In each case the Government concerned hastens to express the view that the outrage has been inspired by "political motives." Presumably it is considered less of a reflection upon those in authority to admit that there are responsible people among their own countrymen who will stop at no crime, even though it may embroil the State with other nations, to serve their political ends, than to admit the existence of a few desperate fellows, from whom no country is ever free. Most Governments would prefer to attribute an outrage to irresponsible brigands than to seek to attach to those who are distinguished from them merely by a slight difference of political opinion the stigma of conduct which must inevitably lower their country in the eyes of foreigners. While political passions run as high as they do in the Balkans we may expect these ingenuous admissions, and need not place too much reliance upon them. The fact is that the brigand nuisance has cropped up again as an aftermath of the War; but it is as much in the interests of the countries concerned that politicians should cease to attribute to one another a morality lower than that of brigands as it is that they should take steps to establish law and order throughout the land.

Roumania and France.

The visit of the King and Queen of Roumania to Paris—the first of a series of visits to the capitals of the Allied Powers—has given rise to discussion on the prospects of a Franco-Roumanian Treaty on the lines of the agreement recently concluded between France and Czecho-Slovakia. Certain it is that the Roumanian Foreign Minister has found that the business to be transacted with the French Government requires a stay of a fortnight in Paris on his part. If a treaty should result from the visit it would be a complete reversal of the policy which prompted the Roumanian Government a few months ago to reject the French offer of an arrangement on the lines of the Franco-Czecho-Slovakian Treaty. Since then, however, a cold douche has been administered to the relations between Roumania and Italy by Signor Mussolini's request that a settlement of the Roumanian debt question should precede a visit of the King and Queen to Italy. Pique over this incident and the present complications with Russia over Bessarabia must make the Roumanians anxious for some measure of support from abroad, and in this frame of mind there is a tendency to overlook the flaw in a "Heads I win, tails you lose" spin of a coin. Whether France will consider it to her interest to run the risk of becoming embroiled with Soviet Russia for the sake of strengthening her ring fence round Germany is another matter.

The Byron Centenary.

While it is unfortunate that the Byron Centenary celebrations should coincide with Greece's pre-occupation over her future Constitution, due credit must be given to M. Papanastasiou's Government for not allowing political considerations to interfere with the Centenary programme. If we understand aright the motive behind this week's ceremonies in Athens and at Missolonghi, as well as in England, where Greek communities will pay their tributes to the memory of Byron, it is to bring home to the British people that notwithstanding political ups-and-downs Greece feels that her well-being is indissolubly linked up with the maintenance of close and cordial relations with Great Britain. That sentiment, we need hardly state, is warmly reciprocated in this country. Time was when Greece may be said to have monopolised British interests in the Near East. Since then Britain's international ties have been very considerably extended, and she realises that one of the best services that she can render Greece to-day is to help her to play her full part in the moral and material development of South-Eastern Europe by promoting the friendly co-operation of all the States concerned. In other words, Great Britain remains to-day as Phil-Hellene as ever Byron was, but would prefer that her friendship should take the form of ensuring that her friends should be Greece's friends rather than that she should be expected to regard Greece's enemies as her enemies.

Persian Politics.

To the rule that nowhere are politicians as indispensable as they are apt to imagine themselves to be Persia supplies a possible exception. The Sardar Sipah has played such a prominent and invaluable part in recent years in a country which had for so long proved itself hopelessly bankrupt in administrative ability that it seemed almost unthinkable that he should voluntarily leave Persia to flounder in its former incompetency. Yet within a very few days or weeks after Riza Khan was credited with the determination to make himself President of a Persian Republic, the report comes that he has resigned and left the capital. Telegraphic news from Persia is tantalisingly brief, and we may have to wait for a letter from our own correspondent in Teheran to learn the inwardness of what has been happening. The formal announcement that a republic in Persia would be contrary to the Moslem religion and that any further reference to the subject would be visited with severe penalties, suggested that a short but interesting chapter in Persian history had been finally closed. It was, therefore, a matter for considerable surprise to learn that the Sardar Sipah had resigned his Premiership, on the ground that he had lost the confidence of the Mejliss. That body, however, seems to have a higher opinion of his indispensability than he has himself. By a four to one majority, it recorded its confidence in the Sardar Sipah, who has returned to power with a reconstructed Ministry. The episode, which arose out of the republican epidemic now harassing the East, contains some valuable lessons for the Prime Minister, the Mejliss, and the people of Persia by which it is to be hoped one and all will benefit.

The Birth of a Party.

Last week brought the news of an interesting event in Indian politics—the appearance of a new party with the honourable name of Reform and the motto "Responsive Co-operation." The high rate of infant mortality in Delhi makes it impossible to be very sanguine regarding the prospects of the latest arrival, but it starts with the enunciation of a definite principle, adherence to which may save it from the early grave which has been the fate of so many predecessors. The motto contains an obvious reference to the preamble of the Government of India Act, and it will certainly be an advantage for India if the men who are willing to work the Act for what it is worth should present a united front against the men whose declared purpose is to wreck it. Whether they will actually do so is another question. Dr. Gour, who has formed the party, was one of those who abstained from voting in the division on the Finance Bill, a brand of "co-operation" which strikes us as rather thin, and we must wait for the events of the next session before we can judge whether anything more effective is to be substituted.

Holidays for Governors

The discussion in the House of Lords on the idea of allowing Viceroys and Governors to come home on leave brought out in a very interesting way the change in the position of these appointments resulting from the reforms. The prohibition now in force arose from circumstances which long ago ceased to exist, and, while the Secretary of State was concerned mainly to remove an anomaly, his predecessor, with wider experience of the subject, was apparently more impressed by the danger that high officials may be so influenced by the Indian environment as to require an occasional change to the wider atmosphere of London. For that very reason we may be sure that the proposed relaxation will be bitterly resented in India by politicians who have been known to boast that they have the Viceroy in their pocket, and who naturally dislike the prospect of his exposure to influences of a different nature. We take it that the best arrangement is that which was propounded by Lord Curzon—to allow an occasional visit to England, but to make sure that the visits are short, and that a regular system of holidays is not permitted to grow up; but, as things stand at present, the most probable result is that Parliament will be too busy to deal with the subject for some time to come.

Lord Willingdon.

Lord Willingdon left India last week after a decade of strenuous and successful service as Governor, first of Bombay, and more recently of Madras, and the country has thus lost an outstanding personality, whose influence has been increasingly powerful alike in politics and administration, in industry and agriculture, in sport and in society. It is too soon yet to offer a final estimate of the work he has done for India during these years of transition, but at least it may be said that under his guidance Madras has travelled farther than any other province on the long road leading in the direction of responsible self-government. Elderly frequenters of Fenner's may occasionally be heard to complain that he has not always gone for the bowling as vigorously as they had hoped, but he has played the right game for his side, and he can afford to ignore these critics of the pavilion. His presence in England will undoubtedly be welcome just now, and we hope he will see his way to give public opinion the lead for which it is looking on the whole question of India's future.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Tuesday Morning.

German Reparations.

The report of the experts on German Reparations has been hailed with much satisfaction, and it deserves its welcome. As far as the layman can judge, it is based on a genuine attempt to understand the situation, and no preconceived political theories have been allowed to get in the way of honest interpretation of the facts. Its main thesis —that Germany is able to pay—will come as a nasty surprise to the pacifists of all lands, but its contention that before the Germans can pay, the French hold on the Ruhr must be reduced to a mere military occupation, will surprise very few people.

It is indisputable evidence of the sincerity of this report that the Reparations Commission have accepted it at once, although it should not be supposed from this that the respective Governments are committed to the experts' findings. But certainly a hopeful outlook is entertained in Paris, Brussels, and London. The one big snag that remains is the willingness of the German Government to accept, and to act honestly, upon these proposals. Personally, one would doubt their willingness, after they have for so long bamboozled the Allies, to work the scheme. And this particular doubt is much more widely shared in this country than that pertaining to the willingness or otherwise of the French to reduce the intensity of their Ruhr occupation. However, we are to know later in this week what the Germans intend to do about it.

A Parliamentary Retrospect.

Parliament rises to-morrow for its Easter recess, and the opportunity is thus given for summing up the general situation. This is by no means an easy matter, for, though the Government has lost a good deal on the roundabouts, particularly in the last few days, it had gained much on the swings of February and March. The superiority of the Premier and Foreign Secretary over all his colleagues has become most marked; it was really only until the last debate upon the Evictions Bill that he gave undeniable testimony to his fallibility. His speech upon the opposition to his party's proposals to protect the unemployed from eviction, together with his subsequent comments on the whole discussion, created the worst impression.

It would seem, however, that the Labour Party can well afford to lose a little ground, for they will gain more than they lose to the Conservatives from the landslide that is surely befalling the Liberals. The impotence of these latter has become most painfully manifest of late, and there can be small doubt that they will presently dissolve into the Tory and the Labour camps. And two-thirds of them will go to Labour.

In the House itself the Government has disappointed. Those Ministers from whom much was expected have made little mark, the chief failure being Mr. Clynes as Leader of the House. On the other hand, there have been one or two surprises, the most notable of these having been afforded by Mr. Wheatley, who appears to have a very ready intelligence and an adequate amount of savoir faire. And the papers say that Mr. Thomas, as Colonial Secretary, has been successful, although to the outside observer the praise given to him would seem to arise from his policy of adhering, in all essentials, at any rate, to the policy of his predecessors.

In brief, the feeling that the present Government has not the ability to last very much longer is strong; but it has to be matched against the obvious fact that nobody else is willing at the moment to undertake the job. The next session will probably determine the duration of the Government.

The Budget.

One of the most exciting pursuits of the political journalist is the forecasting of the Budget proposals, and, at the moment, all sorts of rumours are flying round upon Mr. Snowden's intentions. An outcry is being raised by the Tories that he has the abolition of the McKenna duties in mind, and they are busy pointing out that the jettisoning of this last piece of Protection will inevitably result in more unemployment of Britons. In the interests of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's own party, therefore, he should not do this iniquitous thing. The cancelling of the Safeguarding of Industries duties was bad enough, but this would be the last straw.

It is, again, foreshadowed that the death duties and the super-tax will be increased in the new Budget, and the old slogan of "No Capital Levy" is being bandied about once more. From an ethical point of view these terrific death duties and super taxes are no doubt wrong, but if the Government loses money one way it must get it in another, and the limit of human endurance has been so many times reached and passed that one supposes that whatever the Government wills in this respect will be done.

However, we shall know nothing for certain until the Budget has actually been introduced. Mr. Snowden's words always used to flow from a silver tongue, but he has learned since assuming office to preserve silence in a golden manner.

C.O.P.E.C.

At Birmingham last week there was assembled into one gathering, containing representatives of all the Western Churches, a Conference on Christian Politics, Economics, and Citizenship Such a collection—which was a triumph of organisation—it was probably impossible to make under a less cumbersome name than C.O.P.E.C., but some of the speakers appear to have been weighed down by the realisation of the burden they had to bear.

The phrase "Practical Christianity" has undergone a good deal of slight in modern times, which have been prone to deal with all manifestations of desire on the part of Christians to interest in the affairs of this wicked world, with the convenient lie that religion is a thing for the individual alone. Now, however, is the period of revaluation, when, for example, Tennyson is reckoned a poet, the Turk a human being, and Mr. Lloyd George a spent force; and we no longer forbid the leaders of religion to have their say upon political questions. In other words, we are once more approaching the mediaeval standpoint, from which religion is not considered merely as a department of life, but as life itself.

Patiently and carefully, therefore, the public read what the theologians at this Conference said upon such problems as birth control, political and industrial systems, unemployment, and so on. That no definite conclusion was arrived at goes without saying, and, of course, seeing the diversity of religious tendencies represented there, it was far better so. If Christianity is to mean what it originally meant, what it meant, for instance, when it saved the Roman Empire and civilised half the world, there must be a Christian attitude to all important things, and if this Conference were to have achieved nothing solid, it would at least have made more possible the formulation of such an attitude.

Free Railway Passes.

There was a light touch about the recent granting by Members of Parliament to themselves of free first-class railway passes between their constituencies and Westminster. The democrats who looked on rather sadly while this measure sped its way through the House knew in their heart of hearts (if politicians ever consult their inner sanctum) that it was inevitable. The wish of the House to travel first-class seems to have surprised many people, but one ought to regard it from the view that the avoidance of Labour M.P.'s will in future be an easy matter compared with what it has and would increasingly have been. And it is all a proof of the fact, which we were in danger of forgetting, that the Labour Party is after all delightfully human.

Summer Time.

The world is not quite so converted to the idea of progress as is sometimes thought, and it has been perfectly heartening to see the blind sincerity of the opposition to the imposition of a permanent date for Summer Time upon our lives. Last week the Bill which Sir Kingsley Wood brought into the House with the object of making our time coincide with Continental time got through its second reading by forty votes only.

Most of the opposition seems to come from the farmers, who say that they cannot get the dews and their cows to fall in with these new fangled methods, and from the ultra pious, who look upon this putting of the clock forward with holy horror. It is to them like Joshua, telling the sun to stand still upon Gibeon, or Canute, forbidding the approach of the waves. However, the doctors aver that it is very good for us; and so we do it (those of us who remembered did it on Saturday night). People would be cheated of any number of hours' sleep, provided that the next morning was one for church and not for business, to please their doctors.

Stinnes.

The attention that was given in this country to the death of Stinnes was significant, not so much of the world-importance of the man, as of our tendency to find a picturesque scapegoat for all our modern ills. Englishmen perceive a fact so much more easily through its human typification, and it was through Stinnes that they chose to regard the whole evil trend of international finance. The curse of cosmopolitanism they do not see as a curse until they have found the man who indulges in it; and then they let fly. Stinnes was referred to here in words that were a post-War imitation of those used in earlier days of the Kaiser. But, although they feel deeply that it was the system that he represented which is one of the main causes of the world's discontents, and although they know that his death solves the problem in no way, they will have forgotten all about it by to-morrow. Is not the F.A. Final soon to be played? And the South Africans will be over here in another week or two.

Chelsea, the Leek, and the Onion.

It will read strangely to travellers in the Near East, where the smell of garlic reigns supreme, that the Royal Horticultural Society is forbidding the appearance of the leek and the onion at the Chelsea Show in May. Apparently the smell of these two eminent vegetables is too much for the artistic and the fashionable gathering. But what a confession that we are becoming a chicken-hearted race, not to be able to stand the smell of an onion! The onion is every whit as admirable a thing as the rose; has the rose ever had so noble an essay written upon it as Hilaire Belloc has written upon a raw onion? And is the country really grown so suspicious of the ex-Premier and his fellow-men that the national symbol of Wales is inhibited from keeping company with the uninsulted vegetables? St. David's Day without a leek is what a steak would be without an onion; and a horticultural show without either cannot be called a typical English show.

Khalifate Controversies.

The opinion expressed in this correspondence last week that the proposed Cairo Moslem Conference, even if it comes to realisation, is not likely to achieve much, is already being justified. Not content to postpone the squabbling until the gathering of the Congress, when there would certainly be ample time for dispute, the ulema of Egypt have started a fierce controversy among themselves. The ulema of Alexandria, to whom the Al Azhar committee had sent a copy of the latter's manifesto for signature, not only refused to sign it, but went further, and drew up a manifesto of their own, which, in several points, contradicts that of the Cairo ulema. Now a third committee has been established in Cairo to deal with the same subject, and this body is in disagreement with the other two, and on the most vital point of all, for it declares that Abdul Mejid received a lawful Khalifal mandate, which he retains, and that only he can pass on the powers which which he is invested. This new committee seems to be gaining considerable support for its views, and it now seems certain that, between them, the various bodies in this country anxious for a settlement of the Khalifate dispute will so complicate the matter and each so thoroughly obstruct the other that nothing whatever will be accomplished. The great Cairo Khalifal Conference has, in short, now become a very doubtful starter.

Archæological Uncertainties.

The Mixed Court of Appeal's decision, announced last week, in the Tutankhamen tomb case came as no surprise to most people. It has always been understood that the mixed tribunals in this country had no power to upset an administrative decision of a Government department, and that, if a foreign subject felt himself aggrieved by such a decision, his remedy was to sue the Government in the Mixed Courts for damages. After the Procureur-General's summing up, in which this point was clearly brought out, the Appeal Court's judgment had been expected to be just what it turned out to be. Now, presumably, the next step will be for the Dowager Countess of Carnarvon and the executors of the Carnarvon estate to bring their action in the Courts for a share in the contents of the tomb, for the renunciation of these proceedings was made with a view to, and conditional upon, a settlement being reached. This case, if it comes on at all, will certainly not be heard before the autumn, and it is even now possible that an amicable arrangement between the parties will be reached before that time.

The Luxor Dispute.

Coming as a kind of sequel to the Tutankhamen dispute, the decision of the University of Pennsylvania to withdraw for the present its archæological mission from this country, has further emphasised the fact that archæologists are not feeling at all happy about the future of their work under the new régime in Egypt. The reason given for the withdrawal is the political situation in Egypt and the attitude of the Egyptian Government towards foreign archæologists. This explanation is rather misleading, for in the political situation at the present time there is nothing to alarm archæologists. It is the attitude of the Government, and, more particularly, of the Antiquities Department, which is the cause of all the trouble. Since M. Pierre Lacau became head of the department it has carried its passion for administration and interference to extraordinary limits, and, as was shown by the Tutankhamen proceedings, has succeeded in making work almost impossible for excavators, most of whose time is taken up in replying to official correspondence. A more specific grievance is the refusal of the Government to renew for any definite period the half-and-half share arrangement originated by Sir Gaston Maspero, under which all excavations have since been carried out. Only through drastic action by the leading archæological bodies, reinforced by diplomatic representations, was the Government persuaded, last year, to renew the agreement for another twelve months. To a body like the University of Pennsylvania it is, of course, essential that something tangible should be obtained and sent to America as proof that the money subscribed for the work is being used to some purpose, and also to fulfil the object for which subscribers supply the funds—namely, the enrichment of the collection of the University. As matters stand, excavators do not know where they are. The Government may at any moment give notice that the share-and-share alike basis will continue no longer, in which case there would be nothing for the archæologists to do but go home. Apparently Dr. Clarence Fisher, head of the Pennsylvania University's archæological mission here, thinks that there is a very good chance of the Government's taking such action in the near future, so he has gone home in anticipation.

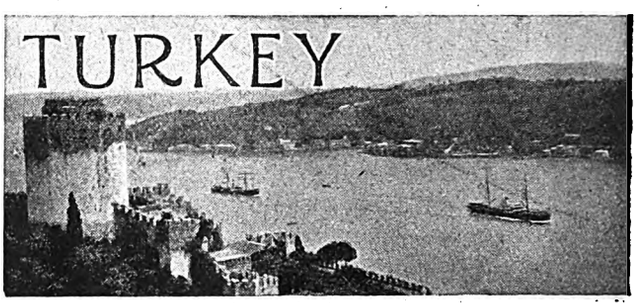
That his view is not shared by everybody seems to be suggested by the action of Professor James Breasted, head of the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago, who, in anticipation of several seasons of activity, has arranged to have built for himself a house at Thebes, north of the Temple of Medinet Habou. Mr. Callender, who was Mr. Carter's chief assistant, is supervising the building of the house, which it is hoped will be finished by next winter. It should, perhaps, be pointed out that Professor Breasted's relation to the Government is rather different from that of most of his colleagues, for he is not, and never has been, an excavator, and all that he ever wants to take away from the country are notes and records, on whose export there is at present no embargo.

A Legal Novelty.

There was an interesting event in the Meglis el Hasby Superior Court the other day, when a British barrister appeared before the Court, pleaded in Arabic, and won his case. The appeal was from an interdiction granted by the Native Court of First Instance against Madame Husnaker Hanoum, widow of Hassan Pasha Fouad el Monasterly, Minister of the Interior under the late Khedive Abbas I., on the ground of her alleged prodigality. The Native Court of First Instance granted the interdiction, and appointed a curator of the lady's estate. An appeal was lodged, the appellant putting her case in the hands of a British barrister, Mr. Moriarty, who briefed Mr. Ashley Powell, who recently retired from the Native Bench and was soon afterwards admitted as a barrister practising before the Court in which he had sat as judge. Mr. Powell has a complete mastery of the Arabic language, and the Court, after hearing his exposition of his client's case, reversed the decision of the lower court and restored to the lady complete freedom of action. This is believed to be the first time that a British barrister has ever pleaded before the Meglis el Hasby.

End of the Cairo Season.

The past week has been one of exodus. Shiploads of tourists have gone, and now the hotels are fast closing down for the summer. Except for occasional odd parties of visitors, one of which, 700 strong, is due at the end of this month, the season has come to an end. On the whole, it has been a very good season, certainly the best since 1914. Not only have there been more visitors than previously since the War, but also those who have come have seemed to have more money to spend. Probably 85 per cent. of the tourists have been Americans, and, perhaps, 5 per cent. British, though the British contingent has been much more important than numbers alone would indicate, for the average British visitor stays four or five times as long in the country as the average American, and also probably spends much more freely. A feature of the winter has been the return of the Germans, who have been much in evidence in Upper Egypt. Once again the season has been a late one in starting, and hotels which were half-filled during December and January, have been turning visitors away all through February and March. But, taken all round, the winter has been a good one, and next season holds out hopes of being even better.



Constantinople, April 8.

Debates in the Assembly.

The debates in the Assembly and the political progress of the country have continued to be interesting during the past week. The fight between the National Assembly, which claims to be the sole depository of the power of the State and to be indissoluble, and the Prime Minister, backed by the President and the Cabinet, is continuing, but in a less spectacular fashion. The newest cause of friction is the article of the Organic Statute, which enacts that the supreme command of the land, sea, and aerial forces of the Republic is vested in the President. There was strong opposition to this during the debate, for it was contended that the Assembly should not irrevocably delegate its powers in this manner to an irresponsible person (I quote the orator who opened the ball). An attempt to find the happy mean was made by members of the Commission responsible for the text of the Charter, who proposed that the article should be amended to read that in peace-time the Chief of the General Staff should act as Commander-in-Chief in the name of the President of the Republic, and in war the command should be confided to a special person nominated by the President, on the proposition of the Prime Minister. Even that did not satisfy the Opposition, who appear to envisage the possibility of conducting military operations in full-dress sittings of the G.N.A., and the debate continues.

It really does appear that the G.N.A. has succeeded in training in a comparatively short space of time that indispensable ingredient of all well-regulated Parliaments, an "Irish" party, which is consistently "agin' the Government." The only difficulty, however, is that they have done it too thoroughly, and made the "Irish" party too large, so that it has ceased to be an amusement, and has developed into an intolerable nuisance to the Cabinet.

The Three Armenians.

What is going to happen if this organised Opposition goes on is not easy to see, for the possibility of the Government's being permanently in a minority is not so very remote. Every opportunity is taken to make personal attacks on the Ministers, and the negative aim of these attacks, namely, to make life intolerable for the unfortunate Ministers, is strongly criticised in the moderate Press. An example is provided by an incident which has recently created considerable stir in Constantinople. Three very rich Armenians, who had previously fled the country, suddenly appeared in Constantinople as the result, it is stated, of having received an authorisation direct from the Ministry of the Interior. Immediately arose a great clamour and accusations against the Ministry of having yielded to the persuasive power of gold; this led to the immediate expulsion of the three Armenians at a few hours' notice. The great majority of the public comments on the incident revealed the fact that no one was particularly shocked by the hypothesis that bribery had been successfully employed, or by the fact that the Ministry was capable of performing such a rapid volte-face and yielding so abjectly to a little newspaper propaganda. As one Turkish paper pointed out, the only value of the incident in the minds of 99 per cent. of the thinking population was that it formed a convenient stick with which to beat the Minister of the Interior.

The Lausanne Treaty.

The debates in the House of Commons on the ratification of the Treaty of Lausanne are being followed here with intense interest, and the detailed account from the London papers which has been reproduced in the local Press seems to have produced a favourable impression on the whole. The Prime Minister's contribution to the debate had a very good Press, and his just remarks on the value of Lord Curzon's work in the making of the treaty have greatly impressed this people, whose political partisanship is so blind and unreasoning. A rather humorous sidelight is thrown on the subject by the fact that the Liberal mover of the amendment, Sir E. Grigg, was quoted in the telegraphic reports which reached here some days ago as Sir E. Grey, and from some of the Press comments—which were confined to the Turkish Press—it was perfectly clear that many of the local journalists had convinced themselves that that distinguished peer and late Foreign Minister, Lord Grey of Fallodon, was back in the Commons again.

General News.

The annual month of fasting, Ramadan, has begun, and we are awakened by gun fire in the middle of the night, and official business hours are from 1 p.m. to 5 p.m. The quarrel between the French Catholic schools and the Ministry of Public Instruction concerning the exposure of religious symbols in the school buildings has reached an acute stage, which is expected to result in the immediate closure of some of the schools. Vigorous discussions and negotiations are still going on about the fate of the Anatolian railway, and the Budget debates in the Chamber show no signs of finishing for many moons yet.

ALBANIA.

Tirana, April 8.

The Murder of the Americans.

Public opinion has received a great shock with the news of the murder of two American citizens at a lonely spot on the Tirana-Scutari road. The Government is taking immediate and energetic steps to discover the murderers.

Foreigners have always been treated with the greatest respect in Albania, and there is no case on record of a foreigner, unconnected with anti-Albanian political activities, ever having come to any harm in the country. There have never been any acts of brigandage in Albania such as have frequently occurred of late in Montenegro and have not been uncommon in Greece and Macedonia. It is difficult to believe, therefore, that the present crime has not been committed for political reasons by unscrupulous persons connected with anti-Albanian organisations outside the State for the purpose of discrediting the Albanian Government.

The Constitution.

Parliament has appointed a committee to draw up recommendations for the reform of the Constitution. The committee is expected to report before Easter, and it is anticipated that among the reforms advocated will be included the declaration of a Republic. It is by no means certain, however, that the Assembly would accept such a recommendation were it made.

Resignation of the Financial Adviser.

The Financial Adviser, M. Hunger, appointed by the League of Nations, has been asked to tender his resignation. He has accordingly complied, and has already left the country. For some time it has been felt that M. Hunger was not sufficiently experienced as a financier and not sufficiently in contact with the business world outside Albania to be of much assistance. But those who worked with him fully appreciated his high sense of honour and goodwill; so that his departure will be universally regretted on personal grounds.

Albania and the League.

The appeal of Albania to the League of Nations for assistance to provide necessaries for the mountain population who have been reduced to a state of starvation in consequence of the failure of the harvest two years in succession has been generously answered. The League has allocated 50,000 gold francs for the purpose and has appointed Prof. Pitard, who knows the country, to superintend the relief work. The League has, moreover, appealed to the Great Powers to supplement the above grant, and Italy has already responded with a gift of 500,000 lire (approx. £5,000). The British House of Commons is to be asked to vote a sum of £5,000, and France, too, will, it is announced, make a contribution.

Before this, efforts had been made to raise money privately. The Pope had already contributed 90,000 lire, and the fund organised by Miss Durham, Mrs. Parr (wife of the British Consul in Durazzo), and Mrs. Stirling (wife of the British Adviser to the Albanian Ministry of the Interior), had already raised close on £3,000 in England. A hundred and fifty tons of maize have been delivered, and Mrs. Parr is personally superintending the distribution in the Dibra district, where the distress is most acute. M. Pitard will accordingly find an efficient organisation supplied with full information already in existence and at his service on his arrival, both at Tirana—where Mrs. Stirling is presiding at headquarters—and at Scutari—where the Papal Nuncio has perfected his arrangements for assisting in the relief work through the Franciscans, whose missions are scattered throughout the northern mountains.

The Albanian Gendarmerie have succeeded in tracking the murderers of the two Americans to a place near Kruja, where they were cornered and resisted. Two were killed and one seriously

SYRIA.

(From an Occasional Correspondent.)

Beyrout, April 1.

Miscellaneous News.

General Weygand, Administrator of Syria, is leaving for Paris on April 7. He is returning to France with extensive plans for improvements of his charge. Meanwhile, he has reformed the municipal administration of Beyrout by creating a new body of fifteen members, native and foreign, presided over by a Town Prefect, to take the place of the old organisation. For the improvements of the city he has pulled down the northern construction from Souk Sursock to Bab Idris, and all the Cotton Street and Souk Bayatra, and is proceeding with the valuation of Souk Beyhum with a view to razing it and rebuilding it, and doing the same with old Khan Arwam and Souk Bazarkan.

The country is agitated over the Khalifate, but the learned class is reserving its judgment.

The members of the Imperial family, now refugees in Beyrout, are being sympathetically received.

AN INDIAN ART RENAISSANCE.

Speaking at a meeting of the India Society on April 15 at 21, Cromwell Road, the Earl of Ronaldshay declared that he would put two questions for consideration: first, what evidence was there of an Indian art renaissance; and secondly, assuming that evidence of a renaissance existed, what significance was to be attached to the movement? Although he could speak with first-hand knowledge only of Bengal, it was in Bengal that the chief evidence of an art renaissance was to be found. That evidence was at present provided mainly by the existence of a modern school of Indian painting in Calcutta which was associated with the names of the brothers Abanindra Nath and Gogenendra Nath Tagore. After tracing in detail the history of the modern school of Indian painting, the lecturer asked what was the significance attaching to the movement? It was an awakening race consciousness expressing itself in terms of art, and turning to the cultural traditions and ideals of India. On all sides in Bengal he had seen this unrest of spirit at work. He had traced it alike in movement which he had had unequivocally to condemn, and in movement which had seemed to him to be worthy of the highest encouragement and praise in the sphere of literature and art and in the arena of violent evolution and agitation.

Insignia of the Third Class.—Mr. Charles Edward Blyth, M.B.E., Assistant Chief Mechanical Engineer, State Railways; Mr. Basil Proctor Greenwood, Controller of Government Purchases, Ministry of Finance; Mr. Llewelyn Arthur Hugh-Jones, Financial Secretary, Ministry of Finance; and Mr. Howard Ryton Thomas Dray, Director Administrative Services, Survey of Egypt.

THE BYRON CENTENARY.

Greece is marking the centenary of the death of Lord Byron on April 19 by the issue of two commemorative postage stamps, of which reproductions are here given. The stamps, which have been designed and executed by Messrs. Bradbury, Wilkinson, and Co., Ltd., of New Malden, Surrey, are of the value of 80 lepta and 2 drachmæ respectively. The former, printed in blue, is in the form of a portrait of Lord Byron; the latter is mauve in colour, with a vignette in black, representing Lord Byron's arrival at Missolonghi.

In connection with the Imperial War Relief Fund's special appeal for a Byron memorial feeding centre among the 500,000 refugees in Greece, arrangements have been made for collections to be taken during the pilgrimage to the poet's tomb at Hucknall (Notts). The Committee of the Byron Festival at Montreux have also decided to invite subscriptions on the occasion of the official banquet during the celebrations. In addition, several private efforts in support of this appeal are being organised in England, and the Anglo-Hellenic League is co-operating in making the appeal known. Donations for this special appeal should be sent to Sir Maurice Bonham Carter, K.C.B., Imperial War Relief Fund, General Buildings, Aldwych, W.C.2, from whom details of the appeal may be obtained. A first instalment of £1,000 has been sent to Greece; this sum will provide for the feeding of 1,000 refugees for four months.

AN ARMENIAN'S WILL.

He left:—£10,000 to the trustees of Harrow School and £10,000 to His Holiness the Catholicos or Supreme Patriarch of All Armenians at Etchmiadzin, Erivan, Armenia, with the request that he would employ this sum as he should think fit in alleviating suffering among Armenians, and relieving the necessities of poor and needy Armenians, giving preference where possible to widows, orphans, boys under 12, and unmarried orphan girls under 15, expressly requesting that no part of this sum should be given to, or for the benefit of, clergy attached to monasteries.

THE "MOSLEM WORLD."

The April issue of the Moslem World is full of extremely interesting material, containing many articles of topical importance. Perhaps the most notable article is "Turkey Seen from Tarsus," which, with "France a Disintegrator of Islam," has a valuable political bearing. The whole issue, however, is of distinct use to the student of the Near East.

MEDIEVAL HISTORY.

"THE CAMBRIDGE MEDIEVAL HISTORY." Volume IV. The Eastern Roman Empire (717-1453). (Cambridge University Press. 50s. net.)

To no one more than the student of Near Eastern affairs is the study of medieval history important, for it was almost entirely during the seven hundred years or so that followed upon the rise of the Isaurian dynasty at Constantinople that the main problems now agitating the Near East arose. The growth of national feeling in the Balkans, Europe's attitude towards Islam, the schism in the Catholic Church—all these things, upon which no final settlement has yet been made, first agitated the world during the Dark and Middle Ages.

Now it has been the habit of historical students rather to disregard the Eastern Empire after about 1000 A.D., and to assume that after that date the Constantinople Empire went to its inevitable and deserved doom in degeneration and decadence. Recently, however, historians have begun to realise that to hold out against the Mohammedans for 450 years after that date must have implied some sort of virtue, and the fact that while the Turks were up to the Danube and had conquered practically all the land round the New Rome, Constantinople still held out, had especial significance. As usual, they had been led astray by Gibbon whose opinion of the Byzantines was very low. In his masterly introduction to the fourth volume of the Cambridge Medieval History, Professor J. B. Bury makes short work of this particular opinion of Gibbon, who said, "the vices of Byzantine armies were inherent, their victories accidental." Professor Bury says that this is precisely the reverse of the truth.

A valiant effort is here made to interest us in the Eastern Roman Empire, which is claimed as a civilised State to have performed three principal functions. "As in its early years the Roman Empire laid the foundations of civilisation in the West and educated Celtic and German peoples, so in its later period it educated the Slavs of Eastern Europe. Russia, Bulgaria, and Serbia owed it everything and bore its stamp. Secondly, it exercised a silent but constant and considerable influence on Western Europe by sending its own manufactures and the products of the East to Italy, France, and Germany. . . . In the third place, it guarded safely the heritage of classical Greek literature which has had on the modern world a penetrating influence difficult to estimate." One has to get some distance away from the multitudinous crimes and intrigues and factions of the late rulers of Constantinople to appreciate the truth of this, to take up the attitude, for instance, that the Crusades were to the Eastern Empire but untimely and difficult barbarian invasions, and never to forget that it was the political aspect of things which first and last interested the Greeks; but, having done this, one has to admit the justice of Professor Bury's claim. The Eastern Empire was indeed a bulwark against the East.

In this volume, which seems to us easily the best so far of the series, there are no chapters more interesting or more instructive than Professor Brébier's on the Greek and Roman Churches, Dr. William Miller's on the Balkan States, and Sir Thomas Arnold's on "Muslim Civilisation During the Abbasid Period." In these we feel more vitally than elsewhere the living hand of the historian, partly, perhaps, because of their absorbing and immediate interest, but also, it seems, because their authors realise that their subjects are very far from being dead bones. Professor Brébier, for instance, shows clearly that the great schism did not arise on religious issues, for the spirit of the two Churches themselves was conciliatory. The cause of the separation must, he states, be attributed "to the regard for its autonomy which inspired the Church of Constantinople." The schism, its creation and prolongation, were the result of political intrigue and jealousy, for "the majority of the Westerners and of the Greeks dreaded schism." It would thus appear that the splitting up of the Church was no more popular a movement than was in some parts the later schism of the Protestants from Rome.

Upon the Balkans, Dr. Miller, who keeps events of the whole period in admirable perspective, writes most engagingly—in somewhat striking contradistinction to some of the other contributors to this History, whose business would appear to be much more the accurate setting down of facts than a correct expression of them. One quotation from Dr. Miller will show the quality of his writing:—

> The medieval history of the Balkan States and the causes of their fall are full of significance for our own time. In the Near East, and in the Near East alone, the Middle Ages are but as yesterday to the newly emancipated nations, which look upon the centuries of Turkish domination as a watch in the night, and aspire to take up the thread of their interrupted national existence where it was left by their ancient Tsars, each regardless of the other's overlapping claims to lands which have been redeemed from the Turk. The medieval records of the motley peninsula teach us to regard with doubt, in spite of Turkish vicinity, the prospect of common action between Christian races, which, if small individually, would, if united, have formed a powerful barrier against the foreigner, either from the East or from the West.

Sir Thomas Arnold reminds us that, although we are accustomed to look upon the Abbasid epoch as one of the most wonderful periods of Islamic domination, its glories lasted but eighty-three years, and of the nature of the rule of these illustrious Mohammedans he says:—"The presence of the executioner by the side of the throne became under the Abbasids a terrible symbol of the autocratic character of their rule." It should be a comfort to playgoers to know that, at any rate, Masrur by the side of Haroun is an historically accurate figure.

On the whole, very great praise should be extended to the editors and the writers of this volume. Its facts and its conclusions, although, as indicated, often upsetting cherished, or at least firmly held, theories, are not likely to be disputed for a century or two. This volume is an improvement on its predecessors, partly because of the more interesting material, but also because it is better done. And this improvement is especially notable in the preparation of the maps, which, as usual, are separate from the main book.

PEACE WITH TURKEY.

The Treaty of Peace with Turkey has been ratified. On the second day of the second reading of the Bill in the House of Commons the only matter calling for notice was Mr. Lloyd George's contribution to the debate. As the general trend of the Lausanne Treaty, with all the advantages that it gives to Turkey, was the direct outcome of the policy for which Mr. Lloyd George had been responsible, it might have been expected that he would maintain silence on such an occasion. He preferred, however, to speak to his old brief, and showed that, in spite of all that has happened in the last two years, he has learned nothing of Near Eastern affairs. By common consent the speech was a complete failure as far as any effect on the House was concerned; but Mr. Lloyd George is still regarded in other countries as a factor in British politics, and for this reason it may be necessary to accord to the speech attention that it would not otherwise merit. After admitting that it would be a very grave responsibility to invite the House of Commons to reject the Treaty and to reopen a condition of war with Turkey, he proceeded notwithstanding to decry the Treaty, which he stigmatised as deplorable, humiliating, and a dark page in the history of British diplomacy. The speech was so full of the inaccuracies and half-truths in which Mr. Lloyd George invariably indulges when he has to speak on Near Eastern affairs, that it is significant of the truer understanding of those affairs which Parliament as a whole has acquired that it no longer allows itself to be misled by his oratorical efforts. It was recognised that the speaker was trying to defend his own mistaken policy rather than to deal with the Treaty itself or to further British interests in the Near East.

Mr. Lloyd George's remarks about Smyrna afford a good illustration of the slipshod arguments with which he seeks to support his case. The Smyrna question, to the ordinary man, means the decision of the Allies to send Greek troops to occupy the town when they were nominally at peace with the Turks, and before they had formulated terms of peace entailing the surrender to Greece of territory in Asia Minor. Mr. Lloyd George, by confusing this matter with the question of the territorial claims of the Greeks, sought to clear himself of all responsibility for the tragic blunder which made the Treaty of Lausanne inevitable. It must surely be a solecism in our Parliamentary annals that an ex-Prime Minister should try to exculpate himself by throwing blame on two Civil Servants, whom he mentions by name to the House. It is something worse when he deliberately misrepresents the facts. An Inter-Allied Commission was appointed to investigate the claims of Greece, and although it may have recommended that Smyrna should be handed over to the Greeks, it had nothing to do with the landing of Greek troops at that port in May, 1919. The decision to send a Greek army to Smyrna, as Lord Curzon points out in a letter to The Times, was taken in Paris by the so-called Big Four (or rather Big Three, as the Italian Prime Minister was absent at the time), and was unknown to the British Foreign Office. If report be true, the step had much more to do with a desire to put a spoke in the wheel of the Italians, who were at that period a temporary source of embarrassment to their Allies, than with any anxiety to give effect to "statistical facts." As for the restoration of King Constantine, to which Mr. Lloyd George attributes the non-success of his own Near Eastern policy, here again he is wrong in his facts, although it may have sounded impressive to state that there was not a battle fought between the Greeks and the Turks before Constantine demoralised the army by putting in command inferior generals, who were purely supporters of his dynasty, in which the Greeks did not defeat the Turks easily. King Constantine was restored in December, 1920. Prior to that date the only fighting that had taken place between Greeks and Turks since the Smyrna landing had to do with the easy capture by the former of Brusa and Adrianople. The first offensive proper launched by the Greeks took place in March, 1921, and according to the late M. Gounaris it was owing to the direct personal encouragement which he received from Mr. Lloyd George that the advance was ordered, with a view to carrying out Mr. Lloyd George's Near Eastern policy. Afium Karahissar and Eskishehir were occupied within five days, but from that point the Greek army was held by the Turks until the offensive was renewed in July. Again the Greeks advanced rapidly, and reached the Sakaria by September. By then, however, Greece had shot her bolt, only to find the Turks too strong for her. But the Greek successes, to which Mr. Lloyd George referred, were obtained after the Constantine restoration, and the demoralisation did not set in until six months, or more, later.

For the policy that failed Mr. Lloyd George claims that "it would have been the making of Asia Minor, it would have enriched humanity, it would have been a blessing to civilisation." Into the realm of the might-have-been there is no need to follow any orator, but we could wish that Mr. Lloyd George had shown a more statesmanlike appreciation of the actual situation. The Lausanne Treaty was before the House for ratification. By his own admission, it would have been a grave responsibility to reject that Treaty, and it follows as a natural corollary that it must be the duty of everyone with any pretensions to statesmanship, or even to ordinary patriotism, to work for the success of existing conditions. Whether or not it would have been better to have Western Asia Minor under Greece is no longer a question of practical politics. The Turks are now in possession, and British interests require the speedy establishment of good relations and complete confidence between Turkey and Great Britain. Unfortunately, it is such a speech as that made by Mr. Lloyd George, whom the foreigner regards as a potential Prime Minister, that causes the Turk to feel justified in retaining his suspicion of the British; for he imagines that a man who can still glory in a policy which has been proved a disastrous failure is capable of forcing it again upon his country if he should be returned to power. There is, of course, no ground for these Turkish fears, and it might not be amiss if the present Government were to take advantage of the formal notice of ratification to explain to the Turks that the real view of Great Britain is not that of Mr. Lloyd George, but rather that of the present Prime Minister, who had previously reminded the House of Commons that Turkey is "a nation for whose welfare and friendly views our great commonwealth of nations cannot afford to be indifferent."

THE ADAPTABILITY OF THE ISLAMIC LAWS.

By THE RT. HON. AMEER ALI.

The rulers of resurgent Turkey have signalised their re-entry into the comity of free nations by introducing some drastic changes in the institutions of the country. How far these changes were needed or how far they are conducive to political and economic stabilisation is a matter which concerns the people themselves. But their action has been differently interpreted and differently explained by foreign observers. The latest exposition is contained in Mr. Lyell's interesting article in THE NEAR EAST of April 10. To this exposition I take strong exception. He suggests in effect that the changes were induced by the unadaptability of the Islamic laws to modern conditions. This observation is clearly made on an erroneous apprehension, as it seems to me, of the Moslem civil law. The principle of development is embodied in the law itself. The dictum clearly stated in the Radd-ul-Muhtâr that judicial interpretation must be subject to "the necessities of the time" (Maslahat-ul-Wakt) points to the adaptation of the rules to circumstances arising from changing conditions in the affairs of the world. Considering that even in the eighth century of the Christian era Islâm had a regular procedure for the settlement of disputes far in advance of what Europe possessed until very recent times, shows the progress the Islamic laws had already made far beyond anything known in Christendom. As late as 1832 the common law of England allowed the settlement of disputes by battle.

The difference in the status of women under the English common law and the laws of Islâm is worthy of note. In England until some fifty years ago a married woman had no rights in respect of her property. Married or maiden, she possessed no civil rights. She could not sue in her own name; her couverture was a feudal bondage in disguise. In Islâm a woman possessed and exercised all the rights which a man did. She was even entitled to hold judicial offices. To state that Islamic laws are not adaptable to modern conditions is very far from the fact. Even a cursory study of the Moslem laws established a steady development in the interpretation and application of the laws. There is absolutely no reason to suppose that the laws of Islâm could not be made adaptable to modern conditions necessitated by the advance of time.

Nationalism does not appear to be altogether an unmixed blessing. The experience of to-day seems to show that it has a tendency to be intolerant and narrow; in fact, it means a reversion to the tribal instincts of early days, which confined fellowship within the tribe itself. Hence we see that the nationalities to whom the statesmen who were in charge of the destinies of Europe towards the end of the recent world-cataclysm have granted "self-determination," are raising fiscal and other barriers against free intercourse with neighbouring States.

The Prophet of Islâm, with an unparalleled insight into human nature, had in mind this tendency to reversion to primitive instincts when he proclaimed in his great Sermon on the Mount that all Moslems formed one brotherhood. This feeling of Ikhwiât constituted the great moral force which won for the Arabs the mastery of the world in as many decades as it took the Romans centuries to attain.

It is to be hoped that the severance of Turkey from other Moslem States will not be permanent. The unity of Islâm and the sympathy of the Moslems residing outside Turkey form an asset, the value of which can hardly be over-rated. This sympathy is not a new-born feeling; it dates back from a period when the Turkish power had weakened and her sovereignty was at the mercy of Europe.

It is almost universally recognised that new Turkey has obtained her liberation with great effort and extreme patience. She is entitled to exercise her rights as an independent State, with all the privileges attached to her status. At the same time other Moslems have the right to question the validity or expediency of an act which affects the whole world of Islâm. To this category belongs the spiritual headship of the Sunni world; it is an integral part of the Sunni system. It came into existence as a concrete institution on the death of the great Lawgiver of Islâm. Its origin, however, is traced to the time when the Prophet, during a temporary absence from Medina, left a Khalîfa (a deputy) to preside at the prayers—to act, in fact, as the Imâm of his people. Thus the Vice-gerent of the Prophet (the Khalîfa or Caliph)—the "Commander of the Faithful"—the Ameer-ul-Miminîn—is, by virtue of his office, the chief Imâm (the Imâm-al-Kabîr) of the vast Sunni congregation, now numbering over 250 millions. His presence, either actually or by proxy, is essential at the public prayers. The need for this is voiced by the Arab historian of the Khalifs when speaking of the events that followed on the sack of Baghdad. The Imâm forms the spiritual link between the congregation and the Prophet. He presides either in person or by proxy at the congregational prayers on Fridays, when the Imâm and the Mâmûm are united in holy communion. He is the symbol of Islamic unity: if he were to disappear, the Sunni congregation would fall to pieces.

It should be noted that temporal power is not essential to the exercise by the Imâm of his spiritual leadership. Under the later Abbasides the delegation of temporal authority became the rule, without any challenge to the spiritual headship. It would be the greatest tragedy to Islâm since the sack of Baghdad if this symbol of unity and of the faith as a moral force were to be made the subject of discord among Moslem nations.

IPEK.

By E. C. DAVIES.

The road that winds down the mountains to Ipek is a miracle of loveliness. Great rock cliffs tower on every hand, and the deep gorges fall away to terrible depths beneath one's feet. The streams are turbulent, rushing over rocky beds with a roar like thunder, lessening to an ominous voice of pent-up waters as the gorge narrows and the river reach ends in great rapids. Here and there springs spout from the cliffs and dash over the stones far below in shredded foam, many-hued as the sun pierces the mists of the high mountains. But, without warning, the cliffs widen out into a great plateau, and a wooden bridge gives passage over the turbulent river past grassy slopes to the orange-towered monastery of Ipek, its walls half-buried in the rock, as if keeping the landslides at bay throughout the centuries. A little farther on the little town of Ipek shows through the misty green of the orchards which embower it, the slender spires of its many minarets spearing the sky. As evening draws on the herds of buffaloes come back from pasture, and the tinkling of the goats' bells fills the quiet air till the sun sets in a blaze of crimson behind the dark mountains which encircle the town.

Under the brilliant sunshine of the daylight hours the old monastery is even more lovely than in the twilight. Its orange walls are very dark within the church, but the marvellous frescoes and pure Byzantine pictures which cover them are worth a wearier journey than the one from Mitrovitsa. Strangely modern in their almost futurist style, the decorations of wall and pillar, doorway and arch seem startlingly familiar. The Turks have removed, as they always did, the eyes from the pictures of saints and archangels, but the amazing beauty of the work of the unknown Serbian masters who painted them for the pleasure of the great Tsar Stephen has remained untouched by the passage of years.

Not many miles from Ipek is that other ancient home of Serbian culture of the Middle Ages—a period when the West was still emerging from barbarism—the monastery of Dechani. To reach it one travels along a road where every house is a fortress, with loopholes on the ground level and turrets with gun slits above. Here and there old Turkish block-houses stand, solid and square, bearing eloquent testimony to the respect held by the conquerors for the conquered, and in the distance loom the sullen mountains of Albania.

The interior of the church is a miraculous blue; pure lapis lazuli, into which the draperies of the figures and the background of the pictures melt and blend. The great screen is wonderfully carved and gilded, and the fine old door which the Turks tried to burn is still standing. Tsar Stephen wished to build this, his church, of gold and precious stones, but a soothsayer warned him that as his Empire would be reft from him the building must be of plain stone, for, said he: "If it be of gold greedy men will tear it to pieces; but if it be of stone it shall remain as a monument to God and you for ever." So Stephen built his church of fine marble, each pillar, 40 ft. high, cut from one single block, the capitals strangely carved; and as the church was built so it remains.

These old Serbian monasteries leave a strange memory in the mind—tokens of a civilisation cut off suddenly at its prime, and standing in the midst of a wilderness of Turkish desolation, as if in silent, eloquent testimony to the greatness of the Empire of the great Serbian Tsars. Tiny cases of culture in the centre of a conquering barbarism (for what monuments of culture and civilisation has the Turk ever left behind him in the Balkans to replace the ones he destroyed), they make an appeal far deeper than that of pure archæology, preserved as by some miracle for our eyes to see, and full of a romance which is lacking from many a monument of the ancient world.

And by right, as one has entered Ipek at dusk, one should leave it at dawn, a wonderful purple dawn which little by little flushes the towering crags behind the orange walls of the monastery a deep cerise, till at length the light touches the blue shadows beyond and wakens the sleeping white town with the brilliant sunshine of another day.

General Weygand, the High Commissioner of Syria, is reported to have made arrangements for receiving in Syria and the Lebanon 10,000 Syrian Orthodox, who, by order of the Turkish Government, are to leave the vilayets of Adana, Diarbekir, Urfa, and Aintab. Most of these refugees will be settled in the Lebanon.

The Armenian National Delegation has appealed to the Governments which are members of the League of Nations to facilitate the formation in their respective countries of national committees for the purpose of raising money to establish Armenian refugees as permanent settlers on lands at present available in Transcaucasia in view of the fact that there is no prospect of establishing any Armenian National Home in Turkey. Such national committees have already been set up in France (under M. de. Selves, Chairman of the Senatorial Committee on Foreign Affairs), and in Italy (under Signor Tittoni, President of the Senate).

THE ROYAL INSTITUTE.

At the Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours there are a few pictures the subjects of which are taken from the East. Carlton Smith, for instance, has two studies of Mysore; E. Glasgow is represented by the small but charming "Seller of Pohts, Tangier"; and E. A. Cox by the very fine "By the Sea of Galilee," a large canvas depicting types of men. Hal Hurst has a picturesque "A Wedding Caravan." But the paintings of most interest to readers of The Near East will be those by Charles Whymper and R. Talbot Kelly. The former has five: three of birds and two of Thebes—"Deir el Bahari" and "The Site of Tutankhamen's Tomb, in the Kings' Valley." The latter has four, of which two are "Karnak" (a beautiful example in blue mistiness) and "Court of the Mosque of Ibrahim Aga—Cairo." His "Fountain" also is a picture of much dignity and grace.

THE "BLUE PETER."

The Blue Peter of April is well up to the standard set by the editors in preceding issues. It contains, notably, an illustrated description of "The Aden Hinterland"—a part of Arabia rarely visited by tourists. The writer of this article persuades his readers that Lahej is well worth seeing.

NOTES AND NEWS.

167, Strand, London, W.C.2,
Tuesday Morning.

The Budget.

With the approach of Easter week only a little time remains before the Budget is upon us. I cannot say that it is anticipated this time with any special optimism. Everyone seems to have made up his or her mind that the Labour Government is not likely to bestow any benefits—at least not any that count. There have been one or two straws to indicate the direction of the wind, and they only point to the probability that Mr. Snowden's first Budget will be confined as far as reduction of taxation goes, to the breakfast table. No doubt the income taxpayer, who finds it increasingly difficult to meet each half-yearly instalment—and not infrequently has to do it from capital—will find ample compensation in the fact that his tea and sugar will cost him less for any disappointment he may feel at the Chancellor's unwillingness to touch the income-tax.

The Conference Resolutions.

In the anxiety of the Labour Government to deal with housing and other social questions, the resolutions passed by the Imperial Economic Conference would appear to be in danger of being ignored; at any rate, although this is the fourth month of the reign of this Administration, no date has yet been allocated for enabling the House of Commons to give its opinion on them. The Government, it must be emphasised, has been fortunate above its predecessors in an almost complete absence of criticism in the Press, due to the universal desire not to embarrass untried administrators, but the apparent neglect of so important a matter makes continued silence impossible. As I have pointed out, it is absolutely unthinkable that the resolutions should not be ratified, and as there can be no good reason for delay in bringing the matter before Parliament, it would certainly seem high time that some statement should be made on the subject. It is, unfortunately, too late, owing to the approaching holiday season, for the ratification to take place before the formal opening of the Wembley Exhibition, but it is eminently desirable from every point of view that it should be carried out as soon as Parliament reassembles.

Bulgarian Debt Negotiations.

It appears that, after all, there is a possibility that the negotiations with regard to the Bulgarian debt service may come to nothing. As I have already pointed out, no difficulty was experienced in arranging a settlement with the British bondholders, but the French, who hold 80 per cent. of the loan, have proved less accommodating. While the exact course of the negotiations is not yet known, it is believed that the French insisted on receiving 38 per cent. of the value of the coupons in gold, and that while the Bulgarians were willing to make concessions, they were unable to accede to this figure. It is now reported that the Bulgarian delegation is returning to Sofia, and if that is the case it will probably mean an end to hopes of a settlement for the present as far as British bondholders, too, are concerned, for while it is admittedly possible that the Bulgarians would consent to regard the negotiations in this country and France as things apart, it is actually extremely improbable that they would do so, for the British interest in the debt is relatively so small that it is unlikely that they would regard a separate settlement as worth while. It is too early yet, however, to say that the hope of a settlement on the terms provisionally arranged here must be abandoned, and I understand that there may be developments in the course of the next few days.

Indian Bank Rate Reduced.

The most interesting item of news during the week with regard to India was the reduction of the discount rate of the Imperial Bank of India from 9 to 8 per cent. This marks the end of the monetary stringency which inevitably occurs in the cold weather season as a result of the financial requirements in connection with the export of the crops. Last year, it may be noted, the rate was not raised above 8 per cent.; this season it has been 9 per cent. for nearly two months. The reason for its reduction is, of course, the fact that the proceeds of the crops are beginning to be received, and there should now be a steady decline in the rate until it reaches the normal level.

Empire Cotton Growing.

On another page in this issue will be found extracts from an article in the Empire Cotton Growing Review on cotton growing in the Empire, in which stress is laid on the great opportunity afforded by present conditions for the development of cotton growing in new regions. Cotton to-day stands at a relatively high price, and it might reach almost prohibitive figures if the world demand to-day approached the normal. At its present price there is every incentive for the development of cotton cultivation, and it is satisfactory to know that every effort is being made to take advantage of the position. The progress that has been, and is being, made in the Sudan borders on the miraculous. It takes a long time before a cotton crop bulks large in a country's exports, and the advance in the Sudan would not impress if measured in the percentage of bales to the world's cotton production, but it will only be a few years now before the Sudan will be in a position to make a really important contribution to the Empire's cotton requirements.

A Bulgarian Deal.

I mentioned some time ago that owing to the existing conditions Bulgaria was not deriving anything like the benefit she should be from her large tobacco production. This, be it noted, was before developments with regard to Greece opened up for Bulgaria the prospects of new markets. Now, according to a message from Sofia, Bulgaria is beginning to find her tobacco of considerable use in obtaining necessary commodities from other countries. Bulgaria is in serious need of rolling stock, while Czecho-Slovakia, which is rapidly becoming a great manufacturing country, can find a use for a large amount of tobacco. So, following an investigation into the question of the purchase of rolling stock in exchange for tobacco, the Bulgarian Cabinet is reported to have approved an offer by the Czecho-Slovakian Régie to purchase five million kilos of tobacco and two million more later on, provided Bulgaria purchases rolling stock in Czecho-Slovakia. That is certainly the most obvious way of overcoming the difficulties presented by the exchange, and it is to be regretted that there seems at present little prospect of this country negotiating a deal with Bulgaria on similar terms. Once it is certain, of course, that Bulgarian tobacco will prove acceptable, then the position will be very different.

Jaffa Oranges.

I have heard some particularly favourable comments on the quality of Jaffa oranges this season, and there seems no doubt that the reputation of the Palestine fruit never stood higher with consumers than it does at the present time. I have been particularly struck by the size of some of the fruit I have come across. One orange was so extraordinary—in height it was far larger than any grape fruit I have seen—that out of curiosity I had it weighed, and the scales registered 1 lb. 1¼ oz.! Can any of my readers beat that?

Egyptian Market.

The first dividend proposed on the ordinary shares of the Egyptian Markets for the past year of 7 per cent., making the total 12 per cent., as against 10 per cent. for the preceding twelve months, indicates a very marked improvement in the company's business. For a considerable part of 1922, of course, the company was confronted with very adverse conditions, and the improved results reflect the better political and commercial situation during the past year.

SPECIAL MARKET REPORTS.

Tehcran, March 8.

The market has been quieter than during the preceding week. The kran was scarcer. This week, owing to the holidays, the banks have only been open for four days to enable merchants to sell the balance of their goods which could not be forwarded to the interior, as the roads are still shut by snow.

Haifa, March 15.

The cereal market has been active this week, and the rather numerous offers have been rapidly absorbed. The tendency to rise continues, in spite of the arrival of wheat from Syria.

Nablus, March 22.

There has been a general rise in cereals in general, and in wheat in particular, as a result of the reduced stocks in the country. Olive oil for the manufacture of soap is also firm, but Naboulsi soap in Egypt does not seem to follow this firmness.

Haifa, March 22.

The cereal market continues to be active. But although offers are everywhere abundant, prices follow a constantly rising tendency, which has been maintained up to the end of the week.

Cyprus, March 8.

There is a very slight improvement in our markets. Prospects of the crops continue satisfactory.

Cyprus, March 15.

The slight improvement mentioned in our last report is being maintained.

Jaffa, March 15.

Orange prices continue to be good. The season is now drawing to its close. Other market conditions are unaltered.

MYSORE GOLD MINING COMPANY.

The report of the Mysore Gold Mining Company for 1923 states that the ore crushed was reduced by 20,598 tons; the cyanide department, however, dealt with 18,259 tons more of sand and slime and the total recovery of fine gold from all sources (125,045 ozs.) shows a decrease of only 3,206 ozs. The contents of ore milled averaged 11.092 dwts. fine gold per ton, or 0.949 dwt. higher, and the extraction represented 98.05 per cent., against 98.15. The gold produced realised £573,981, and with £137 adjustment on the previous year's production and £894 for silver, a total of £575,013 was received. After deducting £31,576 for royalty and refining charges, and adding £16,661 for interest and other receipts, the total income was £560,098. The working costs amounted to £362,202, leaving a profit of £197,896, plus £8,291 brought in and £1,693 dividends received; total, £207,880. Income-tax account absorbed £21,296, amounts written off buildings, machinery, etc., £21,752, transferred to insurance and contingency fund £10,000, prospecting department £719, and the directors have paid a final dividend of 1s. 6d. per share (making 2s. 3d. for the year), carrying forward £15,926, subject to corporation profits tax and percentage on dividend.

Engineering Topics.

(By Our Engineering Representative.)

The Citroën-Kegresse.

The Citroën-Kegresse, the first vehicle to cross the Sahara, and the pioneer of cross-country motoring, has established a form of transport which is likely to have tremendous developments, with far-reaching effects, in the course of the next few years. These effects will be most widely felt in the colonies and undeveloped lands where roadless transport can be a real boon to farmers, settlers, engineers, miners, railway companies, etc.

As an instance of the varied work which the Kegresse can perform, two widely divergent uses may be noted. On the one hand, this vehicle is very much at home over snow and ice, and has recently given some marvellous demonstrations of its prowess at Chamonix, amidst the snows. On the other hand, it is unquestionably the best form of traction available for climbing sand dunes and for covering stretches of loose shifting sand.

An important point in connection with the Kegresse is that it travels quickly and comfortably along roads like an ordinary touring car, which it resembles in appearance, except for the flexible canvas and rubber band at the rear which is the most striking mechanical feature of the machine. This band, with its wide contact surface, enables the Kegresse to cross rocky and rough country in a manner not possible to vehicles fitted with pneumatic tyres, which are liable to puncture and burst.

A trial run on the Kegresse will convince those interested that cross-country motoring is now definitely a commercial proposition, for the amazing feats of the Kegresse have literally to be seen to be believed.

The McKenna Duties.

It is scarcely an exaggeration to say that the prospect that the Government will abandon the McKenna duties has caused consternation among manufacturers of light cars. The duties in question, it may be mentioned en passant, are imposed on imported motor-cars and a few other commodities, and they amount to 33⅓ per cent., and in view of their effect it is difficult to understand how the question of their abolition could possibly come under consideration. For the light car industry the duties have meant a very great deal. When the War ended this industry had been almost lost to this country, and foreign firms had the market almost to themselves. As a result of the slight protection afforded by the duties—it is sufficient to help the home manufacturers without killing the import trade—the industry is recovering in a wonderful way, and now may be said to be on its feet again. The result has been a great increase of employment in connection with the manufacture of motor-cars, not only through the development of British firms, but because the changed conditions have led foreign firms to establish works in this country. One would think, in the circumstances, that the facts would prevent any Government from interfering with the duties, least of all a Government which professed at the General Election to have a specific remedy for unemployment. It now, apparently, contemplates an action which can have no other result than to increase it. If such a thing were to happen in another country one might smile; in the circumstances one can only deplore the pass to which we are brought by the party system. The removal of the duties would naturally occasion widespread rejoicing abroad and in the Free Trade ranks at home, where the defence of a worn-out shibboleth is regarded as the Alpha and Omega of policy. How it would be regarded by those who might be sent to join the unemployed is another matter. Of course, the question will be hotly contested in the House of Commons, and as even the ranks of Labour are divided on the subject—which is scarcely surprising, for if there be any merit in these or other duties the working-man is certainly in a position to appreciate it, it is to be hoped that the Government will pause before endeavouring to make a change.

Carburisation.

I have just been reading an interesting article on carburisation by Mr. J. W. Urquhart in the series of heat treatment bulletins issued by the Automatic and Electric Furnaces, Ltd., and it will, I think, be of interest to my readers to summarise what the writer says. He points out that the development of the heat treatment of steel led to the discovery that the relative weakness of the initial material was very greatly increased owing to the high temperature employed, but, owing to the progress of metallurgical research, it is now possible to "regenerate" the initial core steel and even to increase the tensile strength inherent to it. The writer goes on to deal with the elementals of carburisation, and points out that the result of the process is a casing of carbide of iron, forming high carbon steel, the thickness of the zone depending on the degree of heat and the period of time of exposure, affected to some degree by the "cement" utilised. Uniformity of temperature is the essential element, as if the heat fluctuates the composition of the case will do so also. "A perfect case will exhibit a maximum carbon content at the surface, very gradually decreasing in 'carbon richness' until it fades into the structure of the initial steel." If there are fluctuations of temperature they will be reflected in the micrographic structure of the carburised zone. On the content of heat, in fact, depends the success of carburisation. The self-controlled furnace of the Automatic and Electric Furnaces, Ltd., is admirable for the purpose, being uniform in its output of heat units, and yet capable of giving immediately if necessary the slight increase of temperature that is so often required.

Continental Contract for British Firm.

In view of the criticisms which have recently appeared regarding the placing of engineering contracts on the Continent by British purchasers, it is refreshing to hear that the tables are sometimes turned. The municipality of Copenhagen has just placed a very large contract for a complete boiler-house equipment for the municipal electric power supply station with Vickers Spearing Boiler Co., Limited, London, an affiliated company of Messrs. Vickers, Limited. The contract includes boilers of 2,000 h.p. each, with economisers, stokers, air heaters, superheaters, mechanical stokers, and all accessories. The whole of this plant will be manufactured in Great Britain. The contract was obtained in open international competition, and was awarded on the merits of the proposal.

The text of the Tangier Convention of December 18, 1923, which has not yet been ratified by Great Britain, has been published as a White Paper (C.M.D. 2,096. Price 1s.).

The Egyptian Ministry of Finance has at last approved the credit of £28,000 for building a special wing to the Cairo Museum for housing the treasures taken from Tutankhamen's tomb. The original proposal to build this wing was made last September.

PROJECTED YUGOSLAV AGRICULTURAL BANK.

According to a report received from the British Commercial Secretary at Belgrade regarding the draft law providing for the establishment of the Zemljoradnicka Banka (Agricultural Bank), the bank will be a State institution, and its capital and reserve funds will be the property of the State. The founding capital will be 500,000,000 dinars. Fifty per cent. of the net profits of the State Lottery, 75 per cent. of the profits of the State Mortgage Bank, and 10 per cent. of those of the Post Office Savings Bank will be used as capital for the Zemljoradnicka Banka. The funds arising from the liquidation of the former Agricultural Bank at Skoplje will be devoted to the same object.

The Minister of Finance will be authorised to provide 50,000,000 dinars from the Budget surplus of 1924-1925 for capital for the bank. Departmental budgets may also include sums for the same purpose. The bank will give loans at 6 per cent., and in no case can it charge rates of interest more than 2 per cent. higher than the discount rate of the National Bank.

The bank will give short, medium, and long-term credits. Short-term credits will be given to agriculturists for the purchase of fodder, manures, seeds, and for harvest, threshing, and similar purposes, and especially for assistance in famine years. Medium-term credits will be granted for the purchase of livestock, implements, machinery; the preparation of new vineyards and orchards; and the repair of houses. Long-term credits will be allowed for the purchase of land, repayment of debts on land and new buildings, and similar purposes. Long-term credits will not exceed fifteen years in duration. The bank will receive savings deposits.

LONDON PRODUCE REPORT.

Figs in Good Request.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, Tuesday Morning.

Sugar.—Home refined has continued in good demand. Tate's cubes are 64s. 3d., London granulated is 60s. 7½d., while Lyle's granulated is 60s. 10½d., these prices being the same as last week. Foreign descriptions have been uncertain. White Mauritius at 57s. 9d. is 3d. down, white Java is unchanged at 58s. 6d., while Czech granulated is the same at 59s. 6d. Futures are easy. Quotations are: May 28s. 10½d.; August 26s.; September 25s. 4½d.; November 22s. 6d.; December 22s. 6d.

Coffee.—The market has been very dull in some cases. Costa Rica has shed 14s. at 150s., East Indian is 30s. lower at 120s., Santos is unchanged at 95s., while Nairobi at 125s. is 11s. up.

Oilseeds.—Linseed has been dull, with Indian 7½d. down at 19s. 4½d., and La Plata 2s. 7½d. lower at 17s. 9d. Rapeseed has been firm. Toria is 4½d. up at 17s. 10½d., while real bold Ferozepore is 6d. up at 17s. 3d. Cottonseed has been quiet. Indian is 1½d. down at 10s., Egyptian black is unchanged at 13s. 1½d., while Sakellarides is 4½d. down at 12s. 1½d.

Seed Oils.—Linseed oil has been steady, and at 38s. 3d. is 3d. up. Rape oil has been steady, with crude unchanged at 47s. 6d. and technical refined the same at 50s. 6d. Cotton oil has been steady. Refined common edible is unchanged at 47s., Egyptian crude is the same at 41s. 6d., and deodorised is unaltered at 49s.

Oil Cakes.—The market has been rather weak. Linseed cake is 5s. down at 230s., cottonseed cake is 5s. down at 150s., while coconut cake is unchanged at 195s.

Dried Fruit.—On the whole business has been rather brisk during the week. Currants, as usual, have been a good spot, and as stocks of some grades are very scarce and in one or two cases almost exhausted, the tendency is for the market to harden. There was again a good demand for sultanas. An excellent business has again been done in figs; indeed, the activity in this commodity has been one of the features of the market. Plums have continued to move off freely. There has not been much activity in dates.

Oranges.—The market is very firm, and the tendency is for prices to move upwards.

AGRICULTURE IN IRAK.

Good Demand for Cotton Seed.

The following extracts are taken from the Agricultural Bulletin of Irak for the month ended March 15:—

The late winter season has been unusually mild. The distribution of rains from the beginning of the year has been most favourable to the growth of winter crops. As a result of the January and early February rains, sowing of wheat continued over the greater part of the country nearly to the end of February. The late sown areas are expected to give a very small crop. The total area under wheat and barley is believed to be slightly in excess of that of the last two years. So far the season has been favourable to the crop of winter cereals.

Water is reported to be sufficient for the present demands of cultivators on all irrigated areas. A temporary shortage of kerosene in the Baghdad depot caused a fairly considerable amount of discontent amongst pump owners; the situation would have been more serious were it not for the favourable rains which fell during the second week of March.

The demand for cotton seed is brisk now that the sowing season has started. The total amount of cotton seed issued by Messrs. the British Cotton Growing Association is 50 tons, sufficient to sow 3,762 acres. Cotton cultivators are giving much more attention than hitherto to the preparatory cultivation of the land and to ridge making. There exists a fair demand for ploughing of cotton land by tractor; a British firm in Baghdad is at present meeting this demand in part.

The general condition of live stock is poor, as is expected at this season when grazing continues to be scarce and the demand made on draft animals is so heavy.

The soil analysis of the Saklawiyah area is making good progress. An analysis of Mesowhite cotton seed shows that the fat content is slightly below the average for American upland seed; but the linters were exceptionally high. With present quotations for Mesowhite seed at £2 per ton in Baghdad, it is not improbable that the extraction of oil from cotton seed on a commercial scale may develop into an important industry when cotton is cultivated on a large scale.

of cotton in Egypt and elsewhere, has been found to have a winter habit which differs appreciably from its summer habit.

Various specimens of selected fruit trees, kindly presented by the United States Department of Agriculture, have arrived safely. The extension of fruit garden cultivation is most noticeable wherever facilities permit of such extension.

A seed testing station has been opened in Basrah, and legislation to control the importation of seeds and plants will shortly be enforced.

The July to February exports of wheat from Irak were 66,998 and of barley 82,971 tons—total 149,969 tons, as compared with 125,762 tons for the same period in 1922-1923. The total exports of the 1923 crop of dates to the end of February, 1924, were 123,533 tons, valued at Rs. 14,457,708, as compared with 102,687 tons, valued at Rs. 12,553,407, for the corresponding season last year. The July to February exports of wool were 3,420 tons, as compared with 1,326 tons for the same period of 1922-1923.

STARCH INDUSTRY IN YUGOSLAVIA.

The British Commercial Secretary at Belgrade, in a report on the Yugoslav starch manufacturing industry, states that there are three large modern starch factories at Vrsac, Jabuka, and Subotica, and several small factories, of which two are at Subotica and one at Miletitch. A large starch factory at Veliki Beckerek was dismantled immediately after the Union. The Jabuka factory produces maize starch only, and has lately been entirely rebuilt and modernised. The factories at Vrsac and Subotica make, in addition to maize starch, wheat starch, glucose, dextrine, and dextrose. None of the factories is working at full capacity. The manufacturers attribute this to the insufficient protection they enjoy, and point out that starch is imported from America, although they could produce sufficient of this commodity to cover local needs. This American starch is imported, in the form of starch "flour" (farina), by way of Salonika into South Serbia, where it is largely used in the preparation of ratluk (the sweetmeat known as "Turkish delight"). It is expected that the new Customs tariff now being elaborated will afford sufficient protection to enable the local starch industry to compete successfully with the foreign product.

It is reported that the Yugoslavian State Hypothecation Bank, in Belgrade, has arranged a 12-year loan for 15,000,000 Swiss francs with a Swiss financial group at 7 per cent., at an issue price of 98 per cent., guaranteed by the State.

SUDAN PRODUCE.

The following extracts are taken from the report of the Central Economic Board of the Sudan Government for February :—

Gum.

The exports of gum via Port Said during February were as follows, the values being given in parentheses :—1 ton of bleached (£E70), 2,068 tons of hashab (£E87,320), 175 tons of talh (£E4,119), and 2 tons of gum dust (£E36).

Kordofan Province.—6,975 kantars of gum were sold in El Obeid market during the month, as against 14,203 kantars during the same month last year. The average price was £E1.212 m/ms. per kantar. The arrivals at El Obeid from Nahud were 1,310 kantars, as against 6,423 kantars last year. The amount sold at Nahud during the month was 3,615 kantars, as against 8,381 kantars last year, the average price being £E1.078 m/ms. the kantar. 7,094 kantars were sold at Um Ruaba at an average price of £E1.184 m/ms. the kantar, as against 7,024 kantars last year. At Rahad 5,184 kantars were sold at an average price of £E1.189 m/ms., as against 6,441 kantars during the corresponding month last year.

Kassala Province.—At Gedaref the price of hashab has gradually risen from £E0.700 m/ms. per kantar at the beginning of the month to £E0.793 m/ms. at the end, and talh from £E0.280 m/ms. to £E0.300 m/ms. after touching £E0.324. At Mafaza the price of hashab dropped from £E0.812 m/ms. at the beginning of the month to £E0.757 m/ms. on the 25th. The total gum exported to date is 25,550 kantars, of which all but 1,959 was hashab. This compares with 22,174 kantars to February 26 last year.

Cotton.

Kassala Province.—The damage to cotton due to the cold spell of three or four days commencing on February 6, when the temperature in the Gash Delta dropped to about 41 deg., was serious. The Inspector of Agriculture estimates the loss at 9,500 kantars (315 rottles seed cotton), which means that the crop will be reduced to about the level of last year. He states, however, that the plants are now putting forth a new growth of leaves, which may produce cotton of a kind at the end of the season. He reports as follows on the markets :—

Hadaliya.—Four markets were held during the month, and arrivals to date total 517 kantars. The quality of the cotton has been good on the whole, 264 being first-class.

Mekali.—Two markets were held during the month, and 123 kantars were brought in, of which 107 were first-class. Mekali is producing very good quality cotton, and seems to promise better than Hadaliya.

Kassala.—The first market was held on the 27th instant. A total of 178 kantars was weighed in. The quality is generally poor, the bulk being grades 3 and 4.

It will probably be necessary to institute a fifth grade for cotton almost immediately as there is a likelihood of this grade turning up now instead of at the end of the season as in normal years. 493 kantars of rain cotton have been brought into Gedaref and Mafaza to date.

Red Sea Province.—Tokar.—The cotton is very promising and picking is proceeding actively. About 9,000 kantars (315 rottles) unginned have been picked. The cost of picking at present is 2 m/ms. per rottle. Some of the cotton picked will hardly be top grade, as it is from bolls prematurely opened.

Khor Arbaat Cotton.—The first of this cotton came into the market on February 25, the quantity being 53 kantars of 315 rottles (unginned). It was classified as "Good Fair."

Berber Province.—Bouga.—784 kantars of 315 rottles (unginned) of cotton were brought in during the month, the total to the end of February being 2,333 kantars. Mikeilab.—458 kantars of cotton have been brought to the store. Gendettu.—Up to February 29, 2,339 kantars of cotton had been weighed into store. There is still a fair crop of bolls, and picking will continue until early in April. Kitiab.—364 kantars of cotton were brought in during the month, bringing the total up to date to 2,088 kantars of 315 rottles (unginned).

Dongola Province.—Nuri.—Cotton is looking well; the first picking is about over, and, by the appearance at present, the second picking will be good, as many bolls have formed, and are still forming. The average yield is slightly over 3 kantars of 315 rottles per feddan. The American cotton on the Government experimental land has yielded 5 kantars per feddan up to date, and should yield about 1½ kantars per feddan yet. The total cotton received into store to end of February is 2,160 kantars, in addition to which 133 kantars of sagia cotton have been received. Gureir.—Cotton has now yielded almost 2 kantars of 315 rottles (unginned) per feddan, all over, and the crop is still yielding freely. The total quantity weighed into store up to the end of month is 616 kantars. Ghaba.—1,154 kantars of cotton have been received into store during the month. This represents a yield of 2.56 kantars per feddan over the whole area.

SMYRNA FRUIT MARKET.

Messrs. C. J. Giraud and Co., of Smyrna, report as follows under date March 29:—

The arrivals on the market since the opening of the season are estimated at 37,600 tons, and the sales are put at 37,100 tons.

During the ten days following our preceding report of March 8 business was practically suspended, but signs of renewed demand finally set in, resulting in the purchase of a total of about 1,000 tons of sultanas, almost exclusively for shipment to Holland and Germany. Shippers are carrying no stock, and in view of the scarcity of supplies, the market is hardening and purchases are becoming increasingly difficult. The visible stocks in Smyrna and in the interior are now estimated at about 1-1,200 tons, and business must shortly come to a complete standstill for the season. The figures given of the shipments per s.s. Berenice, Egina, and Irene consist of 90,318 b/s and 15,291 bags, representing a net weight of 1,440 tons sultanas.

COMMERCIAL BREVITIES.

The Imperial Bank of India has reduced its rate of discount from 9 to 8 per cent.

The capital of the Commercial Bank of Greece is to be increased to 50 million drachmæ.

The traffic receipts of the Suez Canal from March 29 to April 4 amounted to 3,710,000 francs, against 3,200,000 francs.

The production of crude oil by the British Burmah Petroleum Company and the Rangoon Oil Company in March amounted to 59,244 barrels.

Anglo-Egyptian Land Allotment.—Coupon No. 15 of Ordinary shares is now payable at piastres tariff 10 at rate of exchange of 97½ piastres per £, less tax.

Dacia Romano—Production March, 276 tons. Drilling wells: Moreni No. 1 drilling in, No. 3 depth 377.50 metres, No. 4 depth 382 metres. Producing wells: Moreni No. 2 cleaning. Other fields no change.

The progress reports of Phœnix Oil and Transport Company and allied companies for March show that the total crude oil production for the month was 10,805 tons and the throughput of the refineries 9,052 tons.

Commercial Bank of the Near East.—Holders of share warrants to bearer will receive payment of dividend of 4 per cent., less tax, on surrender of coupon No. 1 at the London office of the bank, 1, Broad Street Place, E.C.2.

The directors of the Royal Exchange Assurance have decided to recommend the General Court, which will be held on April 30, to declare a dividend of 17 per cent., less tax, making 25 per cent., less tax, for the year.

The Madras and Southern Mahratta Railway Company has declared an interim dividend for the half-year, payable July 1, of £3 10s. per cent., namely, guaranteed interest £1 15s.; stockholders' revenue account, £1 15s.

The Westminster Bank has been invited to participate in the spaces occupied by the Australian section at the British Empire Exhibition, and arrangements have been made for opening a branch under the management of Mr. Gayfer.

The traffic receipts of the South Indian Railway Company for the week ended March 15 amounted to Rs. 9,82,335, making the total from April 1 Rs. 4,81,16,715. For the corresponding periods of the previous year the totals were Rs. 8,76,100 and Rs. 4,63,78,485.

The newspapers state that the Bureau of War Losses has assessed at 666,000,000 gold francs the losses sustained by Greece during the war (says a Reuter message from Athens dated April 9). Against this, Greece received reparation in kind amounting to 20,000,000 gold francs from Germany.

In Messrs. Samuel Montagu and Co.'s review of the foreign exchanges it is stated that the past season's tobacco crop in Yugoslavia has yielded 40,000,000 kilogrammes of tobacco, of which one-half will be required to meet home consumption, while the remaining 20,000,000 kilogrammes are available for export. The entire yield of tobacco in Yugoslavia is purchased from the growers by the Government Monopoly Administration, in whose hands, of course, all export of this commodity lies. Strong representations are, however, now being put forward to abolish the monopoly and to make tobacco growing for export one of the free trades. This course, it is argued, would result in increased production and export, while the loss of monopoly profits would be made good by customs and other dues.

Cotton and Cotton Goods.

COTTON GROWING IN THE EMPIRE.

Stimulus of High Prices.

The current issue of the Empire Cotton Growing Review contains an important article on "Cotton Growing in the Empire," in which stress is laid on the need of greater supplies of raw cotton, and it is pointed out that if these can be provided within the Empire, "so much the better will it be for all concerned." The article continues :—

"The proposition sounds comparatively simple —grow more cotton in the Empire and all will be well. Yet this is as difficult a problem to solve as could well be desired, and if it is solved with any approach to rapidity the fact will be due rather to the logic of events than to other things; nothing could be a greater stimulus to cotton cultivation than the present high prices. Leaving out of consideration here the special markets supplied by the long staple cottons, Egyptian and Sea Island, it may be said that the market has been all but entirely provided with cotton of medium staple by the United States of North America. . . . Had this supremacy been due to chance it would have been lost permanently, and not merely for a time, during the five years of the Civil War. The problem is at bottom a financial one, and America has owed her supremacy to the fact that she could produce cotton well, of good quality, and at a price with which no other nation could compete. India could compete in cheapness of production, but her cotton was of inferior quality; no other country could turn out cotton of medium staple in large quantity at a price to compete with the U.S.A."

The introduction of new factors in recent years, it is pointed out, has altered the whole position. "The most important of these is the ravages caused by the spread of the boll-weevil in the cotton belt of North America. This has caused a considerable diminution in the crop, and at the same time has involved many expensive measures of treatment (not always effective) and precaution, with the result of a rise in prices. Cotton can no longer be grown to profit at the old cheap rates, even when allowance is made for the general rise in cost due to the war; yet it is an indispensable product. . . .

"The general effect of the new factors which are in operation in the U.S.A. is thus to diminish the supply and to increase the cost of production. The price in Europe is therefore rising, and this tends to be accentuated by the fact that the demand for cotton goods in America has been increasing very much of recent years, so that the supply of raw cotton for Europe has been further diminished. As a result of all this, America being still by far the largest source of supply, the price of raw cotton upon the market has risen to nearly three times its old figure.

"Nothing could possibly act as a greater stimulus to the extension of cotton cultivation in new fields than this prevailing high price, and the fact that the area under cotton in the U.S.A. is not extending with great rapidity goes to show that that country has begun to near its maximum effort in this direction, for, of course, in new extension, America would necessarily start at an advantage over competitors. The field is therefore open to other countries to enter if they can produce cotton to a profit at the present prices, under the conditions which prevail in them. Brazil and Peru are already appearing upon the market upon a large scale, and there seems no reason why the countries of the Empire should not occupy a vastly more important place among those which provide the bulk of the supply.

"If people are to grow cotton, they must be shown—for a great proportion of the potential cultivators in the Empire are ignorant villagers in countries which have been largely cut off from the general stream of civilisation—that it offers as good prospects as anything else, and later they must be shown how (by improved methods, better stocks, etc.) to reduce expenses, so that they may continue to make a profit even though prices may fall."

The possibilities of the situation are summarised as follows :—

"A chance such as never before came in their way is thus given to other countries which hitherto have never been able to compete upon the open market in cotton. It is now up to them to seize the chance and become producers upon the large scale; all that they are likely to be able to produce will be easily consumed. Attention must be paid to land and its availability, to suitable climate and soil, to the provision of transport facilities, to the provision of capital and labour, to suitable education, and to the other preliminaries of successful agriculture upon the large scale. Unless these preliminary factors are kept at full working efficiency one or other of them will become 'limiting' and scientific work upon improved breeds, better methods, etc., will be of no avail."

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Futures Firmer.

The Alexandria Commercial Company, in their report for the week ended April 4, state :—

Since our last report the futures market has been much firmer, especially for Sakellarides. This week's advance is mainly due to local bear covering caused by the substantial recovery in New York. The latter was not altogether unexpected, as, despite all the recent poor reports regarding the dry goods trade, consumption of cotton has continued on a fairly large scale, and figures of supplies have been steadily decreasing, making the position an extremely narrow one, and largely dependent on new crop news. The demand from abroad has been moderate, but the Liverpool spot market has continued active. Stocks in Liverpool are, however, decreasing, and spot prices there have recently appreciated considerably, and for certain qualities are now almost at par with Alexandria. Under the circumstances it is quite probable that before long spinners will have to have recourse to our market to satisfy their requirements. At the first April tender 250 krs. dockets were issued. Ashmouni old crop has been somewhat neglected during the last few days, and the difference with Sakel has widened; the relative dearness of Ashmouni compared with American competing qualities explains this widening. Dealings in new crop options, both Sakel and Ashmouni, have been fairly numerous, export firms now showing more interest in these months. Stocks in the Interior are low, the approximate quantity of cotton remaining being 250,000 krs.; this, added to the Alexandria stock, gives 1,650,000 krs. as the total available supply in Egypt, against 2,420,000 krs. at the same time last year. The quantity of cotton exported from Egypt from this date to end August last year was 1,550,000 krs., and it is needless to emphasise the strength of the position as shown by these figures. International politics do not offer much fresh comment. As far as economical and industrial conditions are concerned, the situation, on the whole, is perhaps slightly better. The week's receipts amount to 27,108 krs., against exports 130,386 krs.; the stock stands at 1,402,827 krs.

Spot.—We have had another dull week at Minet el Bassal, and though the turnover is slightly better than last week, very little improvement is to be noticed in the demand from spinners. Sales amount to about 8,200 B/s, of which we estimate 5,200 B/s Sakel, 2,800 B/s Uppers, 100 B/s Brown and Pilion, and 100 B/s White. Arrivals are small, and exports show a large increase over last week. The stock shows a considerable decrease from last week, and is about 1,400,000 kantars.

Sakellarides.—Cotton from good fair to round about good continues to attract the bulk of the demand, and the lower grades are somewhat neglected. Prices of spot against contracts are generally a little easier, but holders are not ready sellers.

Uppers.—All styles have been dealt in, but the medium and good grades have attracted most attention. Prices of spot against contracts are rather dearer for fully good fair, and better and a little easier for good fair and below. Good and better have been in good request.

Brown and Pilion.—A small business has been done. Prices of spot against contracts are rather dearer for the better qualities, and inclined to ease for the lower grades.

White.—A moderate business has been done. Prices of spot against contracts are generally a little easier.

Crop, 1924.—We have had very favourable weather for the progress of the young plants. In the Northern districts sowing has not yet been completed. The sore shin fungus attack is so far negligible. No complaints are reported from the Delta regarding the water supply. The Sudan gauges remain steady on the White Nile, whilst at Roseires (Blue Nile) there is a small rise. Reports on the acreage planted rather tend to indicate an increase on last year, but for the moment it is extremely difficult to give even an approximate figure.

The directors of the Indo-European Telegraph Company recommend a final dividend for 1923 of £1 2s. 6d. per share, making 7 per cent. for the year, free of tax, payable May 1, to holders registered April 10.

The output of oil from the Baku fields from December 1 to February 20 is stated to be 931,894 tons, as compared with 769,133 tons for the corresponding period in the previous year. The output of oil of the Grozny oilfields in December was 121,000 tons, compared with 108,000 tons in November.

LIVERPOOL COTTON REPORT.

Business in Good State.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended April 9:—

Egyptian Spot.—Business has continued good in this department, and an increased anxiety on the part of spinners to secure their cotton has been evident. Following a series of strong markets in New York, prices have taken another bound upwards, but the rate of progression has not been so marked in Egyptian cotton as in American—a curious state of affairs when one considers that relatively a better trade has been, and is, taking place in the former than in the latter. This, of course, has been all to the advantage of the spinners of Egyptian yarns, and during the past week they have not been slow to take advantage of the abnormal situation. The large sales, which have averaged (with Sudan) over 2,000 bales a day, are somewhat misleading, and argue, perhaps, a healthier state of trade than is actually the case. Spinners undoubtedly have been responsible for the larger portion, but it is as well to bear in mind that a good deal of speculative buying is also included. The week's inquiry, which has been on broad lines, has served further to accentuate the growing scarcity of certain qualities. In Sakel, the "100 to 150 on" market offers now an extremely poor selection to choose from, and spinners are being driven to seek their cotton amongst the better varieties. In this connection, it is interesting to note, as an index pointing to the better state of trade as a whole, that the lower cottons this season have been very much neglected, whereas not so long ago spinners turned automatically to the lower cotton to help them out when in difficulties. This week, interest has been chiefly focussed on cotton "150 to 200 on," and there are signs that this quality will soon follow the way of the "100 on."

Uppers have become very scarce, and it would appear that we are within measurable distance of finding the market here entirely swept. At the moment, there are still a few lots of F.G.F. on offer at about "50 to 75 on," and one or two lots of rather doubtful-looking Fine cotton offered at fancy prices. Some other lots have been withdrawn from the market altogether. The difficulty which spinners are experiencing in finding their qualities here has latterly turned their attention more and more towards the Alexandria market, and a better business has again been noted in c.i.f. cotton. Inquiries for New Crop cotton have not yet attained any great dimensions.

In Sudan cotton, both White and Sakel varieties, a very fair business has again been done. The basis for White remains about unchanged, but the Sakel qualities have hardened, business being done on one occasion at 23.75d. Low cotton has been neglected.

Forwardings to spinners for the week ending April 4 were returned as 6,854 bales.

Estimated sales 11,000 bales Egyptian and 1,630 Sudan.

Quotations are raised all round 110 points, with the exception of Good Sakel, which is 130 points higher.

Fully Good Fair Sakel to-day 22.25d.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

Business Restricted.

The Manchester cotton trade review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended April 12 states :—

Business has been considerably hampered this week by wide fluctuations in raw cotton. On balance, American is approximately 1¼d., and Egyptian a little under 1d. per lb. dearer. Quotations for yarn and cloth have had to be adjusted accordingly, so that, whilst inquiry has been on a good scale, negotiations have been difficult. October "futures" are now over 3d. per lb. below April, and naturally this operates as a check, since goods bought now may have to be marketed when a lower basis of prices is ruling.

Yarn.—For the reasons mentioned above operations in this section have not been so free as they were last week. Nevertheless, it is probable that, on balance, spinners' quotations are higher by at least as much as will cover the increased cost to them of the raw material. The Federation decided yesterday to continue short time working, previously fixed until the end of May, to the end of September, although, if the course of events warrants it, the position may be reviewed in the meantime. Shipments last month amounted to 13,172,000 lb., as against 14,131,900 lb. in February, and 13,030,000 lb. in March last year.

Cloth.—A moderately good business has been done, although not so large as recently. The demand still runs principally on fancies. Rather more has been done for Egypt and the Near East, but demand for those parts is still, generally speaking, poor. Shipments last month amounted to 353,983,000 sq. yds., against 397,070,200 sq. yds. in February and 337,411,000 sq. yds. in March, 1923.

Raw Cotton.—As already mentioned, this has been a disturbed market, the day to day fluctuations since Saturday last being as follows :—Saturday, 67 points rise; Monday, 19 fall; Tuesday, 40 fall; Wednesday, 92 rise; Thursday, 15 rise; Friday, 13 rise. The improved state of trade in Manchester has led to fears being expressed as to whether supplies will be adequate until the new crop comes along. Closing prices yesterday were as follows :—American fully middling, 19.41; Egyptian fully good fair, 22.40

COMPANY MEETING.

COMMERCIAL BANK OF THE NEAR EAST.

The second annual general meeting of the Commercial Bank of the Near East, Limited, was held on April 8 at the offices, 1, Broad Street Place, E.C., Mr. C. H. D. Moberly (managing director) presiding.

The Chairman said: We have now completed the first year of the bank's working, and in view of this and of the difficult times through which we have been passing, we trust you will agree that the results are satisfactory. You will observe from the balance-sheet that our total figures are now £788,113 11s. 8d., and that our capital, subscribed privately, has increased during the year to £140,100. You will, no doubt, also observe that the balance-sheet shows a good liquid position.

The net profits amount to £6,879 7s. 3d., after allowing for depreciation on furniture, bad and doubtful debts, and for the considerable depreciation in the values of securities which followed on the results of the Parliamentary elections last December. We have also written off £800, the premium we had to pay for our lease of these premises. These last two items amount to over £4,000, which is a substantial amount for us, and such a charge is not likely to recur this year unless something unforeseen occurs. The development of our business has been such that already we find our present premises insufficient for our purposes, and we are endeavouring to obtain further accommodation, if possible, in the same building. The support we have from the Commercial Bank of Greece and their friends is a great factor in the progress of our business.

Business at our Constantinople branch has been greatly restricted owing to the unsettled conditions there, and it is to the credit of the management that they have worked at a profit in such difficult circumstances. The position there appears to be very much in a state of flux, and it remains to be seen how far business will be assisted or impeded by Government and municipal action and taxation.

The Chairman concluded by moving the adoption of the report and accounts.

Mr. D. J. Cassavetti seconded the resolution, which was unanimously adopted.

GREEK MARKET FOR LUMBER.

The prospects are bright, according to local lumber dealers, for the importation into Greece of the lower grades of lumber, especially from the adjacent markets of Roumania, Fiume, and Trieste, Czecho-Slovakia, and Yugoslavia, says an American consular report. The eastern portion of Greece is extensively supplied with lumber by Yugoslavia; Czecho-Slovakia sends in large quantities through Salonika. In the lower grades of lumber it is impossible for the United States or other distant countries to compete with the near-by markets, principally on account of the exchange, but also on account of the expenses of transportation and the like. The depreciated exchange in Roumania and the Balkan countries is especially advantageous to the importation of lumber from these markets into Greece.

The Greek market for the lower grades of lumber is especially stimulated at this time by the acute housing crisis in this country brought about by the presence of the refugees. Many schemes have been suggested for the housing of the refugees, and negotiations are at present being carried on involving the construction of quantities of cheap houses for this purpose. The adoption of any of the proposed projects and the awarding of a contract in this connection will be of great importance to the lumber trade. This factor should be watched in the immediate future, with particular care, as the special demand created by the presence of the refugees may well revolutionise temporarily the lumber market of this country.

For the higher grades of lumber from America and Sweden the market to-day in Greece is considered to be very limited. The principal cause of this is stated to be the instability of the Greek drachma, which has moved about so sharply of late as to render it impossible for local merchants to fix their prices on any firm basis. All holders of high-grade lumber in Greece at present are utilising what stocks they have in their possession, and are refraining from ordering new stocks owing to the uncertainty of the future. This fact has, of course, a serious effect on numerous branches of Greek trade.

Many of the houses now being constructed in Greece are built of bricks or a low grade of reinforced cement. Others are built of very cheap lumber imported at advantageous rates from the adjoining markets. It obviously does not pay Greek importers to look farther away for their lumber when they can get what they need very cheaply and quickly near at hand. In view of this fact, and in view of the small demand for high-grade lumber, the market for the American product is not believed to be extensive.

There is pressing need of improvements and reconstruction on all the Greek railways, and various proposals for this work have been made. The needs of the railway of the Société Athènes-Pirée-Peloponèse have been reported upon in full in the past, and there has been much discussion regarding the work to be done on other lines throughout Greece. The poor state of the railways of the country indicates a potential market of some importance here for sleepers. Sleepers cannot easily be obtained locally, and the need to import must sooner or later arise, depending largely upon the development of some of the projects which have been mentioned. This, in turn, depends on an improvement in the financial and internal political situation.

The Anglo-Egyptian Oilfields output for the week ended April 4 was:—Gemsah, 5 tons (last week nil tons); Hurghada, 2,489 tons (last week 3,139 tons).

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The Greek Republic.

By a majority of more than two to one in a poll of over a million votes Greece has registered a verdict in favour of a Republic. That the majority should have been so substantial is a thoroughly satisfactory feature of the situation. It has helped the Royalist leaders to fulfil their promise to accept the result of the plebiscite with far less misgiving than if the voting had been close. This fact, coupled with M. Papanastasiou's conciliatory policy, causes the Republic to be launched under more favourable auspices than could have been anticipated a few months ago. The Greek people has unmistakably asked for a truce in the fierce political warfare that has wrought such havoc in the country during the last nine years, and it is entitled to have its request granted. For this reason, even though the Republican form of government has been accepted more from weariness of spirit than from deliberate conviction, there is much to be said for the formal prohibition of newspaper discussions of the Republican system for the next few years. The stronger the belief in the monarchical spirit of the Greek people the readier should be the acceptance of this veto. If this spirit is worth anything, it will be able to assert itself with more conviction after three or five years' experience of republicanism than if it has to rely merely on an instinct. Such a period counts for nothing in the life of a nation, and may not seem long to the young King who, through no fault of his own, has been driven from his throne. He will deserve well of his country if he now sets an example to the Greek Monarchists of scrupulously loyal acceptance of the national verdict.

The Political Struggle in Yugoslavia.

Ministerial crises in Yugoslavia are of such frequent occurrence that the prolongation of any one need have no particular significance. In the present instance, the resignation of M. Pashitch was the natural outcome of the decision of the Croatian party to take up their Parliamentary mandates and to attend the session of the Skupshtina. Being thus placed in a minority of the Chamber, M. Pashitch elected to resign before actually encountering an adverse vote. In any other country it would be expected that an Opposition leader would be given an opportunity of seeing whether he could form a Ministry and carry on the administration of the country. This course, however, would hardly conform with M. Pashitch's objects in resigning. The delay in the liquidation of the crisis is supposed to be due to the Prime Minister's attempt to persuade King Alexander not to follow the natural course by calling upon another politician to form a Cabinet but to allow the Skupshtina to be dissolved on the ground that no party has a majority, and to have new elections held under the ægis of M. Pashitch's Government. In view of the advantages that can be derived in Balkan States by the party in office at the time of a general election, this may be a legitimate manœuvre on M. Pashitch's part; but it can hardly be said to accord with strictly constitutional procedure. Yugoslavia's unhappy Parliamentary experience since the establishment of the Triune Kingdom has been associated with too much resort to more or less unconstitutional practice, that the time would seem to have come for playing the game according to the rules. The real issue, as in the neighbouring countries, is the antagonism between the interests of the peasants and those of the bourgeoisie, but in Yugoslavia it is obscured by division of the country into separate States and the rivalry between Serbia and Croatia. M. Pashitch's Parliamentary adroitness has enabled him to retard a straightforward trial of strength, which must come sooner or later—the earlier the better it will be for the internal peace of Yugoslavia.

Foreign Schools in Turkey.

It is not quite clear whether the attitude of the Turkish Government towards foreign schools in Turkey is prompted by the desire to eliminate all foreign control, or whether it is merely anti-religious. The requirement that all religious symbols should be removed from foreign schools is a natural corollary to the secularisation of education in the Republic, although it betrays the uncompromising spirit in which Angora is approaching most questions. The reopening of Italian schools, which have conformed with the regulations, while thirty-six French schools remain closed, owing to the refusal of the French authorities to carry out the requirements of the law, suggests that for the time being the Turkish Government is concerned only with the religious aspect of the question. Again, by closing the new Bingham School of Higher Science at the Constantinople College for Women on the ground that higher education of university standard is in the exclusive province of the Government, the Turkish authorities have shown that they are actuated more by petty-minded distrust of the foreigner than by any real concern for the cause of education. The notorious condition of the Turkish Exchequer and the inability of the Government to keep the pay of civil servants up to date would, it might be thought, cause Mustapha Kemal Pasha to welcome the voluntary assistance of foreigners in educational affairs, in particular that of the United States, who have done so much in the past for Turkish education. It is much to be regretted that the new Turkey does not take counsel of Japan in order to learn how a country can derive the fullest benefit from the experience and the practical help of foreigners without in any way sacrificing its self-respect. If Japan, after 1860, had adopted Angora's present attitude towards foreigners, she would have had to wait many more decades before she became a first-class Power.

Egypt and the Sudan.

The first definite discussion in the Egyptian Legislative Assembly on the relations between Egypt and the Sudan appears to have been restricted entirely to irrigation matters and to have avoided the political issue. This is satisfactory, as there is common ground for Egypt and Great Britain on the subject of the Nile waters, and it is to the interests of both countries to have the irrigation question definitely settled. The net result of the subject's being raised in Parliament was that a number of the Deputies were made to realise that they were quickly out of their depth. The subject is a highly technical one, and it cannot be said that Great Britain, with all the monumental works already carried out to her credit, has been neglectful of Egyptian interests. With the building of the great Makwar Dam, however, it is not difficult to understand the popular anxiety in Egypt lest Egyptian interests should henceforth be subordinated to those of the Sudan. There is not the least chance of this happening; but it will be as well if a commission speaking authoritatively for Egypt is able to reassure Egyptian public opinion on this point. Some salient facts to be brought home are that there is ample water, with proper regulation, for both countries, that the Makwar Dam will not affect the Egyptian supply, and that the configuration of Egypt will only allow additional land to the extent of one-third of the area at present under irrigation to be irrigated in the future. If for any reason there should be any relaxation of efficient regulation in regard to Egypt's present water supply, it will be easy to raise an outcry that Egypt is being prejudiced in favour of the Sudan.

The World Air-Flight.

The aeroplane makes short work of distance, when it gets going and keeps going. This truth is brought home to one by the record of the first stages of the flight round the world now being undertaken by Squadron-Leader MacLaren and his companions in a Vickers-Napier Vulture amphibian. A mishap kept the machine several days at Corfu, but as soon as the necessary repairs were completed the flight was resumed, and in rapid succession Athens, Cairo, Transjordania, Baghdad, and Basrah have been reached. Three more stages and the aeroplane will have passed beyond the territories covered by The Near East. The only unfamiliar place touched so far has been Ziza, in Transjordania, which was preferred to Amman, the capital, as a jumping off ground for the flight across the desert to Baghdad. Ziza contains, or, rather, is, the finest site in the world for an aerodrome, for, save where it is broken by the single track of the Hejaz Railway, there is almost a limitless landing ground. Amman, on the other hand, has a restricted aerodrome, which, in bad weather, may not be able to be used for days. Political considerations alone caused it to be chosen as the headquarters in Transjordania of the Royal Air Force. The desert stage to Baghdad, it is of interest to note, maintained its reputation for "bumpiness"; it is responsible for more air sickness than any other recognised route.

The R.A.F. in Irak.

The return of Air-Marshal Sir John Salmond to England on leave serves to call attention to the good work that has been done in Irak during his short period of command. It was a touch of genius that put the Royal Air Force in control in Irak. Never did a country lend itself better to what may be called Air methods, nor respond more readily to their adoption. Such success as the rising of 1920 achieved was due in no small measure to the isolation of the different military units throughout the country. With the strengthening of the Air Force, and its employment in regular patrol work, the great handicap of distance in Irak was in process of being overcome. General Haldane appreciated the advantages that the Air Service—at that time under the command of Group-Captain Borton—offered him in this respect; but it was left to Sir John Salmond, who became Commander-in-Chief in the autumn of 1922, to identify himself with an active Air policy. Thanks to his personality and activity, and almost daily flights to remote parts, the whole country has acquired a feeling of confidence and security which has not been without its effect on the political situation. Last spring, it will be remembered, the Commander-in-Chief made himself responsible for turning the Turks out of Rowanduz and occupied the town, with the result that the whole of the Mosul frontier has since then known peace. The latest reports from Irak point to difficulties in the passage of the Anglo-Irak Treaty through the Assembly, but it is to be hoped that when the time comes the Government's arguments will silence, if they do not convince, the opposition.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Tuesday Morning.

Easter.

Easter broke on us with most glorious sunshine, so that people simply flocked out of doors. Politics, business—everything that does not really matter—were for the time being forgotten, and everywhere you could see the heartening effects of sun and warmth. Motoring, cycling, or walking, the men of the towns noisily went out, determined this Easter idly to sing the empty day away. In vain the newspapers tried to remind them that the importance of the Exhibition at Wembley ought to occupy all their thoughts, that Chelsea might yet escape relegation, that what they had said all along about the favouritism of Tom Pinch for the Derby was now justified—they were out to enjoy themselves. And when the Englishman does forgo the sadness of his pleasures, there is no one who enjoys himself so much.

The Byron Centenary.

It would seem a self-evident fact that what can be said about centenary celebrations and about the position in literature of Byron has already been said; but it is not so. Why we of all people should make a fuss of anybody just because he has been dead a hundred years is incomprehensible, and our allowance to the papers of about half their space as a fitting area in which to display their ignorance of the poet is absurd. However, everybody in the last few days thought that they ought to write on Byron, although whether anybody read what the papers said I very much doubt.

The truth is, of course, that centenary celebrations are the most hypocritical form of insincere adulation that has yet been discovered. And an equal truth is that nowadays Byron is considered, except as a satirist, as very small beer. But if one were to read the gush and slobber that journalists have spilled over this forceful versifier, one would almost imagine that it was Keats or Shelley who died at Missolonghi. It is not likely that Byron's fame will ever be higher than it is at present, for this is an age which needs satire, and, therefore, prizes very highly the "Vision" and "Don Juan." When we have rediscovered a religion or something of the sort, we shall turn back to the romance of life, to the lyrical in literature, and to the joy of craftsmanship. And none of these things shall we find in any great measure in Byron.

Meanwhile Byron, who laughed at all politicians, is being solemnly lauded as a great politician! Ours is a wonderful age.

The Government.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald has just been telling the people of York that he wishes to stay, not only in office, but in power, and he is not being called a self-seeking politician for being so frank. He does not see any reason why there should be a General Election for two or three years. And he is quite right. But why only two or three years? Mr. Garvin, in the Observer, a rash sheet which tries to cover all the bed of contingencies, but which not seldom gets torn in the process, is waving his persuasive wand in favour of a General Election next January, by which time, he thinks, the body of the Liberals will be, at any rate, in an adaptable stage of dissolution. But why January should be the month of decision I cannot imagine. All that one can deduce from these Sabbatical musings is that Mr. Garvin knows no more than the rest of us what to do or what should be done.

The I.L.P. Conference.

A certain amount of impatient attention is being paid to the gusts of oratory that are now blowing from the Conference of the Independent Labour Party at York, not because of any importance innate in the I.L.P., but because the present Government so largely relies on the support of this curious and insignificant institution. The I.L.P.—a misnomer, because it is a body bound hand and foot to dogmas and shibboleths—is insignificant, because it does not signify anything new; it has not moved with the times, unless a tendency to become more adaptable, more easy-going, be reckoned as movement.

But the Government must retain the support of the I.L.P., which is therefore flattered that it has an essential connection with Labour. The Government goes to it as to a well, to drink up long draughts of "Labour" liquid and to keep its soul pure with frequent potations of the real Labour elixir. Mr. MacDonald is a clever man, for he had the I.L.P. cooing at his feet as gently as Mr. Lloyd George ever had his Nonconformists. The Nonconformists, however, have had their day. . . .

The Liberals.

Undoubtedly there is some sort of work going on at the cross-roads of Liberalism. The party's doings last week were secret, but, in spite of that fact, there were plenty of journalists prepared to swear that their version of events was correct. Those who do not like the Liberals assert that there is a definite split into those who are ready to kowtow to Labour and those who are not. The position is further complicated by the suggestion that Mr. Asquith should retire from politics and assume the Mastership of Balliol.

What actually did happen when these Liberals spoke what used to be called their mind I cannot pretend to know. But at least it is certain that they are fatigued with their long subservience to, and neglect by, Labour. Once again their powers of reasoning, admirable in theory, have proved faulty in practice. They thought that they were going to be the most powerful party in the House, and it has turned out they they are not only the weakest, but the most despised. Still, they are a most inconveniently long time dying, so that, although respect may have for ever gone, one yet has regard for them.

As an illustration of what they really stand for nowadays, the Liberals are at the moment concentrating all their efforts on the maintenance of such a fusty old idea as that of Free Speech (which, of course, they always spell with capitals). The other day they had a meeting broken up by a gang of rowdies, and are now calling heaven and earth to witness the enormous injustice of this method of stopping the flow of truth from their lips. But we are not living fifty years ago; we have seen the effectiveness of Fascist methods; and so are not quite so indignant as the Liberals would have us.

Feminism in Education.

Nowhere has the struggle to attain what is called "equality of the sexes" been keener than in the sphere of education, and a very fair or unfair measure of success has already been achieved. But even here the worm—that is, the poor man—is beginning to turn, and his voice was heard on Saturday well above the hum of the Empire Exhibition and the buzz of the Easter traffic. Great bitterness was expressed on the subject at the Conference of the National Association of Schoolmasters, where the illuminating statement was made that in the national salary negotiations no one who did not accept the feminist demands was allowed to participate.

These demands, said the President of the Conference, now amounted to the "canonisation of the spinster," and he complained that the profession of schoolmasters was being used as an experimenting ground for fallacious economic theories. In this rebuke, not only to the present Government, but also to past Governments, there is much truth. The equality of the sexes is a theory which inevitably causes difficulties when it is attempted to put it into practice. It is not mere prejudice that makes a man dislike the idea that his sons should receive their education at the hands of women teachers, but at the moment he has to put up with a good deal of this.

The whole issue, one supposes, rests on one's belief in the future of the industrial system; if it is eventually to be dominated by women, then equal pay for equal work is obviously a conquering slogan. But if one believes that economic democracy is a contradiction in terms, then one's sympathy will be with the forlorn men in their terrible fight against the official feminist view.

Agricultural Labourers.

The Government has produced a beautiful Bill for the regulation of the wages of workers in agriculture, the object of which is to secure in each county a legal minimum wage for the agricultural labourer. Many attacks have already been made on the machinery that it proposes to establish for the determination of such wages, but, as far as a layman can judge, it would seem to be very excellent machinery. It is easy to cry out that this proposal means the substitution of red tape for the human tie, but that, in fact, has been the whole trend of industrial organisation ever since it was recognised that the masters had a duty towards their hands.

What does to a certain extent vitiate this Bill is its calm and, so far as anyone outside the Government knows, unjustified assumption that agriculture in its present condition can actually bear the imposition of a universal minimum wage. The Bill in no way comes to the assistance of agriculture itself, and of what use is it to put in the shafts however excellent a horse if there be nothing in the cart to pull? Higher wages in the agricultural industry depend—so it is generally believed—not upon a reorganisation of its financial dealings, but upon a revival of the industry itself.

Britain and Russia.

So far the visit of the Soviet representatives to Britain seems to have caused little but amusement, for the general feeling is that our Government tackled this problem before they were well enough acquainted with the difficulties of the situation. But these picturesque visitors have been a godsend to the illustrated papers and to Mr. George Robey. One cannot, therefore, in view of such colossal services rendered, be sorry that they have come.

Marie Corelli.

The death of Marie Corelli will probably leave our time unmoved, for the present generation made no indulgence in what to our forefathers was not only an entertainment, but a virtue. It seems curious that to such people as Queen Victoria, Tennyson, Sir Frederick Leighton, and Gladstone she appealed as having a good moral influence on the so easily corruptible minds of the young. She was a quite amazingly fertile novelist, and there can be few people who boast or confess that they have not read at least "The Mighty Atom." She was, I believe, the most widely circulated abroad of all English novelists, though whether the Goulds and the Garvices and the Dells did not in the later years surpass her sales I rather doubt.

Yet whatever one may say against the writings of Marie Corelli, it is not even arguable that much of the stuff that is most avariciously read nowadays is far worse. She reflected her time, and in such cases it is a futile proceeding to blame the mirror.

The Cricket Season.

The sight of a cricket score tabulated in a newspaper gives a thrill such as no other sport can provide. No other game in its reporting is so eloquent in so few words of what actually took place. It took years off one, therefore, to read in Sunday's paper of the failures and successes of cricketers, some known and some unknown, at the Oval on Saturday. For the nonce it did not matter what we happen to think of Surrey: what did matter was that these men were the first to get themselves reported in the papers, and so deserved the thanks of all those who had for so many months read nothing but the reports of dismal football matches. By to-night all the clubs throughout the country will have started net practice.

GREECE.

Athens, April 11.

Proclamation of the Republic.

It was an exceedingly clever idea of the Republicans to choose the anniversary of the Greek national holiday for the proclamation of the Republic. Banks, shops, and offices were all closed, and as it was a fine day the streets were naturally thronged with people. The Greeks have always been fond of military displays, especially when these are accompanied with bands, cavalry, and fire engines. But the lack of enthusiasm was surprising. Athenians seemed quite indifferent to the change. Even at night there were no joyous manifestations in the brilliantly illuminated streets and squares. The crowds in Stadium Street and Constitution Square were certainly very dense that evening, but the majority, after admiring the illuminations and eating their cake or drinking their ouzo at one of the numerous cafés, returned silently home. The "Republic" was entirely forgotten.

It is perfectly obvious that if the Greeks are depending on the Republic to save them they are depending on a broken reed. It is not a kingdom or a republic that the Greek people need; it is the will to work together for the country's good, and personal ambitions and antagonisms must give way to the wholesome development of the commonwealth, whether it be a republic or a kingdom. One feels that at heart this is the wish of the people, as the impression I got on "Independence Day" was one of hope that better times lay in store for Greece rather than confidence on the part of the people that such would be the case. On the whole it seemed that approval of the Republic was not sufficient to show the firm faith of the nation in the future. There seemed an element of apprehension.

Greece ought to make every sincere effort to prove to the world her real anxiety and determination to restore and maintain a stable and beneficent Government approved by the nation. Only then will she share in her own great inheritance which she has given to the world. She will live again, not in museums and records of a wonderful past, but in the contentment and the prosperity of her people. All the elements of the "Glory that was Greece" are still here; why can they not be built up into a new and throbbing life?

The Plebiscite.

But two more days separate us from the plebiscite which will decide whether Greece is to become definitely a Republic or whether it will remain a kingdom. The voting commences at sunrise on Sunday, and the polling booths will be closed at sunset. The ballot cards will be white and yellow—the former for the Republic and the latter for the Monarchy—the white ballots bearing the word "yes" and the yellow the word "no."

Both parties are feverishly preparing for the contest and are engaged in active propaganda, not only in Athens, but also in the provinces, where Republican and Royalist politicians have been touring since the beginning of last week in order to imbue the people with their respective political doctrines. In view of the abnormal conditions prevailing in Greece, an attempt to predict the result of the coming referendum would be exceedingly difficult, if not impossible. I have had the opportunity of discussing the matter with many leading Athenians of more or less moderate political views, and the general consensus of opinion seems to be that, whichever side wins, it will do so with no very considerable majority. The Peloponnesus, of course, is decidedly Monarchist, and the Republicans themselves do not expect to secure more than 35 per cent. of the total number of votes cast there. In the Ionian Islands the Republicans should not get more than 20 per cent., while in the Province of Acarnania (the home of the late M. Stratos) the Republicans ought to be satisfied with 10 per cent. Generally speaking, in Old Greece, with the exception of Attica, where the number of votes will in all probability be equally divided, the Monarchists should obtain an overwhelming majority. Such will not be the case, however, in Macedonia, Thrace, Epirus, Crete, as well as in the islands wrested from Turkey during the Balkan War, where the Republicans should score heavily. The refugees, especially those in Macedonia, which are estimated at 300,000, will no doubt largely contribute towards the Republican majority in the above-mentioned provinces of New Greece.

In order to prevent any outbreak of disturbances on Sunday—a by no means improbable thing in view of the fanaticism of the adherents of each party and the bitter hatred for each other—a camouflaged state of siege will be established in Athens on the day of the plebiscite—namely, although martial law will not officially be proclaimed until next week, the streets of the capital will be patrolled throughout the day by infantry, cavalry, and armoured cars. All concentrations of civilians will be immediately broken up, and, with the exception of motor-cars belonging to the Diplomatic Corps and the State services, no vehicles of any description will be allowed to circulate from midnight on Saturday until 8 a.m. on Monday morning. All cafés and shops—even tobacconists—will remain closed; restaurants and confectionery shops, however, may remain open from 12 to 2 and from 8 to 10. It looks as if Athenians—at least, those who do not vote—will have to spend their Sunday at home. Disturbances, resulting in bloodshed, have already occurred in several provincial centres, especially in the Peloponnesus, but Athens and the Piræus remain quiet thus far. General Pangalos, the new Minister of Public Safety, promises us a quiet Sunday, too. While it is generally admitted that the general is the right man in the right place, it remains to be seen whether he will be able to keep his promise this time.

The Hold-up of the Athens-Salonika Express.

An extraordinary robbery, which amply illustrates the deplorable state of public security in Greece, occurred on the Athens-Salonika express at one o'clock yesterday morning. The express had just passed through Doxara station, an unimportant junction about 13 miles south of Larissa, when the driver, noticing a red light at some little distance on the line, stopped the train. Suddenly about fifteen brigands, the majority attired in peasant costumes, and all armed with rifles and huge knives, emerged from the darkness and opened fire on the train. Both the engine driver and the fireman were tightly bound by two of the brigands, while the remainder invaded the sleeping-car, the occupants of which, awakened by the shots, had come out into the corridor in their pyjamas to ascertain what was happening. Their curiosity was very soon satisfied. The bandits were exceedingly polite, but at the same time very firm. Ladies and gentlemen were asked to hand over the contents of their bag or wallet, their watches, rings, and other jewellery. But the brigands also proved that those who maintain that the days of the chivalrous Dick Turpin are over are mistaken. None of the passengers possessing less than 1,000 drachmae (£1) was robbed, and even those who were relieved of their money subsequently received a hundred drachmae note each "for pocket money until you get to Salonika." An Englishman who was travelling on the robbed train was treated with exceptional courtesy by the brigands, who, when being informed of his nationality, told him that he could keep all his money. One of the victims handed to the robbers ten paper English pound notes. The robber looked at the notes curiously, turned them over and over again, and finally returned them to the owner, saying that they were worth nothing. Among the victims of the hold-up were M. Pazis, the Minister of Relief, and M. Valalas, the Governor of Macedonia. The former was carrying with him 70,000 drachmae, but managed to hide it under the bed mattress, handing over only 3,000 drachmae.

BULGARIA.

Sofia, April 14.

Relations with Yugoslavia.

During the last few weeks there has been a distinct lessening of the tension which has existed with Yugoslavia. Mr. Rakitch, Yugoslav Minister in Sofia, on his return from Belgrade, is believed to have brought assurances from his Government that, as long as Bulgaria maintains a correct attitude towards the doings of the Macedonian revolutionaries, she will have nothing to fear from Yugoslavia. The words "correct attitude" are, perhaps, somewhat vague, but they may be read as meaning an attitude of hostility towards the activities of the Macedonian revolutionaries operating on Bulgarian territory. There is little doubt that the present Bulgarian Government is now fully alive to the danger which threatens any deviation from a correct attitude. It has had the opportunity of informing itself on what is the point of view of the Great Powers, and realises that any assistance, direct or indirect, given to the Macedonians may easily sound its death-knell. Bearing this in mind, the Bulgarian Government and the mass of Bulgarians are extremely unlikely in any way to aid the Macedonians.

There are, however, other factors which cannot be ignored. The mere fact of there being so many Macedonians in Bulgaria—there are about a quarter of a million, not 50,000 or 500,000, as propagandists would have us believe—makes the task of the Bulgarian authorities extremely difficult. Just at present the Macedonians are very quiet, and there are no outward signs of unrest. The spring will soon be over, and there are real grounds for hoping that trouble may be entirely averted. But the doings of a few irresponsible persons can still destroy the efforts of Serbians and Bulgarians who have conscientiously worked for peace. Unfortunately, there are a certain number of people—mostly Bulgarians—who see in Yugoslav-Bulgarian friction a possibility of personal advancement. In order to achieve their ends they have been using a few hundred Agrarians and Communists who fled to Yugoslavia last year, and who have been unable to return home. Rather late in the day the Bulgarian Government understood this danger and, acting on advice which can best be described as "kindly counsel," drafted a law by which all the emigrants, barring 30, are pardoned. Whenever this law is passed by the Sobranye the emigrants will be free to return, although for a period of three years they will be under surveillance in the sense that any crime they commit will render them liable to punishment for offences committed last June and September.

Former Agrarian Ministers.

Meanwhile this amnesty has been followed by the acquittal of the members of the late Agrarian Cabinet. These latter were accused of having organised armed bands with the object of repressing and sometimes suppressing their political adversaries. Eight Ministers were on trial, but no one took very much interest in the matter, as it seemed a foregone conclusion that, like the majority of ex-Balkan Ministers, they would be sentenced to long terms of imprisonment. But, for once, public opinion was wrong, as the charge was found unproven and some of the Ministers have already been liberated; these include Janeff, Omartchevsky, Pavloff, and Zagrevsky.

But it is not yet certain whether the matter will end there, for the Government is understood to have asked the Court of Cassation to institute a new trial. This may prove difficult, because during their tenure of power the Agrarians abolished the Court of Appeal; so, on legal grounds, there are reasons for believing that the ex-Ministers will go free.

Communist Party Dissolved.

Perhaps the most important event of the month has been the dissolution of the Communist Party. Some time ago the Court of Cassation began a detailed inquiry into the activities of the Communist Party, its organisations, and the co-operative Society, "Osvobojdenie." The result of their inquiry has disclosed that the Communists, who recently took on the name of "Labour," have conducted a policy which is detrimental to the security of the State. All its organisations have been ordered to be dissolved, while its property is declared public and will pass into the possession of the State.

Such a decision has not come as a surprise, for the events of last June and September, not to speak of isolated incidents, have all gone to show that the Communists are out to obtain power by violent methods. Abroad it may be questioned whether the Government has acted wisely in dissolving the Communist Party, as it may be argued that by so doing they will only increase its activities. The answer to this, given from an internal point of view, is that up to now the Communists have struggled illegally, but have been protected by the law. Now if they wish to struggle illegally they will not be protected by the law. On the other hand, those who want to struggle legally can either form their own group or can join the moderate Agrarians.

The Non-Existent Roads.

Although it may seem a far cry from Communists and Macedonians to roads, in certain ways the latter are both more important and more interesting.

Up to the end of 1919 Bulgaria's roads were well made and were kept in good condition. They have slowly deteriorated, and it is doubtful whether there are any worse in Europe to-day. Bulgarian roads are divided into two categories—State and Communal. The former are maintained out of State funds, the latter by the respective Communes. The Budget for the financial year ending April, 1925, provides for approximately 160 kilometres of State roads being entirely renovated and repaired. The cost per kilometre, exclusive of bridges, works out at about 500,000 levas (£850). Owing to the comparatively small amount of money which the Government has put at the disposal of the Ministry of Labour, there cannot be any great improvement right away. But even when a road is mended it is done in such a cursory fashion that in a few months it is as bad as it was before. From personal observation one is able to state that road repairing in Bulgaria consists of workmen throwing stones on the road, a lightish steam roller passing over the stones, the spreading of loose earth on the stones, followed by a final run over by the roller. Such a method would have a poor chance of success anywhere, but when traffic is allowed to circulate whilst the operation is actually in process it will be readily understood what a poor prospect Bulgarian roads are faced with.

Then, again, as far as the writer has been able to ascertain, there is no properly applied road tax. Motor-cars and lorries pay taxes, and it is said they are very high; but it seems that the proceeds do not go to road-making. In addition, the owners of the peasant carts, whose innumerable vehicles cause an infinite amount of wear and tear, do not contribute anything towards the upkeep of the roads.

There is, of course, no question that bad roads bring a country into disrepute. There are things universally noticed, and although residents may in time get used to them, they constitute a serious slur on the Administration. Lack of money may prevent the Government from improving the roads, but a serious study of the question—better by a visit abroad, where other methods of roadmaking could be observed—is earnestly to be recommended if Bulgaria desires to maintain a reputation for civilisation in matters pertaining to road transport.

Constantinople, April 15.

Ratification.

The news is published here to-day, in a telegram from Paris, that the House of Commons has passed unanimously the third reading of the Act of Ratification of the Lausanne Treaty. One is not accustomed in Constantinople to expect the best of English news from French sources, and on this occasion, while hoping that it may prove an exception to the rule, one wonders whether English news agencies remained silent from the belief that the least said about it the better. A telegram from Angora announces that the news has created a good impression. The word "ratification" has been toyed with for months past by the politician, the distraught local business man, the foreign concession-hunter, and unfortunate bondholders, as if it were the panacea for all Turkey's post-War ills, and the one remaining obstacle which has hindered the fulfilment of her promises, and deferred to the League of Nations and to the Western Powers of Europe the companionship and co-operation of a regenerated and modern civilised State.

The Next Step.

That such is what the delay in ratifying the Treaty has meant to civilisation in general, and to Turkey in particular, is probably the conviction of many a deputy from the back veld in the Angora Assembly. There is also little doubt that the Government deems the rôle demanded of it under the Lausanne Treaty a comparatively simple one to fulfil. Framed after the Turks' own heart, the Treaty provides for a series of bargainings after ratification, an art in which the nation undoubtedly excels. There are, however, many others who, while taking no active part in politics at the present time, and who, only looking for the peaceful and material advancement of the country, recognise that with the ratification of the Treaty the settlement of the many outstanding problems can no longer be delayed or shelved, and that on their wise solution will depend not only the existence of the present Government, but maybe the permanence of the new republican régime.

The Financial Problem and Loan Prospects.

With the ratification of the Treaty, the principal question to be faced will probably prove to be Turkey's need for money. The Government may be loath to admit it, as being contrary to the spirit of the newly gained independence, and by way of retort to criticisms on the financial situation, one is referred to the present comparative stability of the rate of exchange, and to the fact that no new issue of paper money has been made since the War. It is questionable whether these factors may not be due in some measure to the sheer stagnation of business that exists, coupled with the reduction of population, factors which may well diminish not only speculation, but the demand for either foreign or local currency, while causing the necessity for the issuing of more paper money to be less apparent. In any case, the matter must come into the limelight with ratification. The Budget, with its estimated deficit of £T5,000,000, provides nothing for the payment of interest on loans, or towards the redemption with interest of the pre-War Government Treasury Bills within ten years of the dates fixed by their original contracts (namely, by 1925, 1926, and 1928 respectively) as provided for in the Lausanne Treaty. Yet revenues due to the Public Debt, apart from their shrinkage, continue to be withheld, and the important tax on spirituous liquors (which it is now proposed to form into a State monopoly), and which should go to the Public Debt, is taken to assist in balancing the Government's Budget. The position of the Constantinople Municipal Loan is much the same. A large portion of the Galata Bridge Toll Receipts, which were pledged for the service of the loan, are being retained by the municipality, thus making it impossible to meet the payment of the coupons.

It would appear certain, therefore, regardless of present susceptibilities, if Turkey is imbued with the desire to meet her obligations, and to fulfil the conditions imposed on her under the Treaty (and one can credit the present Government with such intention), that she will have to look in the immediate future for a loan. The word is indeed writ large on the horizon, but one fancies that there are yet obstacles to be surmounted, 'twixt ratification and this new goal, obstacles which Turkey of her own initiative must surmount before the required assistance is forthcoming, or the investing public induced to answer the call for subscriptions to a Turkish loan.

Sport and Social Items.

Golf.—The open golf championship of Turkey is being played over 36 holes on the Mashlak course on the 21st inst. In addition to local British and American competitors, certain Smyrna golfers are expected to make a bid for the Championship Cup this year. In the meantime, a handicap competition is being keenly contested at Mashlak, and the final tie between Major Hobson and Mr. D. J. Jordan, of the men's section, is to be played off on Friday next. The Hon. R. C. Lindsay, the British Representative, will present the winning tokens at the end of this match—the Club's Cup to the winner of the men's section and a silver clock to the winner of the ladies' competition.

Yachting.—A cup for competition by 14-foot sailing dinghies (standard class) is being offered by the Moda Yacht Club, and weekly sailing matches are to take place in Moda Bay during June, July, and August. The yacht Sunbeam, with its owner, Sir Walter Runciman, on board, is on a visit to the Bosphorus. This yacht, well known in these waters, was, of course, formerly the property of Lord Brassey.

Cricket.—With the departure of the British Army, a great blank is felt in the cricket world in Constantinople, and the matches that used to take place between British civilian teams and units of the Army will be much missed. It has been decided to form this year a joint club comprising players of all sections of the British community at Moda, Bebek, British High Commission, and the Town.

British Consul-General's Lecture.

Mr. A. T. Waugh, C.M.G., British Consul-General, delivered a much-appreciated lecture in the hall of the English High School for Girls last Thursday, entitled "The English-Speaking Race," in which he dealt with his subject from the time of Hereward the Wake down to the present day. Mr. Waugh is a real champion of the British ideal in Constantinople, of which fact this lecture, providing as it did a little much-needed propaganda, afforded but further evidence.

Theatricals.

Under the patronage of the Hon. R. C. Lindsay a comedy entitled "Belinda" is to be staged at the Union Française on the 24th inst., in aid of the British Relief Society, a society which has frequent occasions to make calls on the purse of the British community to enable it to meet the demands of destitute British subjects in these parts. A large number of these calls for relief are on behalf of subjects of Maltese extraction, and other unfortunates, many of whom one might find it difficult to recognise as such but for their passports.

An Agricultural Bank?

The Legislative Council was opened on April 2, and rumour has it that the present session may be the last of the Council as at present constituted. Disappointment is expressed that the High Commissioner was unable in his opening speech to hold out any promise of the establishment of an agricultural bank. On the contrary, he stated that negotiations with that object in view had fallen through. The hopes of Cypriots are based on the dream of a bank to be administered by the Government, which will advance money to needy and deserving agriculturists at 5 or 6 per cent., as the only means of releasing the heavily indebted peasantry from the grip of the usurer. Unhappily, there seems but little hope at present, unless the people can successfully organise banks on a co-operative system.

Warnings to Emigrants.

one of their favourite hunting grounds, and many warnings against proceeding to America without assured prospects of employment have been disregarded. Some hundreds of foreigners, including Greeks, recently attempted to cross the border from Mexico; but American police were prepared, and a number—some of them Greeks—were killed and wounded while making the attempt, including some unfortunate Cypriot villagers. Once more warnings are being given, and a similar caution is being given to Cypriots who contemplate settlement in Australia and who do not possess the necessary qualifications for admission.

A Question of Nationality.

The Greek Press is taking up the case of Cypriots who are not British subjects. All Cypriots (not foreign subjects) who were in the island at the time of its annexation in 1914 became British subjects. But a number who were not in the island, and had not been naturalised elsewhere, are not recognised as British, and many of these complain that they are now subjects of no State and without the protection of any Government. Strictly speaking, they are rayahs, or Ottoman subjects (as they were until 1914), but this they say, gives them no privileges, and only renders them liable for military service in the Ottoman army—in which case they may conceivably be called upon to fight against Britain. A number of petitions have been submitted, begging that provision may now be made for those belonging to this category who desire to become British subjects.

Questions of nationality have always given trouble in Cyprus while the island remained a Turkish possession. Many "Greek" rayahs would claim to be Hellenic subjects; but though it was an easy matter to invest themselves with Hellenic nationality outside the island, it was very difficult to comply with the regulation which required them to divest themselves of Ottoman nationality.

A Tourist Trade.

Another matter that is being taken up is the much-neglected tourist business, for which something should be done in the present year. The Phone tes Kyprou ("Voice of Cyprus") rightly calls attention to the great advantages that might be derived from this source, but are now lost. Great interest is sure to be taken in the Cyprus Pavilion at Wembley, and visitors to Egypt and Palestine may be induced, from what they see, in greater numbers to spend some days or weeks, or even seasons, in an island which possesses many attractions besides that of an excellent winter climate. It is true that much remains to be done for the improvement of hotels. But now that the island is British it may be hoped that both in the matter of accommodation and steam service an advance will be made.

Island Development.

It is satisfactory to note that there are some signs of enterprise. The silk industry, e.g., is likely to be considerably developed, owing mainly to the encouragement given by the Agricultural Department and its many activities in late years. Cyprus cocoons are of excellent quality, and many very attractive materials are made and sold in the bazaars. Many beautiful examples of Cypriot lace and embroidery will be on view at the Exhibition. Good materials for clothing are produced locally, and the Eleutheria ("Liberty") and other papers are calling the Cypriots to task for neglecting to patronise native work instead of expending excessive amounts on imported materials. Much of the money made during the War has been spent on luxuries, including dress and fashions from the West, while Cyprus industry and business suffer seriously as a consequence.

Cyprus Oranges.

The great demand for oranges at present in the Levant enables Cyprus growers to do profitable business The soil at Famagusta, Nicosia, and other places is suitable for the large oval Jaffa varieties. A garden owner at Famagusta has recently realised £1,200 from the produce of his trees; and a Turk at Nicosia expects to obtain £2,500 from the yield of his garden. A considerable extension of orange cultivation could be made remunerative. Both fruit-growing and market gardening are still in a deplorably backward condition.

THE PROBLEM OF THE INDIAN STATES.

Among the numerous and difficult Indian problems of the moment not the least important is that which concerns the relationship to be established between the democracy now being brought into existence under the orders of Parliament and the States scattered over the face of the country, which, differing widely as they do, are all alike characterised by fundamentally despotic Constitutions. In the recent debates in Delhi Sir Malcolm Hailey pressed the extremist legislators to explain how an Indian Dominion, such as they now demand, would stand towards the States, and his question has received no effective answer. The idealists apparently see no difficulty in swallowing the States whole; the cynics, on the other hand, think the States would soon divide the hypothetical Dominion among themselves; the student who realises the implications of each of these summary solutions seeks rather to understand the tendencies actually at work, and to draw from the facts of the present a forecast of the changes to be expected in the future. In making such an attempt, it is well to insist at the outset on the fact that the States are not, as they are sometimes represented, merely strongholds of reaction. Conditions differ widely among them, and, if there are stout Conservatives in Rajputana and elsewhere, there are also centres of Liberal and Progressive ideas. It has been possible to look hopefully to Gwalior for much-needed experiments in economic development; Hyderabad has broken new ground in the region of higher education, while Baroda has been endeavouring to spread some degree of culture among the masses; and not very long ago Mysore could claim a definite initiative in the field of politics. The initiative has now passed for the time being to Parliament, but Mysore is still active, and it is there that one must look for tendencies which may throw light on the future of the problem. The task is rendered easier by the recent issue of a pamphlet, for which we are indebted to a correspondent, setting out in popular form the constitutional reforms introduced by the Maharaja and inaugurated last month, a pamphlet so eulogistic in tone that it may safely be accepted as exhibiting the new developments in the most favourable light.

The earlier progressive changes in Mysore were inspired by a most interesting idea—the partial separation of talk from work. The Council which performed most of the formal functions of a legislature was a small aristocratic body, while the more popular Assembly was designed solely to focus and express the opinion of the people at large—a task which it has appeared to be performing with increasing effectiveness. In the new Constitution this idea is retained. The Assembly is accorded more formal recognition, but it remains essentially an organ for the expression of opinion, without power to translate opinion into action. The Council, on the other hand, has now been given a position generally similar to that of the Legislative Assembly at Delhi. It can pass laws and modify the Budget, so that it possesses definite powers, though there are over-riding provisions, such as are available in emergency to the Viceroy. The franchise is of the same order of magnitude as in British India, and consequently extremely narrow in Western eyes. There is a non-official majority, but it can be provided in part by nomination; not more than two-fifths of the members need be directly elected, against the minimum of five-sevenths prescribed by Parliament, and consequently it is highly improbable that recent experiences in Delhi should be repeated in Mysore. On the whole, however, the Constitution offers in fact a large measure of representative government. As yet there are no signs of a Ministry responsible to the Council, such as already exists in the British provinces, but most students of politics will agree that, when so much has been done, progress in that direction is merely a question of time.

The details which we have given are important in that they enable us to grasp the position taken up by one of the most progressive States in India, inhabited by a population which, it is safe to say, is better equipped for politics than the average of the whole country. The action which has been taken in Mysore will bring no comfort to either wing of the Opposition in British India, whether the supporters of social and religious ascendancy, who hold that Parliament has moved in the wrong direction, or the claimants for immediate and complete self-government, who contend that, while the direction may be right, the pace is far too slow. The framers of the Mysore Constitution are obviously content to follow in the direction taken by Parliament, and we are therefore justified in concluding that they consider that direction to be wisely chosen. It is equally permissible to infer that they consider Parliament has moved too quickly, for, while following its lead, they are careful to keep some way behind. The able men who conduct the administration of the State can be under no illusion as to the ultimate effect of the measures on which they have decided. No one has yet devised an effective limit to the transference of power to the people, when once the process has been put in operation, and we may take it that Mysore has definitely discarded the older Indian ideal of ascendancy. What can be effected within limits is to regulate the pace of the transfer, and Mysore is obviously determined that the pace shall not be too fast. Now Mysore is among the political leaders of the States. One or two others may possibly assert a claim to the foremost position, but the great majority are clearly content to follow Mysore at a cautious distance, just as Mysore is content to follow Parliament, and in this fact we find some materials to furnish an answer to Sir Malcolm Hailey's question. The creation of a homogeneous Indian "Dominion" is not the simple measure suggested by its advocates, nor is India in the wider sense prepared to support it. The initiative in political advance will for some time to come remain with Parliament, which has declared its intention to regulate the pace in accordance with the development of a new sense of responsibility among the people. The States will move gradually in the same general direction, but more slowly, and in some cases very slowly indeed. There is no early prospect of the homogeneity postulated by extremist dreamers; on the contrary, a temporary increase in diversity must be expected, and during the period of transition the relations between the States and British India will require most cautious and sagacious handling by those who hope for an ultimate approximation to unity in the larger sense. That hope is in itself entirely legitimate, but to attempt to realise it in a hurry is the readiest way to secure its indefinite postponement.

ROUMANIA: A NEW POLICY?

(By a Correspondent.)

Three years ago, when the present Roumanian Government came into power, great stress was laid on the efficacy of a policy of self-reliance. "By ourselves alone" was the new motto. It captured the enthusiasm of the nation, partly, perhaps, by way of reaction against the policy of M. Take Jonescu, who was apt to be considered in his own country a greater success as a "European" than as a Roumanian. Be that as it may, the picture of Greater Roumania standing majestically alone after so many centuries of vassalage and decades of paying court to Great Powers was calculated to make a strong appeal to the country, and the Liberal Party came in with a crushing majority. It is extremely doubtful whether any other party could have held office during the last three years with greater success than M. Bratianu's Government. During this period the Liberal Party has done much that any other group of politicians, even if it had had the necessary foresight, would have lacked the courage to attempt. In spite of the very great difficulties, it has shown remarkable tenacity of purpose, and has set itself to carry through the programme of the need for which it had after due deliberation convinced itself. In particular the Cabinet's steady refusal to inflate Roumanian currency has won no little admiration abroad.

The reverse of the picture is seen in the extreme to which the policy of "By ourselves alone" has been carried. A country that proposes to bang the door somewhat emphatically in the face of foreign enterprise and capital needs to be very sure of its own financial and economic stability. Roumania, however, had been able to show only deficits for a number of years. To secure economic stability imports had to be cut down to a considerable extent or exports had to be enormously increased. To increase her exports her latent wealth had to be developed, and the first step to this end was the purchase abroad of large consignments of machinery and other goods, which would at once swell the volume of the imports. Still under the spell of the party watchword, the Roumanian Government hesitated to admit its mistake and to call to its aid foreign capital and experience for the development of national industry. As an alternative, it sought to borrow materials and plant with which to set the wheels of industry in motion, and then, with the profits obtained, to pay back its creditors. The most pressing need was locomotives, and even before the Liberal Government came into power a number of railway engines had been ordered from the Baldwin Locomotive Company, payment being spread over a number of years. On these lines the country was to be gradually stocked with machinery and industrial plant from abroad, and, in spite of the exclusion of foreign capital, it was apparently anticipated that national industry would flourish spontaneously. Expectations, however, were not realised, and the yearly deficit continued. This was the period of the moratorium and blockaded capital, the period when the State found itself unable to pay its debts, whether internal or external, when it had to suspend annual payments to the Baldwin Locomotive Company, and finally had to admit its inability to honour its signature to each of its former Allies in turn. At this period so parlous was the State's credit abroad that it was quite unable to raise a foreign loan. In desperation, the Government found itself compelled to sacrifice one of its most cherished possessions and put up for public auction the State Oil Royalties; but no serious offer was received.

It is difficult to conceive a more unfortunate, a more galling position for a country of very considerable latent wealth—oil, grain, timber, coal, and gold—favourably situated from a geographical point of view, and with some ninety per cent. of its population a frugal, industrious peasantry.

If, as there would seem to be reason to suppose, M. Bratianu's Government has recognised that its policy of isolation and alienation has failed, it would be unkind to inquire too closely whether the change of attitude is due to political considerations rather than to a recantation of unsound economic doctrines. Not for the first time will the Roumanian Royal Family have come to the help of the politicians. Not unnaturally there is a tendency to associate the visits to European capitals of King Ferdinand and Queen Marie with the Government's desire to re-establish Roumanian credit abroad. Only a few months ago the failure of the negotiations for a loan of a hundred million francs from France was generally understood to be due to unwillingness on Roumania's part to identify herself as closely as Czecho-Slovakia had done with France's European policy. At that time, moreover, Italy was playing Short to the French Codlin for Roumania's friendship, and the rejection of the French terms was simplified by the hope that the Roumanians would obtain what they wanted more cheaply from Italy than from France. This expectation fell to the ground when Signor Mussolini, whatever intentions in these matters he may personally have had before, found himself obliged to defer to other Italian interests which resented Roumania's inability to meet her indebtedness. In these circumstances, the need for falling in with France's European scheme may seem far more pressing to the Roumanian Government to-day than when the tour of the King and Queen was originally fixed. The failure of the negotiations with Soviet Russia has left Roumania in a position not altogether free from anxiety on her Bessarabian frontier; and although the whole country supports the firm stand taken by M. Bratianu at Vienna, this result of the breakdown of the Conference, coming on top of the economic situation, must add to the Cabinet's embarrassments. As far as other countries are concerned, the chief interest attaching to the negotiations now taking place in Paris between the Roumanian Foreign Minister and the French Government centres in their ultimate effect on Roumania's general economic policy. It will certainly be to Roumania's interest if France succeeds in bringing about the complete abandonment of the policy of isolation that has not met with the success anticipated by the Liberal Party. On the other hand, it would be possible for Roumania to pay too dearly for temporary relief from present disabilities. The mistake made by M. Bratianu's

NOTES AND NEWS.

167, Strand, London, W.C.2,
Tuesday Morning.

The Exhibition.

This is in every respect a notable week, marking as it does the opening of the British Empire Exhibition at Wembley. There have been many forebodings that it would not be ready, but I think it must now be admitted that the event has proved those who took this view to be wrong. Of course, Wembley is not complete, but that can be said of every exhibition, and right to the end it will be possible to say it with justice of the British Empire Exhibition. There will be continuous alterations throughout, and it would be impossible for it to be otherwise. The main thing is that visitors in May will be just as satisfied as those who visit Wembley in the early autumn, and I can only say that anyone who postpones the inevitable because of the belief that the undertaking is not ready will be very foolish. In this case the later one goes the more difficult a visit is likely to become. Some weeks must still elapse before the real influx of visitors from the provinces and abroad sets in, and when it does even the vast spaces of Wembley are likely to appear populated.

The Fair.

Another four days and another British Industries Fair will be upon us. It will be a unique experience attending this function so late in the year (the Fair has been postponed, as I pointed out some time ago, on account of the Exhibition), and it should be pleasanter than usual if the present weather holds, for there will then be no call on the stoves which are used to heat the White City, and actually make the passages not a little difficult for the visitor. The prospects of the Fair are better than usual, I understand, owing to some extent to the Exhibition, and it is particularly satisfactory to learn that the Near East will be much better represented among the buyers than in previous years. From one country in that region I learn that there will be quite a substantial deputation of important merchants, and it is to be hoped that the result will be the development of important business relations. Very much depends, of course, on the attitude our traders adopt towards the Near East, and it is very possible that the increased representation from that region at the Fair will have a most favourable influence.

Syria's Future.

It is interesting to note that the question of cotton cultivation in Syria is now receiving considerable attention. General Weygand, the French High Commissioner in Syria, who has now arrived in France for a stay of several weeks, dealt with the question in a statement made on his arrival at Marseilles, and pointed out that the type of cotton grown in Egypt was formerly cultivated in Syria, and he takes the very reasonable view that there is no reason why this should not be done again, as there is an ample supply of water. He drew attention to the developments in the Aleppo district, where the growers have made encouraging profits. Cotton growing was abandoned in the north and north-west in favour of hemp, but he stated that the tendency was now to grow cotton again. Generally speaking, conditions in Syria are now very promising, and as an instance of the improvement that has taken place, General Weygand cited the fact that in the past three years the proportion of imports to exports has been reduced from 8 to 1 to 2.25 to 1.

Bulgarian Coupon Payments.

Some particulars regarding the breakdown of the Bulgarian coupon negotiations in Paris are given this week by our Sofia correspondent. The French desired an appreciable increase in the proposed percentage on the ground, I understand, that the type of loan in question ought to have special advantages. The Bulgarians were unable to agree to this, and so the negotiations terminated. Our correspondent, it will be noted, suggests that the arrangement made with the British bondholders will not suffer on this account, and it is to be hoped that this will prove to be the case, but it must be borne in mind, as I pointed out last week, that the British share of the loan is small compared to France's, and that Bulgaria may not think it worth while in the circumstances to make a separate agreement. In that event British bondholders will have to wait in patience until a settlement is arrived at with Paris.

Sudan Trade Expansion.

The figures for the trade of the Sudan in January show a considerable expansion in regard to exports and imports. The value of the exports was £E185,191, as compared with £E153,178 for the corresponding month last year, while re-exports rose from £E7,835 to £E25,408. There was a much greater increase in the value of the imports, which totalled £E402,379, as compared with £E278,926, but this increase is largely accounted for by Government purchases in connection with the Kassala Railway extension.

INDIA AND THE NEAR EAST AT WEMBLEY.

The most lavish use of adjectives would provide but an ineffectual account of the wonders of the British Empire Exhibition at Wembley. There are some things that beggar description. Praise would be futile for one of the masterpieces of Rubens or Titian. A poem that will live is the summit of eloquence itself. A flawless game of chess—one of those gems of the human intelligence—leaves the understanding onlooker gasping—but silent. One accepts such phenomena as these, and one leaves it at that. Of this order is the Exhibition. To say that it is the greatest undertaking of its kind that has ever been held would be to verge on the banal. It is that, it is true, but it is far more. It is a masterly conception of Empire, instinct with imagination from end to end. Here is no mere chronicle of the territories associated in the British Empire, of their industries and products, but a picture painted by a master hand of the greatness of Empire. The whole makes a canvas in which there is nothing to jar on the susceptibilities. Like one of Turner's landscapes, the view cannot but grow upon the visitor. There is a riot of colour, with strange and startling contrasts, but all blends harmoniously into the finished scene. It is amazing that it should be so when the wide range of Empire that has to be interpreted is borne in mind. Here is a strange and richly ornate pavilion, after the East Eastern, and hard by a fortress-like structure cold with the chill of ice in its severe contour of white stucco. A little further on there is a gaunt church-like building imaging one of the many aspects of the Eastern countries of the Empire. And, again, one comes upon a pavilion in white, gigantic and impressive, with a forecourt which, with its exquisite carvings and tout ensemble, is redolent of the East. The blue water of the lake which wends its way through a considerable part of the ground, provides a pleasing relief, heightened by the strange little kiosks that stud the banks at intervals, while in the background, grim and menacing, somewhat suggestive of the ramparts of a mediæval fortress, stands the Stadium. It is a picture that will live long in the memory.

The Near East plays no inconsiderable part in the Exhibition, as was inevitable, and it is to be hoped that one result of Wembley will be the fuller realisation by the business community at home of the intimate association of the Empire with that region. The Sudan, Palestine, Cyprus, and Malta are all worthily represented, and, even so, the toll is incomplete. As it is, the exhibits of the Near East makes a very good showing, and in range and attractiveness will take second place to none that will be on view. It will be surprising, indeed, if it does not come as a revelation that the products of the countries in question are so many and so diversified. Those of Palestine are likely to come in for special attention, because so much has been heard of the progress made in that country under British administration, that there will naturally be considerable curiosity to see whether there are outward and visible signs of this advance. It may be said at once that visitors to the Palestine pavilion will not be disappointed. Palestine and Cyprus share the same pavilion—a long, low building in white, which is slightly relieved by brick-red lines and green windows. In the interior the decorations differ, the Cyprus section being in grey and white, while that devoted to Palestine, which is naturally the larger part of the pavilion, is in white, relieved slightly by decorations. The effect of the pavilion from outside is distinctly austere, but by no means unpleasing. The outline would not appeal to everyone, any more than crème de menthe would, but, then, the appreciation of Eastern architecture, like that of liqueurs is an acquired taste.

The Palestine exhibits will be found to be a very excellent reflex of the growing range of the local industries and of the country's possibilities. Naturally, agriculture, the staple industry, figures very prominently, and the exhibits will include Palestine wine, Jaffa oranges, and tobacco, the cultivation of which has been greatly developed during the past two years. The progress made in the industrial development of the country will be indicated by exhibits of flour, bricks, oil, and other commodities, while plans and photographs are being shown illustrating the harnessing of the Jordan for irrigation and the supply of electric power. The native arts and crafts are fully represented, and visitors will be able to watch glass-workers from Hebron and Yemenite craftsmen in metal plying their trades. Other features of special interest are an exhibit by the Zionist organisation and a comprehensive Government exhibit showing the network of railways and excellent roads and the efforts that are being made to meet modern requirements in regard to agriculture and other matters.

The range and variety of the Cyprus exhibits will no doubt astonish those who have not visited the island. Cyprus exports over a million gallons of wine every year, and wines are prominent among the exhibits. Cyprus will also show that her production of cotton and wool is adequate for local needs, and that she has sufficient stone and marble for the construction of houses. The sponges of Cyprus are well-known, and a notable collection figures among the exhibits, while one of the special attractions of this section of the Exhibition is the series of wonderful carpets that are being shown. It is said, indeed, that the loan section contains some of the most gorgeous fabrics that the Near East has ever produced.

From Cyprus to the Sudan is not a long journey at Wembley, for all the Near Eastern exhibits are fittingly grouped together. The Sudan exhibits are housed in the East Africa pavilion, a somewhat quaint building, in appearance like a walled city, white in colour, relieved by green casements at the top and barred windows below. The Sudan is, of course, one of the great game districts, and the walls contain a number of notable trophies, while the general exhibits indicate the well-known products of the Sudan, such as cotton and gum. The Sudan's part in the Exhibition is not actually limited to this section, for it is naturally concerned in the imposing exhibit staged by the cotton organisations, and it may confidently be expected that, as a result of Wembley, there will be a fuller understanding of the great work that is going on in the Sudan, and of what that region will mean to Lancashire in the near future.

The Indian pavilion, illustrations of which are given in this issue, is modelled on the Taj Mahal, and is a most imposing structure, fully in keeping with India's great position in the Empire. The building is throughout in pure white and the delicate carving gives it a most graceful appearance, an effect which is rather added to by its extent. In the court it is easy if the sun is shining (and that will surely always be the case at Wembley) to imagine oneself transported from North-West London to the heart of India. As for the exhibits, they are just Indian. They illustrate to the full the great trade of the country, its vast production of cereals, jute, hides and skins, and similar products, its great and growing industrial expansion, and its almost limitless possibilities. A considerable part of a day could be with advantage devoted to India alone, and even then some features would be missed. Features of special interest will be a model shown by the Indian railways illustrating the latest developments of the various systems, and a model of the Victoria Memorial at Calcutta, one of the greatest achievements of its kind in the world. Needless to say, sport comes in for adequate attention. A great scene has been prepared representing a portion of the jungle, while another big-game hunting scene has been arranged by the Patiala State.

Close to the Indian pavilion, and between it and the pavilions devoted to the Near Eastern countries, is the Burma pavilion. This is one of the sights of Wembley; in fact, it will probably be voted the most amazing thing there. Its sheer grace of construction, the delicacy of its conception, its wonderful outlines, almost defy description. It is a picture complete in itself, and one is left with the impression that the slightest alteration would spoil it. It puts adulation at a discount. The pavilion itself stands some way back, and in front are pagodas, all, like the pavilion, being constructed of delicately carved wood, so wonderful in appearance that it is difficult to take the eyes off them. Then in the enclosed space in front of the pavilion are the temple bells, familiar to everyone through "Mandalay," while from a mast a Burmese dragon impudently taunts the wind. As in the case of India, Burma's exhibits give a comprehensive review of the numerous and important products of the country. One fears that the overwhelming beauty of the pavilion and the pagodas may make it true for once that it was impossible to see the exhibits for the people.

FUR PRICES FIRM.

The report of the London Fur Trade Association on the March-April raw fur skin sales states:—

There was again a very crowded attendance at these sales, and we have to report that on the average the collection sold at about the same rates which ruled in the last series of sales held in January and February. The result must be considered most gratifying, as the unusually large quantities, following so quickly on the previous offerings, might easily have caused a weaker tendency. It is certainly strong evidence of the general prosperity of the fur trade that the demand was so brisk as to keep prices up, and at the same time to absorb and take off the market by far the greater proportion of the goods offered.

There was again a very large number of German fur dealers present; America was fairly well represented, and there were more French buyers than at the last sales. The English trade bought lightly in the finer and fancy furs, but took up considerable quantities of the so-called "staples," such as skunk and musquash. As no further sales take place until October next, the prices now current may be considered stabilised for the year, and it is hoped that the British Empire Exhibition at Wembley will bring such an influx of visitors to this country as greatly to stimulate trade. It is also expected that the Fur Trade Exhibition, to be held at Holland Park Hall in June next, will be the means of increasing the demand for goods produced in the home market.

YUGOSLAVIA'S TRADE AND CURRENCY.

Economic Position Reviewed.

The following extracts are taken from the report for 1923 of the Export Bank (Izvozna Banka) of Belgrade :—

The trade balance of the past year was favourable. It should be borne in mind that arising from the present system for draft operations 25 per cent. must be deducted from the import figures, whilst the same percentage should be added to the value of the exports. Moreover, it is a noteworthy fact that the official statistics do not distinguish the sums representing the value of the articles imported under the heading of Reparations, and this is all in favour of the country's balance.

The most important factor in the expenditure balance being the trade balance, it is to be expected that the former has also a favourable balance, and this view is strengthened by the fact that this country receives some 20 to 30 million dollars annually from emigrants in America. Only an insignificant sum is required to meet the debts of the State. It should be quite understood that here reference is made to the regular pre-war and post-war debts, whilst the war debts and those incurred under the Peace Treaties are for the moment not taken into account, as their revision is inevitable. Moreover, they are linked with the country's reparation dues, which far exceed all the debts. The problem could be solved by those defeated in the world-war being compelled to pay the reparations stipulated, and in this case Yugoslavia would loyally meet all the debts occasioned by the war, or, alternatively, by the country's creditors taking upon themselves the corresponding share of the reparations to which Yugoslavia is entitled. The other items in the country's expenditure practically cancel themselves entirely, such as the revenue and expenditure of the postal, telegraph and telephone, and railway services, as well as the money imported by foreigners and the sums destined for emigrants to foreign countries.

In the course of the past year the dinar has risen, and during the second half it was almost stabilised in comparison with the dollar and the Swiss franc; the increase in the rate was 23 per cent. The reasons for this rise, indicative of a continued improvement in the future, are principally the increase in agricultural and industrial production, the favourable trade balance and a favourable expenditure balance, the decision of the State to refrain from any new liabilities with the National Bank, with the result that during the whole of the past year the Government has taken absolutely nothing from the bank, the regularising of the State finances by increasing the land tax by 500 per cent. and direct taxation by 30 per cent., the increase of the taxes and duties on consumption, and by the inauguration of the obligatory "Koulouk" labour for the repair of the public highways. All these factors render it possible completely to cover the new Budget. Besides this, there are the improvements in communications, the very favourable internal political situation, and, lastly, the country's very satisfactory foreign relations.

All these factors have already contributed to the relief of the dinar, but it may be trusted that the State will be able to accomplish its remaining task of still further improving the value of the currency and restoring it to its pre-War status.

In the first place, the State should pay its debt of 4,556,000 dinars to the National Bank. This could be done in three ways. Firstly, by the sale of the State domains, amongst which is the "Ljoubia" iron mine, considered to be the best in the whole of Europe, the State forests, the large agricultural domains, of which one is Belje, furnished with the most modern plant and machinery, with complete factories, with a railway, with numerous buildings, and considerable cattle, etc. The second method would be to provide each year for a certain amount in the Budget towards repayment of the debt to the National Bank. The third method would be a foreign loan, to be employed in part for profitable investments and partly for the redemption of the debt at the said bank of issue.

During the past year a credit crisis manifested itself amongst various private enterprises as well as at some banks. This symptom is to be explained by the fact that these firms and companies undertook business difficult to realise and beyond their financial capacity, investing capital in industrial undertakings, real estate, and various long-term transactions, only short-term credits remaining available. Having need of money to continue transactions, they had no possibility of finding new credits, even on behalf of firms known to be perfectly solvent. Further, overproduction had been manifest in several branches of industry, as well as an accumulation of goods by the importers. It is, however, a limited crisis, which will not assume a general character; the enterprises affected have started to put their affairs in order, and are restricting transactions to their financial capacity and reduced credit and getting rid of surplus stocks of goods.

Owing to the increased general charges and taxes, the rate of interest was raised in the past year, and was the highest charged so far. The first-class banks gave credits at 16 per cent. to 18 per cent., but it must not be forgotten that the general charges have to be calculated with an additional 60 per cent. to 80 per cent

The production of the Anglo-Egyptian oilfields for the week ended April 11 was :—Gemsah, 10 tons (previous week 5 tons); Hurghada, 2,596 tons (previous week, 2,489 tons).

The Egyptian Delta Land and Investment Company recommends a dividend for 1923 of 6d. per share.

BULGARIAN DEBT NEGOTIATIONS.

Sofia, April 14.

It is announced that the negotiations which have been proceeding in Paris between representatives of the Bulgarian Government and the French banks and bondholders have broken down. These negotiations concern the payment of the coupons for loans made by France before the War. Since 1921 payment has been made in French francs, but owing to the fall of the franc it was found necessary to make a new arrangement, and Bulgaria offered to pay 33 per cent in gold. The French, it is reported, consider this insufficient, and request 38 per cent. in gold. At a recent meeting the Bulgarian Government agreed to go as far as 35 per cent., but as this offer has been refused, they have instructed their delegates to return. As far as is known, the negotiations between Bulgaria and the British bondholders hold good. These specify the payment of 33 per cent. in gold.

Carillon Bells at the Exhibition.

In the Palace of Engineering at the British Empire Exhibition is installed in the clock tower of the Vickers Research Building a very fine set of carillon bells, which have been graciously lent by the War Memorial Committee, Simcoe, Ontario, Canada, and which have been cast by the well-known bell founders, Messrs. Gillett and Johnston, of Croydon. The bells, which will be sent to Canada immediately the Exhibition terminates, are twenty-three in number, covering a range of two octaves, including all but the two lower semitones. A weight-driven tower clock movement chimes the Westminster quarters and strikes the hours, and, after the last stroke of each hour, releases the starting switch of a fully automatic electro-pneumatic machine, which then plays some well-known air. In addition, there is a hand clavier consisting of light wooden levers and foot pedals attached to the clappers, and it is with this that the fullest beauty of the bell music is obtained, the delicate action allowing the carilloneur to play with expression as on a piano and to execute elaborate and complicated cadences with the volume of sound rising from an almost inaudible murmur to the full power of the combined carillon of bells.

This carillon, although not heavy as to weight of bell metal when compared with some of the largest modern installations cast by Messrs. Gillett and Johnston, has, however, a remarkable sweetness and purity of tone, the notes of the bells being clear and melodious and blending together with an unusually pleasing effect, the result of the perfection to which this firm have brought their method of tuning, whereby all the harmonics of each bell are in absolute tune with the fundamental tone, so that each bell represents a correct musical chord in itself, as well as being perfectly in tune with the other bells of the carillon. This method of tuning carillons, which are chromatic sets of bells composed of many octaves, has placed England in the position of being the acknowledged premier bell-founding country, and important contracts from all parts of the world are being secured in increasing numbers.

During the summer arrangements will be made for the leading carilloneurs (bell organists) of Belgium and Holland to visit Wembley and give special recitals on the carillon, notice of which will be given in due course in the Press. Messrs. Gillett and Johnston are engaged in completing, amongst other orders, the great carillon of fifty-three bells for the Park Avenue Church in New York, which will be the largest in existence; also a carillon for Boston, U.S.A., as well as a carillon of thirty-five bells for Holland, in which connection it might be mentioned that these bells are now tuned more accurately than even the famous old carillons of the Netherlands.

Marine Motors.

The Ailsa Craig Motor Company are exhibiting specimens of their well-known marine motors in the Palace of Engineering. The details of the engines, which are typical of a range of sizes from 6 h.p. up to 36 h.p., are as follows:—Kid 10-14 h.p. four-cylinder marine motor, built with multiple plate clutch and reverse gear all in one unit. This is the popular £100 model complete. 28-36 h.p. six-cylinder marine motor, built with multiple plate clutch and reverse gear all in one unit, price £262.

The special features in the design of the engines exhibited are the direct acting overhead camshaft with overhead valves operating in a removable head, and manufactured in such a way that the whole of the combustion chamber is machined, thus making the engine notably efficient and smooth running when using even the cheapest kerosene oil. An important feature of the design is the great accessibility afforded to every part by means of the large crank-case doors and the removable head and cover plates. Another notable feature is the position of the magneto, which is placed vertically so that the contact maker is on top in an ideal position for easy inspection and adjustment.

An interesting feature of all the firm's marine motors is the desaxee crank-shaft or "Offset Cylinder" design, by which the cylinder is set slightly in advance of the crank-shaft centre, thus obviating side thrust on the cylinder walls. The effect of this is apparent in the power, flexibility, and wonderfully smooth and silent running of the engine, even after hard use for many years. It is this type of engine which won the British Motor Boat Club's Challenge Cup for Reliability by the highest percentage ever recorded in the history of the club.

The import duty leviable in India on salted fish, wet or dry, has been fixed at the rate of 7½ annas per maund of 82 2-7 lb. avoirdupois.

An agreement has been arrived at between Switzerland and Roumania with regard to the sum of 34,000,000 Swiss francs (about £1,360,000) which was advanced in 1921 to Roumania for purchasing goods in Switzerland. Nearly 14,000,000 francs have already been repaid in cereals, and the remainder will be repaid by seven half-yearly instalments of 2,500,000, plus the interest.

Dried Fruit.—Though the week has been a very brief one, owing to the incidence of the holidays, business has been on a remarkably good scale. Currants have continued in good request, and almost all grades are moving off well. There has been a fair demand for sultanas, mainly from manufacturers, and a considerable amount of Smyrna fruit has been taken. Figs have again been an excellent spot, while plums have been the medium of good business. There has been a steady demand for dates.

Oranges.—As is inevitably the case, the approach of the holiday season led to a development in the demand for oranges, and very good business has been put through. Prices are somewhat higher, particularly for Jaffas.

THE JEWISH WINE INDUSTRY IN PALESTINE.

The "Commercial Bulletin" of the Government of Palestine contains an interesting article on the Jewish Wine Industry in Palestine, from which we take the following extracts:—

The revival of the wine industry in Palestine commenced with the establishment by Jewish colonists of the colony of Rishon-le-Zion in 1882. Baron Edmond de Rothschild was actively interested in the enterprise, and sent out a number of experts to examine the possibilities of vine cultivation in Palestine. Within a short space of time thousands of dunams of land around Rishon were planted with vines. On American species were grafted varieties of the best known species of other countries, whilst the most famous of Spanish vines were also introduced. Viticulture on such a large scale created an urgent need for presses and modern processes of manufacture, and the building of the large cellars now in existence was commenced. For this purpose expert engineers from France were employed. The present cellars are not only the largest in the Near East, but are included amongst the finest in the world.

Until 1911 the cellars were under the control of Baron Rothschild, the vine growers being paid a fixed price for all grapes delivered to the presses. In 1911 the administration of the cellars was handed over to the growers on condition that they organised a co-operative society to control their interests, and the "Co-operative Society of the Rishon-le-Zion and Zikhron Jacob Wine Cellars" was accordingly created.

The present membership of the society is 283, and a special account is kept by the headquarters of the society on behalf of every member; the members receive advances during the year pending the end of the year and the settlement of the budget, when the definite price is fixed and each receives the balance due to him. The society is administered by a council consisting of ten members: four from Rishon, three from Rehoboth, two from Zikhron, and one from Gedera. The council meets from time to time to discuss questions of principle, the execution of the council's decisions being vested in the general manager of the society. Five colonies are now controlled by this co-operative society as follows:—

Rishon-le-Zion was founded in 1882 by a group of ten colonists, who purchased an area of 3,300 dunams of sandy land near Jaffa, known as Uyun Kara. They were joined by another group of ten shortly afterwards, and for the first year cereals only were planted. The crop was a failure. It was at this time that Baron Rothschild became interested, and he introduced viticulture. The boundaries of the colony were gradually extended as more people settled on the land, and the whole colony concentrated on vine cultivation. Rishon now covers an area of 14,600 dunams, of which about 5,000 dunams are planted with vines, 4,000 dunams almond trees, and 300 with orange groves, the remainder being olive and other plantations. In addition to the wine presses . . . there are about 300 buildings, a synagogue, schools, public hall, etc., and a very fine avenue of palms. The inhabitants of the colony number 1,400. Rishon-le Zion is connected with Jaffa by a good metalled road.

Rehoboth was founded in 1890, and is situated on the main Haifa-Kantara Railway line. The area of this colony is 14,000 dunams, of which about 4,000 are vines, 5,000 almond trees, 700 orange groves, and the remainder olives and various fruit trees. A special wine press was built, but the wine is taken immediately after vintage to the Rishon wine cellars. The number of inhabitants is 1,300, and the colony possesses some 200 houses apart from public buildings.

To the south of Rishon, between Rishon and Rehoboth, is situated the small colony of Ness Ziona. It was founded in 1882. The area is approximately 2,800 dunams, of which half are orange-groves, 500 dunams vines, and 600 dunams almond trees. Ness Ziona has a population of 320.

Gedera was founded in 1885 by the Hovevé Zion, who settled in it all the Bilou Pioneers, with the exception of those who settled in Rishon. It is the most southern of the colonies of Judea, and is situated close to the Haifa-Kantara Railway line. The land of Gedera being of a different nature, a system of mixed cultivation was adopted. The total area is 6,000 dunams, comprising 600 dunams vines, 1,500 dunams almond trees, and the remainder cereals. In view of the distance from Rishon, a special plant has been installed for the distillation of alcohol, the finished product being taken to Rishon for use in the manufacture of cognac. The population of this colony is 140.

Zikhron Jacob is situated immediately south of Haifa, and was founded in 1883 by immigrants from Roumania. This colony was formerly known as Zummarin, and was renamed Zikhron Jacob after the visit of Baron Edmond de Rothschild in honour of his father. The colony constitutes one of the most picturesque spots in Palestine. Its total area is 30,000 dunams, about 1,500 of which are planted with vines, and the remainder with cereals, olives, almonds, etc. A wine press has been erected in Zikhron Jacob, which is, however, on a much smaller scale than that at Rishon. The population of this colony numbers 1,300.

The cultivation of the vine in Palestine has progressed cautiously. As a preliminary proceeding the land is carefully prepared by deep ploughing to a depth of 50 to 60 cms., and only after ascertaining that the ground is suitable for vine growing are the pits dug to receive the vines. The distance between each vine is 1.75 to 2 metres, or from 2,500 to 3,250 vines to the hectare. As previously stated, vines of American origin are preferred, as they are free from Phyloxera.

After planting, which is usually done in December and January, the land is ploughed, the ploughing being continued at intervals throughout the summer. Sauterne is planted on chalky and hilly land, whilst Alicante and Cornin, which supplies the well-known iron-wine, need the reddish Hamra land. The Melhak and Caberny, which supply the Bordeaux quality, are planted on the black land of the plains. In the second year after plantation these types are grafted with the American vine. At the end of the second year the young vine is pruned. Ploughing is continued until the end of the third year, and in July of the fourth year the first grapes are gathered. Twice or three times during the summer the vines are sprayed with copper sulphate. The worst enemy of the vines, however, is the young fox. Immediately the young vine appears the foxes attack the vineyards and do a considerable amount of damage, and it is, therefore, necessary to employ guards during the early part of the season.

Vintage commences about July 15 to 20, when the grapes contain about 10 per cent. of sugar. Grape gathering begins early in the morning, young men and women gathering the grapes and placing them in baskets which hold some 30 kilos each. The grapes are then conveyed direct to the great weighing machines of the wine cellars. In vintage days the scene near the weighing machine is a very busy one, hundreds of carts await their turn to unload, whilst a continuous stream of heavily laden camels from more distant vineyards slowly approach the wine presses from all directions. From the first day after the vintage commences this scene continues for a space of a month; there is then a short pause before the receipt of grapes is resumed. These later grapes contain 15 to 20 per cent. of sugar.

SUDAN PRODUCE.

The following further extracts are taken from the report of the Central Economic Board of the Sudan Government for February :—

Dura.

White Nile Province.—The safra dura crop is estimated at 20,000 standard ardebs of 12 keilas (135 kilos). 858 ardebs of feterita dura were exported from El Dueim, the average price being P.T.69 per ardeb, and 16 tons from Kosti at an average price of P.T.69 per ardeb.

Kordofan Province.—The average price in El Obeid market per standard ardeb of dura Zina was 857 m/ms.

Wheat.

Berber Province.—Bouga : Wheat is ripening rapidly, and is practically without exception a very fine crop in all varieties. Kitiab : The wheat crop is patchy, but there are some good plots in Gabrab, Nuba, and Hanek. The Berberines have, on the whole, quite a fair crop.

Dongola Province.—Nuri : Wheat has improved a lot, and should be a good average crop. It is almost ripe. Gureir : The wheat is now almost ripe, and gives every promise of being an excellent crop. Ghaba : A good wheat crop is anticipated.

Berber Province —The average price of maize in El Damer in February was 588 m/ms. per 100 kilos. Kitiab Pumping Station Report, February :—The maize crop is uneven, but the Hanek crop is mostly a good crop.

The Fung Province.—121 tons of maize were exported by rail from Makwar River Siding.

Ground Nuts.

Kordofan Province.—10,740 ardebs of ground nuts were sold in El Obeid market at an average price of P.T.33½ per ardeb of 210 rottles (94 kilos).

Upper Nile Province.—519 ardebs of 200 rottles (90 kilos) of ground nuts were exported from Renk during the month.

The Fung Province.—99 tons of ground nuts were exported by rail from Makwar River Siding during the month.

Livestock, Hides, and Skins.

Kassala Province.—203 cattle were sent from Kassala to El Damer and Suakin. 290 cattle were exported from Gedare. 153 hides and 1,160 sheep skins were exported.

Berber Province.—1,155 sheep and goats and 373 cattle were sold in Damer market during the month, of which 149 sheep and 27 cattle were exported to other parts of the Sudan. Average prices : Sheep £E0.889 and cattle £E2.625.

Roads and Communications.

Mongalla Province.—An Amadi merchant is running a one-ton Ford lorry between that place and Tombe with considerable success. It is too heavy for many of the bridges, which are only meant for light traffic during the rains, and it has been found better to cut away the banks of the khors and not use the bridges.

The traffic receipts of the Egyptian Delta Light Railways for the eleven days ended March 31 amounted to £E8,859, making the total for the year £E330,022, as compared with £E335,193 for the preceding year.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Futures Rather Strong.

The Alexandria Commercial Company, in their report for the week ended April 11, state :—

Since our last report the futures market has been rather strong. New York has registered fresh rises almost daily, and May is again worth over 31.25 c. against 29.65 c. a week ago and 26.70 c. a fortnight ago. This recovery has had as a consequence the restoration of spinners' confidence in high levels of prices for the remainder of the season with a corresponding inducement to enter into fresh commitments. The demand from abroad has therefore much improved, the most active centre being Lancashire, where industrial conditions have been much more satisfactory during the last few weeks. Despite the large business done on the Liverpool spot market, and the heavy reduction in stocks, prices there continue to be in general below those of Alexandria; however, we expect an increase of this difference during the coming months. At the second April tender 250 krs. dockets were issued. Ashmouni has again shown exceptional firmness; whatever cotton is left is very firmly held, and the market is very narrow and apt to rise abnormally on any buying orders. Dealings in new crop options are daily becoming more numerous as spinners are buying new crop shipments on account of their relative cheapness. In the interior, the ginning factories are busy ginning the remaining stocks, as no cotton is allowed to be ginned after the end of the month. Our opinion is that the market will continue to show firmness owing to the strong spot position, and should the recent trade demand further expand, another sharp rise is probable. New crop is yet too far away, and at least five months must elapse before the first lots appear on this market, and it is difficult to foresee what may happen in the meantime. The week's receipts amount to 40,141 krs., against exports 100,921 krs.; the stock stands at 1,342,047 krs.

Spot.—We have had a week of better markets at Minet el Bassal with an improved demand from spinners. Sales amount to about 11,800 B/s, of which we estimate 7,900 B/s Sakel, 3,850 B/s uppers, 50 B/s white, and a few bales of Pilion.

Sakellarides.—As last week, the grades from good fair to about good continue to absorb the bulk of the demand, and only a small demand has been found for the lower grades. Prices of spot against contracts are without much change. Good staple cotton is becoming hard to find.

Uppers.—Once more the medium and good qualities have been in request, and the lower qualities have been neglected. Prices of spot against contracts are generally without much change, but inclined to ease, with the exception of fully good fair, which is very firm and in good request. This grade is worth at present three-quarters to $1 above April contracts.

TEXTILES.

IF you wish to obtain your Textile goods from England at the lowest possible prices, communicate with K. JEBARA, 52, Princess Street, Manchester. (Established 1887.)

Brown and Pilion have been neglected, and only a few bales have been done. Spot prices against contracts are without much change, and inclined to ease.

White.—A small business has been done. Prices of spot against contracts are generally unchanged.

Crop, 1924.—The new crop is progressing well under favourable climatic conditions and an ample water supply. The report of the Ministry of Agriculture for March reads: "Weather was changeable during the month, but did practically no harm to the crop, having only caused a few days' delay in the preparation of land. Sowing was in full swing during the whole month. Germination in early-sown fields and the condition of the plants are satisfactory. Slight local attacks of cut-worm, borer, sore-shin, and aphis in different localities have caused unimportant damage. The area under Upper Egyptian cottons in Lower Egypt is reported to be larger than last year."

The irrigation report of the Ministry of Public Works, February 21 to March 20, reads: "Lower Egypt: Water supply was sufficient to meet all requirements. Upper Egypt: Irrigation conditions were satisfactory everywhere, so that they do not call for special comment.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Inquiry for Egyptian

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended April 16:—

Egyptian Spot.—A large inquiry for Egyptian cotton has been witnessed during the past seven days, and the fact that sales have not been considerably larger has been due, in our opinion, solely to the fact that many spinners have been unable to find their cotton. As an example of how the market is being swept, we might mention that it has been a common occurrence recently for spinners to arrive here to purchase and to find themselves anything from 50 to 75 points "out" in their ideas of the cost of their requirements. It must be many years since such a pronounced hardening in the basis for Egyptian cotton has been seen on this market so early in the season. Granted that a number of spinners have covered themselves by purchases of c.i.f. cotton for the next two months or so, it is fairly obvious that a still greater number have not done so, and the outlook for the latter is anything but pleasant.

What little remains of the "bread and butter" varieties is either already in the hands of speculators or is being rapidly absorbed by them. Even the stock of good to fine Sakellaridis, which until quite recently was considered to be somewhat of a "drug" in our market here, has been thinned out to such an extent that ancient lots, which have grown hoary in warehouse, have at last come into their own and been snapped up. In these qualities also the basis hardens almost daily, and a distinct reflection of this is seen in the enhanced interest which spinners are taking in Sudan Sakellaridis, a cotton which finds new friends wherever it is tried.

The local stock of uppers has now dwindled to insignificant proportions, and is held almost entirely by speculators, who are in the fortunate position of being able to fix their own price. The good to fine cotton appears to have vanished. In Sakel, prices have varied somewhat, but, roughly speaking, fully good fair cotton obtains here to-day 150 on May Egyptian and good 225 to 250 on. In Sudan, a good business has taken place, chiefly in the Sakel variety, for which up to 24.00d. has been paid. Cotton from pass price contracts downwards has met with but little support, but it would certainly appear that, sooner or later, the demand will have to embrace these lower qualities for lack of the better cotton.

C.i.f. business at the commencement of the week was good, but latterly has tailed off somewhat owing to the uncertainty prevailing as to the immediate course of the future markets, which have again begun to oscillate somewhat violently. Estimated sales, 6,500 bales Egyptians and 1,450 Sudan. Quotations of brown and upper are reduced 10 points. In Sakellaridis, extra fine shows a decline of 40 points; fine is 10 points lower; good is unchanged; fully good fair and below are 5 points higher. F.G.F. Sakel to-day 22.30d.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

Quiet Tone in Evidence.

The Manchester cotton trade review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended April 19 states:—

Owing to the Easter holidays, the working week has been confined to the first four days, and, as is usual at such times, business has been rather quiet. This normal tendency has been further developed by a reaction in American raw cotton prices, which, whilst enabling certain negotiations to be carried through, has put a stop for the time being to a much larger number of others. Nevertheless a fairly good general inquiry continues to be experienced, and the tone of the market maintains the improvement recently reported.

Yarn.—There were signs that the rising prices of previous weeks were beginning to check business in American counts, and some spinners have made reductions to correspond with their cheaper raw cotton. Others, however, have been able to maintain their prices. Operations generally are for early delivery. There has been a fairly good demand for Egyptian counts.

Cloth.—Whilst there has been a good volume of inquiry, business, for the reasons mentioned above, has not been easy to negotiate, and the turnover has been reduced. Demand is still principally for fancy goods, but the position of manufacturers of shirtings and other staple lines is said to be better than it has been for some little time past.

Raw Cotton.—A fluctuating market has again been experienced, and the price of American is over ½ per lb. down. Egyptian has met with a good demand, and is 30 points higher.

Closing prices on Thursday were as follows:—American Fully Middling, 18.85; Egyptian Fully Good Fair, 22.70.

The traffic receipts of the South Indian Railway Company for the week ended March 22 amounted to Rs. 9,80,005, making the total from April 1, 1923, Rs. 4,90,96,720.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

NEW STEAMER FOR RANGOON SERVICE.

The owners of the new steamer Kemmendine—Messrs. P. Henderson and Co., of Glasgow—celebrated her completion by Messrs. William Denny Bros., Dumbarton, by inviting a number of guests to luncheon on board to wish the vessel bon voyage on her maiden trip.

The vessel, which has been specially designed for the Rangoon service, is 463 ft. in length over all, 59 ft. in breadth, 33 ft. 4 in. in depth, of 7,837 tons gross, and 9,300 tons carrying capacity. Accommodation is provided for 130 first-class passengers in staterooms amidships on the bridge and shade decks. In nearly all the rooms cot bedsteads are fitted, and on the shade deck there are only single berth rooms. Only first-class passengers are carried, and for these there are provided dining-room, music-room, library, lounge, smoke-room, and verandah, all tastefully decorated and lighted by square-leaded windows. For the handling of cargo—through specially large and unencumbered hatches—there are twenty derricks, lifting from three to forty tons.

In her design the vessel embodies the results of the experience of owners and builders in producing high-class ships for this service, and her up-to-date equipment should place her in the forefront in fostering and expanding the close connection there has always been with Burma and with which her owners, ever since the inception of their service in 1860, have been so intimately identified. The vessel is supplied with a Standard Mark VI. Sperry gyro-compass equipment, consisting of master and repeater compasses, also an automatic course recorder.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The Hellenic Polity.

The new Greek Republic has sought stability by means of a Draconian decree. No country has been a more consistent exponent of the doctrine of its own philosopher that all things remain in a state of flux, but on this occasion the new Hellenic Polity is to be proof against the rule for ten years. During this period it is forbidden to speak or to write against the republican régime, to discuss the Glücksburg dynasty or its members, to attack the head of the State, or to attempt to undermine the national unity. A close season for the more extreme forms of political rancour by which the last nine years of Greek history have been characterised was certainly indicated, and no exception could have been taken to the enforcement of a political truce for three years. To allow no stock-taking of the new order for a decade, however, savours of a disbelief in the reality of the plebiscite as a reflection of the true opinion of the country. It seems to clash with the general principles of M. Papanastasiou's policy, and we are not surprised that he has found it necessary to declare that the decree will not be rigorously applied, is not intended to curtail personal liberty, and aims, unfortunately, at assisting pacification by limiting useless discussions and the unnecessary inflaming of passions. If that is the purpose of the decree it is unfortunate that such a formidable weapon has been forged for possible misuse. The recent history of Greece suggests that faults are not confined to the governed, but sometimes appear among those who govern. Already in M. Papanastasiou's temporary absence from Athens a political arrest was made by one of his subordinates which he caused to be rescinded at once. If the new régime had decided to rely entirely upon the admirable example of conciliation set by M. Papanastasiou himself, and had refrained from framing a law which may be a temptation to those in authority less capable than he of restoring unity to Greece, it would have been better.

The Refugee Problem.

Now that the Republic has been recognised by the Powers, the Greek Government will be able to press on with a comprehensive scheme for the settlement on the land of the refugees from Eastern Thrace and Asia Minor. Mr. Morgenthau, Chairman of the League of Nations Settlement Commission, has expressed the opinion that Greece has grappled with this problem in a manner worthy of the highest praise; but much still remains to be done. The majority of the refugees are at present wholly dependent upon private charity, as the Settlement Commission is empowered to spend its funds only on the actual settlement of refugees in permanent productive employment. A million and a-quarter acres, mainly in Macedonia, have been allocated by the Greek Government for the purposes of settlement, but if the scheme is to combine relief for the refugees with permanent advantage to Greece, it will entail a heavy expenditure, which the Greek Government must meet by a loan. The amount involved is understood to be six million pounds, and it is to be hoped that Greece will be able to find the whole or the greater part of this sum in Britain. The British public will not wish to forget that it was mainly owing to its own Government's fatal policy of egging on the Greeks in their Asia Minor venture that they are now confronted with their refugee problem.

France and the Little Entente.

The visit of the King and Queen of Roumania to Paris is to be followed by a visit from the King and Queen of Yugoslavia. It is now generally accepted that the prolonged stay of the Roumanian Foreign Minister in Paris was used to endeavour to persuade France to promise the Roumanian Government some form of support that would help it in maintaining a firm front to Soviet claims in regard to Bessarabia. The French Government appears to be anxious to improve the occasion by forcing the two other countries of the Little Entente to follow the example of Czecho-Slovakia in concluding a general defensive alliance with her. Accordingly, if Roumania wants French support she has to modify her own previous attitude to France's desire to have the Little Entente identified with her European policy, and to persuade Yugoslavia to do the same. In neither country does public opinion show much enthusiasm for the idea of being tied to France's chariot-wheels. Among the Roumanians the need for disarming

Digitized by Google

Russian hostility is recognised, but, unless we are mistaken, the people would prefer a policy that would give them peace with Russia to one that runs the risk of bringing about a permanent estrangement. In Yugoslavia any agreement that would seem to be directed against Russia will be viewed with the gravest misgivings. Although the cogency of Roumania's fears will be admitted, we hope that France's unworthy policy of deliberately doing violence to the League of Nations idea will not receive encouragement from Roumania and Yugoslavia. These two countries need not concern themselves with Central European politics, and as soon as they can restore complete harmony among the four States of South-Eastern Europe, they will have in themselves, with the backing of the League of Nations, all the strength required to withstand interference from whatever quarter. Entangling alliances in other directions will, unless they are very careful, act as an effective barrier to a Balkan Alliance, with which their real interests in the future are indissolubly linked.

The Turkish Constitution.

The Grand National Assembly has passed the Constitution of the new Turkish Republic, and has adjourned for six months. At the last moment the Assembly refused to sanction the statesmanlike policy recommended by the Special Commission that prepared the draft Constitution which would have made all Turkish subjects, without distinction of race or religion, Turks, and would have entitled them to equal rights. To enable the Republic to carry out its determination to eliminate Greeks and Armenians from the public services, the clause in question was so amended as to restrict the title of Turks in the case of non-Moslems to indicate that they are "compatriots," while withholding from them rights of equal citizenship. There can be little doubt that the recommendation of the Special Commission was in the best interests of Turkey. The troubles of the recent past arose from the fact that the Greeks were being encouraged to look forward to the day when they would come under Greek jurisdiction. To-day that dream has been effectually dissipated, and for a generation, at least, unless the new Turkey proves a complete failure, the chief aim of the Greeks and Armenians domiciled in Turkey will be to prove themselves good Turks. The best way to help them to identify their interests with the interests of Turkey is to accord them some measure of confidence. The proposal to give them at once equal rights of citizenship would have made the best possible impression, not only on the people concerned, but also on the world in general. It would have argued belief in themselves on the part of the Turks. As things are, the Grand National Assembly has now admitted that political discrimination in favour of foreigners was not Turkey's only difficulty, and places on record its view that, man for man, the Greek or Armenian is better than the Turk, and must not, therefore, be allowed to compete on equal terms. This is a view that may appeal to Angora, but will not be endorsed in Constantinople.

Britain and Egypt.

According to present arrangements, negotiations between the British and Egyptian Governments regarding the "reserved subjects" will take place this summer, when, it is hoped, Zaghloul Pasha will be the guest of the British Government in London. Of the reserved subjects, the only one that is likely to prove difficult of settlement is the question of the Sudan. It is essential for the success of a conference that the parties should approach any subject of discussion with full knowledge, but with minds prepared to receive and to weigh impartially new arguments. For this reason we deprecate any attempt to prejudge one question or another, and we trust that the Egyptian Prime Minister has been wrongly reported when he is credited with the statement, said to have been made at a meeting of the Zaghloulist Parliamentary Party on April 26, that he would be entering upon the London negotiations with the definite object of securing complete independence for Egypt and the Sudan. The expression is in itself a contradiction of terms, for we can hardly suppose that Zaghloul Pasha considers a Sudanese Sudan ready for complete independence, carrying with it, say, membership of the League of Nations. To suggest that the present condominium should be disturbed and the Sudan be made subject to Egypt would not entail independence for the Sudanese. In all the circumstances, therefore, it would seem wiser for the Egyptian Government to follow the example of the British Government, and to refrain from inviting the public to prejudge the question before their representatives have met and exchanged views.

India's Discontents.

The public interest in India's present discontents appears to be increasing, but much of what has been written in the past week tends to obscure the issues rather than define them. Five lines of thought can, however, be distinguished. In the first place, official Delhi holds that inquiry into existing difficulties must precede any consideration of proposals for amending the Constitution. Secondly, it is argued in some quarters that the inquiry into difficulties ought to suffice, and the question of amendment stand over until 1929, the date indicated by Parliament for a statutory Commission. Thirdly, most Indian politicians want this statutory Commission at once. Fourthly, some people want to run the inquiry and the Commission into one. Lastly, some other people think that only a constitutional Convention is wanted to make everybody happy. The last two classes can be briefly disposed of. A Convention implies a democratic franchise, and to hold one on the present one per cent. basis would be ludicrous; the mere suggestion is sufficient to show the distance which India has still to travel. As for mixing up the two inquiries, it seems to us that there can be no advantage whatever in uniting two entities which have to pursue different objects, by different methods, and from entirely different points of departure.

The Right Line of Action.

As to the remaining classes, we think Delhi is quite right in beginning with a purely official inquiry into difficulties and causes of friction, but we do not think this inquiry can possibly suffice. India has moved more quickly, whether on the track or off it, than Parliament foresaw five years ago. The actual position is in some respects obscure, and we believe substantial benefit would accrue from an impartial examination, designed to bring out the essential facts. We differ, however, from most of the advocates of a Commission on the question of its membership. They urge that, to be of any use, the body must be representative of all "interests," while in our view there can be room for one interest only, the overriding interest of democracy. When a Commission is appointed, we should like to have it made quite clear that Indian politicians are being submitted to a test examination, and cannot expect to have a voice in marking their answer-papers. The indispensable qualifications for membership of such a Commission are a reasoned faith in the theory of democracy, and a wide experience of its practice; those qualifications cannot be found united in the India of to-day, and we must look for them in those countries where the Government is in fact responsible to the people.

An Ideal Commission.

To make our meaning clear, we will indicate the composition of the ideal body of examiners as we see it. The chairman should be an ex-Governor from one of the larger Dominions, and all his colleagues should be members of democratic legislatures, say two from Westminster, one from Ottawa, and one from Canberra; add a senator from Washington, with a deputy from the French Chamber, and we obtain a body whose findings on questions of political fact would command the respect of the civilised world. We shall be told that it would not have the confidence of "India," and that is probably true in a limited sense, if only because its report would certainly begin and end with the franchise, and apparently no Indian politician likes to hear the franchise even mentioned; but what is wanted now is to bring the essential facts of the situation into the daylight, and purge Delhi once for all from the mists of obscurity which its denizens have come to regard as natural. We do not, of course, expect our ideal Commission to be realised in every detail, but the closer the approximation, the greater will be the value of the inquiry to India itself, as well as to Parliament, for whose benefit it will primarily be conducted.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Tuesday Morning.

The Empire Exhibition.

We have during the past week been too near, perhaps, to the great Empire Exhibition accurately to appreciate its real significance. The tremendous nature of its opening, its colossal dimensions, and so on, have been so assiduously drummed into our now unwilling ears that it is difficult not to be a little tired of the subject, and to take up the attitude that it is a topic not to be discussed until the whole thing is actually ready for final appraisement.

Of course, the Exhibition was not ready by the scheduled time—it is, for that matter, far from being ready now—but in spite of that the opening was very impressive. The broadcasting of the King's speech added just that touch of appeal to the individual which would have been lacking had the affair been merely reported in the exaggerated pages of the newspapers. Even as it was the papers differed widely in their accounts of what happened last Wednesday. Some of them, those chiefly which omitted to mention the presence of dust, wire, narrow avenues, and so on, stated that 120,000 people assisted at the opening; others, a little more critical, placed the assembly at about 50,000.

The conclusion that most people have come to is that the Exhibition is a place to be avoided until about June, but that it must then be visited at all costs.

The Cup Final.

One thing at least the building of the Exhibition appears to have taught the authorities, and that is how to manage a football crowd. Even those papers which delight to show how much better they know how to contrive things than the official mind had no grumble to make at the arrangements for the Final of the Football Cup last Saturday. Everyone who got a seat in the Stadium saw Newcastle defeat Aston Villa by two goals to nothing.

However, one has to be more of a psychologist than I am to understand the enormous excitement that Association played under professional rules creates in the bosom of our hardy race, and I have therefore to attribute to my ignorance an inability to share in the weeping and the gnashing of teeth that have greeted the downfall (for that is what the football journalists call it) of the Birmingham side.

Reparations.

The publication of the answer of the four Governments—of Britain, of Belgium, of Italy, and of France—to the Reparations Commission about the Experts' scheme leads to the inference that nothing definite can be done until after the French elections next month.

The crux of the matter seems to be that whereas Britain, Belgium, and Italy would like to see French action precede German action, the French naturally wish to put the horse before the cart. Opinion in France is extremely excited over the forthcoming elections, but there would seem to be little chance of an Anglo-phil, or Left, or intelligentsia party, as they call themselves, victory ov r M. Poincaré. Which only means that next month the position will be yet more difficult than it now is.

Political Affairs.

Despite the fact that the two principal actors are Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, who binds himself up to scorn of all opponents, and Mr. Lloyd George, who lashes himself to fury, political affairs are beginning once more to become really interesting. The farce of our present position is at last being felt even by the agents of it, and whereas the Socialists talk of an election in another two or three years, the Conservatives incline to think (at the moment they are incapable of doing more than incline) that this pleasant diversion may befall us at any minute. It is said that Mr. Baldwin (once a leader of men) is to set the ball rolling this very month, although his programme has not yet been disclosed.

From the point of view of an election, there are one or two things that may be taken for certain, but they are all, unfortunately, in the destructive sense. Now that the issue of Free Trade has been decided, the Liberals will surely lose a great proportion of the votes that they got in the last election: their doom is unconscionably slow, but it is certain. And if the Conservatives "evolve" a programme just to defeat the present Government, they will get but few votes from any self-respecting citizen. We have had enough of empiricism and opportunism in our politics to last us this century. But if the Conservatives do get in before the Empire Exhibition is over—well, we shall have the Government we deserve.

However much one may detest the politics of Socialists, of the Labour Party, and of the personnel in general of the present Government, it is absurd to say that Conservatism is a living and a constructive creed. It can be stated in broad terms only, and these differ in essentials hardly at all from any Labour manifesto. If the Conservatives do not soon possess themselves of a programme that may appeal not only to the instinct, but to the intelligence also, the acquisition by them of Lord Rothermere's holding in the Daily Mail Trust would avail them little. This acquisition is both widely rumoured and denied, and it may be that they are missing the chance of their lifetime, or, rather, if they have not by that time betaken to themselves some positive convictions, of their senility.

The McKenna Duties.

The Budget is due for presentation in the House of Commons to-day, and, although nothing is yet known for certain about its provisions, it is thought that the McKenna duties, concerning which so many angry words have been bandied in the Liberal and Conservative papers, will at least be modified. The report of this has led some manufacturers into the dire expedient of consulting the wishes of their "hands," with the amazing result that all those people who benefit by the imposition of the McKenna duties have declared themselves in favour of their retention, and are, incidentally, very wroth with Mr. Snowden for suggesting their removal.

Why the Chancellor of the Exchequer should want to remove them it is quite impossible to see. It surely cannot be that in these loose days one is so bound to particular dogma that one wants to annul any exception to it, whatever good it may be doing. Mr. Snowden will certainly earn disfavour (not that he is not used to that) from many others than Protectionists if he wantonly or deliberately, or even academically, throws thousands of British people out of employment.

Ireland.

A few years ago one could not pick up a paper without reading about the difficulties of the Irish, so much in the limelight was this western island. Now, however, it is but periodically pulled on to the stage from the wings into which it was, with a sigh of relief, shoved by British statesmen. Its last production concerns the frontier between Ulster and the rest. Yet this particular appearance before the footlights is going to cause much trouble to Britain.

Under the Treaty Britain is bound to set up a Boundary Commission, and it looks as if she, after all, will have to settle Ireland's main problem. Seeing that she is liable, however the decision may go, to be accused of taking sides, it is being suggested, with a good deal of apparent wisdom, that an outside chairman should be appointed.

Liberal Conservatism.

Yet another attempt has been made, with the publication of a letter written upon the present position of Liberalism by Captain Guest, to raise the star-spangled banner of anti-Socialism and to promote the union of Liberals and Conservatives against the Socialist or Labour Party. Some of those Liberals who are chilled by the prospect of indefinitely supporting Labour are now dangling out bait to the Conservative fishes, but there is little sign that the latter will leave their placid stream to bite.

Meanwhile, the Liberals must sit cheerless and with empty baskets on the political banks, watching with impotent gaze the eddies and swirls once loved by but now meaningless to them.

TO READERS OF "THE NEAR EAST."

If you find any merit in "The Near East," if you hold with us that British interests in the Near and Middle East call for a Paper devoted exclusively to the affairs of that part of the world; if you consider it a worthy cause that Britain and the British should be sanely interpreted to the people of the East, and those people in their turn be made better known to Britons, support "The Near East" by becoming a subscriber yourself if you are not already, and by securing for us new subscribers. Specimen copies will be forwarded gratis. A subscription form will be found on page 468 of this issue.

Scottish Home Rule.

It seems that there still exist Scotsmen in Glasgow, and that the naughty tales to the effect that it is now dominated by Irishmen are, therefore, false. For a few days ago a great band of Scots (of people, that is, whose pronunciation of English is superior to that of the English, and whose preference is, nevertheless, exulting in that superiority to indulgence in their own tongue) assembled in St. Andrew's Hall to demand Home Rule for Scotland. That they treat this demand with a certain amount of seriousness is proved by the fact that they are claiming support for the second reading of a Bill in the House on May 7, designed by Mr. Buchanan to set this progressive folk free from the bonds of reaction.

And they are fairly totus porcus about it all. The only things these impulsive Caledonians propose to leave to the British Parliament are the right to levy Customs and Excise, the management of the Post Office, and the control of the Army and Navy.

Of course, it is mostly froth. Scotsmen in general are too appreciative of what the Union has done for them for the desire for Home Rule (perfectly defensible in theory) ever to become widespread.

Earthquakes in Britain.

The superstitious are making ominous comments upon the frequency with which earthquakes are reported to have occurred in the Midlands. They generally twist some obscure text in Scripture to make it apply to some remote village in Herefordshire or Nottinghamshire, which latter country this month seems to have suffered strange, if not alarming experiences. Now the Midlands grow many things, and not least of all their lies, such as the assertion that Herefordshire cider is the best, or that Notts is the finest cricketing county, and it is perhaps not ungenerous when we read of their earthquakes more to admire their credibility and powers of description than to perceive any genuine desire for scientific investigation for distant rumblings. Of course, Britain does suffer earthquakes, from Scotland to the South, but it never indulges in that curiously useful habit of more passionate countries, the swallowing up of undesirable portions.

Alter Ego.

GREEK EASTER.

According to the Greek Calendar, last Sunday was Easter Sunday. A service was held in London at the Greek Cathedral in Moscow Road, Bayswater. Germanos, the Metropolitan of Thyateira, Patriarchal Exarch of Western and Central Europe, officiated, being assisted by the Great Archimandrite, the Rev. Dr. Pagonis, and the Archimandrite, the Rev. Agathandalos Moscovakis. Among those present were the Greek Minister, the personnel of the Legation, and the Consul-General, in uniforms with decorations, the Minister of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, the personnel of the Roumanian Legation, Sir Lucas Ralli, Sir John and Lady Stavridi, and M. Mango, with the leading members of the Greek colony.

ANZAC DAY.

On Anzac Day, April 25, many tributes were paid of respect to the memory of Australian and New Zealand dead. Pilgrimage to the Cenotaph, starting at an early hour, was constant, and the base of the memorial was covered with wreaths and flowers. At noon a service of commemoration was held at the church of St. Clement Danes.

Cairo, April 13.

The Railways' New Chief.

There is cause for amusement as well as satisfaction in the events which during the past week have led up to the retirement of Mahmoud Samy Pasha, Under-Secretary of State in the Ministry of Communications, and the appointment as General Manager of the Egyptian State Railways of Abdel Hamid Pasha Soliman, formerly Minister of Public Works and, more recently, Director of the Egyptian School of Engineering. As has been pointed out again and again in this correspondence, Samy Pasha has for the last two years been the crux of the whole problem of Communications. Railways, telegraphs and telephones, he has contrived to bedevil them all. But especially have his energies been concentrated on the railways, and with such effect that two British general managers have resigned within four months of each other, and it has become absolutely impossible to find another Englishman to take on the work. For that matter, it might have been quite impossible to find any responsible Egyptian either, if he knew that Samy Pasha was to remain at the Ministry of Communications, for Samy Pasha is no more beloved of his fellow-countrymen than by foreigners. It was, therefore, a brilliant inspiration which led the Government to offer the general managership to Samy Pasha himself. This proved a somewhat embarrassing mark of confidence, for Samy Pasha did not at all relish the prospect of taking over the railways and having put in his place at the Ministry of Communications another Under-Secretary of State, who might prove as big a thorn in the flesh of the general manager as Samy Pasha himself had been to two recent railway chiefs. He refused the appointment unless he could combine with it that which he actually held, the Under-Secretaryship of State. This combination the Government declined to allow him, and, as Samy Pasha remained uncompromising, he was without more ado placed on pension, and Abdel Hamid Soliman Pasha appointed to the railways. The Under-Secretaryship of State has not yet been filled.

The New General Manager.

It would scarcely be worth while to devote so much space to this affair of the railways were it not that, for weeks past, the goings-on in the Ministry of Communications have been one of the chief topics of conversation in political circles, and an importance out of all proportion to the immediate consequences of the affair has been attached to the resignations in rapid succession of Brigadier-General Blakeney and Mr. Verschoyle. Everybody, whether Egyptian or foreigner, realised that the abrupt departure of two general managers in so short a time, and in circumstances so similar, betokened a state of things in the railway administration which boded no good for the country's communications. It was, in fact, a struggle between two opposing schools of thought. Were the railways to be run with efficiency as the object in view, or were they to be a pawn in the political game? In the first two rounds it was obviously the former conception which was winning. So much greater, therefore, is the general satisfaction that the third and deciding bout has reversed the verdict, which earlier seemed to be the inevitable end of the struggle. In appointing Abdel Hamid Soliman Pasha the Government has made as good a choice as was possible. The new general manager has been more distinguished as an administrator than as an engineer, it is true, but that will be no handicap in the railways, where he has around him a very capable technical staff. His outstanding merit, as proved in the Ministry of Public Works, is his frankness and his capacity for hard work. Under him, it is safe to say, politics and xenophobia will not be allowed to interfere with good administration. Egyptians and foreigners alike are agreed that the Government has made a good choice. It is to be hoped that the railways will now no longer be a source of coffee-house controversy, for when an administration becomes the subject of continual discussion there is little doubt that all is not well.

The Labour Movement.

Egyptian Labour's discontent with present conditions attracts very little public attention, now that the Alexandria epidemic of factory-seizing seems to have died out, but the continuance of strikes in that city, as well as minor indications of unsettlement in Cairo and elsewhere, is proof of the possibility of further trouble. Labour here is not organised, and lacks a leader. When it has produced a man who can lead his fellow-workmen and can instil into them the principles of union and discipline there will be big developments. At the present time the various workmen's syndicates and unions are so incapable of organising that they put themselves into the hands of so-called "legal advisers," beggarly lawyers for the most part, who, incapable of earning a living at their profession, turn to the more profitable occupation of exploiting the ignorance of working men. Besides, there is no clear conception of what are the real interests of Labour, as understood by the trade unions in Great Britain. The men's demands are hopelessly vague and mixed up with politics, and, in consequence, are for the most part disregarded. No political party has yet thought it worth while to make a serious bid for the working-man's support. Complete independence for Egypt and the Sudan is still a slogan with a greater appeal to the worker than the promise of an eight-hour day and old age pensions. That, of course, will change, but at present there is little sign of the change coming quickly. The danger is that, drifting aimlessly as it is at present, not knowing clearly what it wants, nor having the vaguest idea of how to set about realising its hazy aims, Egyptian Labour may become the prey of agitators more capable, and at the same time more dangerous and unscrupulous, than those who have so far made themselves prominent. It will be interesting to see what comes of a new movement now going on among the Cairo syndicates, which are endeavouring to coalesce into a united body, for the presidency of which there are two candidates—Dr. Mahgoub Sabet, a defeated Zaghloulist candidate at the elections for the Chamber of Deputies, and Abdel Rahman Bey Fahmy, recently released from prison, where he was serving a life sentence for his part in the Vengeance Society affair of 1920.

YUGOSLAVIA.

Liubliana, April 16.

The Consolidation of Yugoslavia.

Yugoslavia seems at last to be attaining a measure of internal political consolidation, and the chief event to be chronicled in this respect is the appearance of the Raditch deputies in the Skupshtina. By this step M. Raditch has broken with his passive policy and demonstrated his partnership in the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes. The significance of this demonstration was enhanced by the correct line taken up by the Raditch deputies in the Skupshtina. They conformed to all the rules of Parliamentary procedure, and even declared themselves willing to permit members of their group to accept office as Ministers of the Crown. That M. Raditch's party—seventy deputies strong—should relinquish its methods of passive resistance, exchanging them for an active policy, cannot fail to modify the policy followed hitherto by Yugoslavia as a whole. The change is already apparent, or, rather, the struggle for it is being waged at this moment. Quite inevitably the entry of the Raditch deputies led to conflict, because the arrival of seventy new members upset the "balance of power" in the Skupshtina. The homogeneous Radical Party no longer represented a majority; the national minorities—the Germans and Turks—who always side with the strongest, veered round to the Opposition bloc, and so the Radicals even lost their allies, who, though frequently irksome, were nevertheless not to be despised as supporters.

The Radical Government seemed irretrievably lost. But the tactics of the Opposition bloc were not sufficiently well considered, and so M. Pashitch scored a victory. According to the rules of Parliamentary procedure, deputies do not enjoy the full right to vote until their mandates have been verified. But as the Raditch deputies submitted their election credentials in instalments, only the first batch of their mandates—twenty in number—was duly verified. This was not enough to defeat the Government, and M. Pashitch was still the strongest in the Skupshtina. Then the Opposition demanded that all mandates of the Raditch Party should be verified without delay, and that the Skupshtina should not proceed to vote upon the State Budget until after their verification. But M. Pashitch forestalled the Opposition, and resigned at a moment particularly convenient to himself.

The State Budget had to be dealt with by April 1. But April 1 was only a few days off, and the Opposition not in a state to guarantee the acceptance of the Budget. So the Radicals enjoyed a walk-over. Moreover, M. Pashitch was in the fortunate position of being able to dispose of a majority at the critical moment, whereas the Opposition bloc could only say that it would presently command a majority. Finally, M. Pashitch's position was further improved by his being joined by M. Sv. Pribitchevitch and fourteen deputies who seceded from the Democrat Club, thus balancing the loss of the Turks and Germans.

In these circumstances it was quite natural that the King should entrust M. Pashitch yet once again with the formation of a Cabinet, and that the Pashitch-Pribitchevitch Government should be duly installed. And after a long and stormy sitting, and the demonstrative exodus of the collective Opposition from the Skupshtina, the first regular, genuine, and not fictitious Budget of Yugoslavia was passed.

But with that the Radical Government had played its trump card. It had been possible to delay the verification of the Raditch mandates till after the passing of the Budget, but further procrastination was out of the question. So the prestige of the Opposition bloc increased, while the actual minority of the Government became more and more apparent. The position became simply untenable. There was nothing left for the Pashitch-Pribitchevitch Government but to resign. Who was to succeed?

merely to carry on over a General Election, and that the formation of this Government should be entrusted to them. They argue as follows: At the General Election of March 18, 1923, the majority of the electorate throughout the country pronounced against any revision of the Constitution—159 of the deputies elected stood strictly for the Constitution. But by going over to the Opposition bloc M. Liuba Davidovitch has ranged himself against his own electors, and rendered an appeal to the country inevitable. Meantime, the formation of an election Government can be entrusted only to a group which stands for the Constitution—and for the moment that is the Pashitch-Pribitchevitch group.

Against this, M. Davidovitch argues that the question of the revision of the Constitution is not by any means yet on the order of the day, and that therefore the reasoning of the Pashitch-Pribitchevitch group is wide of the mark. According to him, the only matters that come into consideration just now are a solution of the Serbo-Croat question and improvement in the administration. Therefore the mandates of the Raditch deputies ought to be verified at once, whereby it would become inevitable that the formation of a Government would fall to the present Opposition bloc, which would then command a majority in the Skupshtina.

A third point of view is taken—if one may venture to say so—by the Crown. Parliament has work to get through, and ought at least to deal with the Invalid (Disabled Soldiers) Law. In other words, collaboration is to bridge the differences of political opinion, and a strong Coalition Government ought to be formed which would preserve the unity of the State and render possible a solution of all more urgent questions.

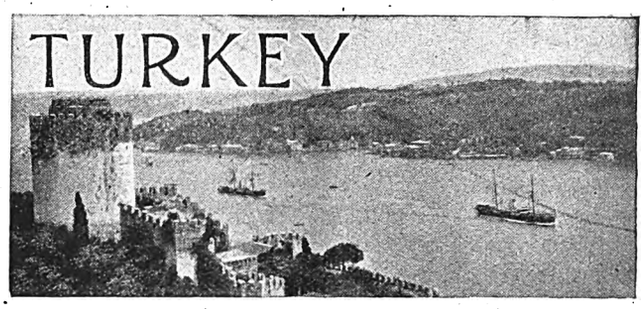
A Coalition Government.

This point of view is the most widely held of all among the impartially minded. A fresh General Election is not, generally speaking, expected to provide a liquidation of Yugoslavia's internal problems. It would only intensify differences and delay positive work. In any case, M. Pashitch's victory in Serbia would be as much a foregone conclusion as M. Raditch's in Croatia. The result could probably be summed up in the words "As you were," or something not far off it.

Yet the constitution of a strong Coalition Government is fraught with great difficulty.

Last year's electoral demagogy is now revenging itself on the Opposition parties. They have so long and consistently abused the Government, they have promised the electors such wonderful castles in the air, that now their leaders are nervous of the result if they were to come into the Government themselves. On the other hand, the Radicals felt so well at ease in the days of the all-Radical Government that they would prefer to remain sole masters. Add to this the difficulties constantly raised by M. Raditch. At the very moment when it is most important that he should maintain a loyal attitude an interview with him appears, in which he compromises himself, and co-operation with him becomes more impossible than ever.

These circumstances are so many obstacles to the formation of a strong Coalition Government. Still, all signs point to it that a Coalition Government will yet be realised. The desire for peace is strong in the great rank and file of the parties, and that is why, by common consent of all parties, the solution of the crisis is allowed to drag on indefinitely. Wounds need time to heal. Time must mature old sympathies and foster new. And therefore a solution of the Government crisis during April is not expected. It is more probable to come about in May.



Constantinople, April 22.

The Parliamentary Recess.

The National Assembly is expected to rise to-day (the eve of the National Fête Day in celebration of its inauguration), and will remain in recess until the middle of October. The length of the recess meets with some criticism on the part of sections of the Turkish Press; indeed, the closing days of the session have provided certain newspapers with much copy in reviewing and criticising the sins of omission and commission of the Government since the recent elections. The Mustekil, which is a fair example, draws a comparison between the times when Mustapha Kemal held the reins in the Assembly, and the subsequent period when his responsibilities as President of the Republic enforced him to leave the driving power in Parliament to other hands. For what there may be in it, this comparison, coming from a Turkish writer, is not without interest. "When the healthy revolutionary mind of the Ghazi controlled the affairs of the Assembly, great things," he says, "were done. The Lausanne Peace was ratified, the Ismet Cabinet came into being, the Khalifate was suppressed, the objectionable religious tribunals and the Evkaf Administration were abolished. But since then, what legislation of use to the people has the Assembly passed?" He then refers to what he terms three famous decisions by which the Second National Assembly will be remembered. First, the increasing of the Deputies' salaries by £T100 a month; secondly, having been elected by the nation for two years, they voted an extension of the term of their office to four years (to which the writer adds somewhat sarcastically: "What could we have said if they had made it eight years?"), and, thirdly, having solved the two great problems of their salaries and their term of office, they find themselves so worn out as to merit a six months' holiday!

Closing of French Schools.

Regardless of Notes to Angora, and the grumblings of the French Press, the Government have adhered to their decision in the matter of the recent closure of the local French religious schools, and their action is naturally causing considerable heart-burnings in local French circles. The stipulation which the Government made that all crucifixes inside and outside these schools should be removed was not complied with by the school authorities, and, consequently, the schools were closed and have remained closed. Some eight to ten thousand children are said to be affected, of which number 2,500 are of the Moslem religion. It is felt in some quarters that the Note which the French Government recently issued on the subject, and which has proved unavailing, was prompted with a view to ensure the support of the Catholic Party at the coming French elections. This may not be the case; yet it came as a surprise to many that the French Government should officially associate itself, in these days, with what must be considered a purely religious dispute. The highly efficient English educational institutions—the English High School for Girls, the English High Schools for Boys, and the British School, as well as the well-known American institutions—Robert College for Boys, the Arnoutkeny College for Girls, and the Y.M.C.A., are, of course, not affected by this regulation.

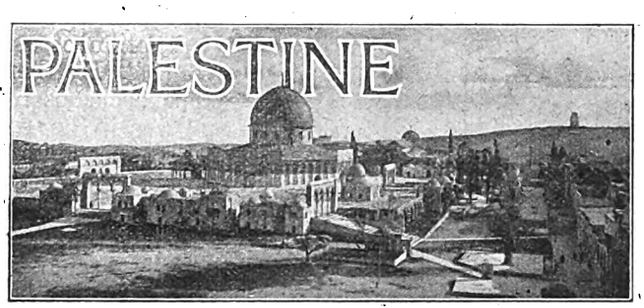
General News.

The long-deferred visit of Mustapha Kemal Pasha to Constantinople is announced unofficially to take place early in May, and preparations are being made for an imposing ceremonial entry. It is said that the President will arrive by sea on board the Turkish cruiser Hamidié, accompanied by the torpedo boat Reyki Shevket.

The old bridge across the Golden Horn, known as Oun-Capan, which has been out of use for many months past, and recently repaired, was formally reopened for traffic yesterday by the Acting Prefect of the town, Haidar Bey. The toll levied on this bridge, as well as that of the Galata Bridge, is earmarked for the service of the Constantinople Municipal Loan, 1909. It is not known yet whether the Municipality intend so to apply it.

Admiral Bristol, the Representative of the United States, has been on a visit to Angora and other parts of Anatolia, and is now returning to Constantinople via Mersina, in the Adana district, on the steam-yacht Scorpion.

The competition for the golf championship of Turkey was held in brilliant weather on the Mashlak course yesterday, and was won by Mr. D. R. Jordan, of the British Consulate. The British Representative, the Hon. R. C. Lindsay, presented the Sir Adam Block Championship Cup at the end of the play.



Jerusalem, April 16.

Criminal Outbreaks.

Except for the spasm of crime which broke out three weeks ago there have been no untoward happenings of late. The murders in and near Tel-Aviv have not yet been adequately accounted for. The Jews were, at the time, holding high carnival and celebrating the Feast of Purim—with open-air dancing, masks and fancy dress. Toy pistols were also in evidence. It is said that many hundreds of Arabs were taking part and fraternising and enjoying whatever amusements were going. But some of the pistols were not toys: two Jews were fatally wounded and two or three Arabs shortly afterwards were shot. There was nothing remotely resembling "racial riots" such as were reported in certain English papers, and no disturbance whatever apart from the few isolated cases of, as it would seem, indiscriminate shooting. The Jaffa Jewish paper finds the motive in the black hearts of a few morose Arabs, who could not bear the spectacle of Arabs and Jews fraternising so lightheartedly; while the "Arab Executive" have seized on the fact that Arabs suffered a short interval after the Jewish victims—a conclusive proof, to their minds, of the existence of a secret and alert body of armed Jews organised with a view to attacking at a moment's notice their harmless, peace-loving Arab fellow-citizens, and taking the law into their own hands.

Near Jerusalem, soon afterwards, was a more commonplace occurrence of robbery with violence—the victims being four Jews and the assailants fellahin from some neighbouring village. The most distressing episode was, however, the murder of a certain Czecho-Slovakian journalist, Mali-Tatransky, who with his wife attempted a walking-tour round the world. They were travelling without guides or companions. They had pitched their camp one night between Nablus and Jenin, and the baggage-cattle, a camel and a donkey, proved too tempting a bait for certain brigands, who on resistance being offered, promptly shot both travellers, killing the man outright and seriously wounding the woman. No help was forthcoming till daybreak. The woman is now in hospital at Nablus, and may not recover.

Mr. E. T. Richmond's Departure.

Mr. E. T. Richmond (who, according to the Arab Press, has been granted the title "Pasha" by King Hussein) cannot complain of lack of interest on the part of Palestine at his departure. Never has any Palestinian official received such vituperation from the Jews. They blame him for all their misfortunes during the past four years, and charge him with being the hidden hand which has pulled the strings of Arab active and passive opposition to British administrative plans, with having dictated or advised Arab policy, and generally thwarted the intentions of the Government which employed him. The Arabs, on their part, were just as outspoken in their thanks to him for his efforts on their behalf, and arranged for him farewell banquets up and down the country. According to the Arab Press he made no scruple on these occasions of declaring his unsympathy with British policy. The Saut el-Arab of last week reports him as stating at the Arab Club at Nablus: "The condition in Palestine is not satisfactory. The Arabs have shown great patience, and I request you to remain patient a little longer; for the day is very near when England will perceive the mistake she has made in Palestine. Wait, therefore, for such a political state of things, as the present is bound to be changed. I promise you that I shall never forget the Palestine problem nor the noble, intelligent Arab people of Palestine. I shall devote my life to the defence of the Arab cause in general and the Palestine cause in particular. I shall publish articles in the Press, I shall make speeches in the clubs and public gatherings, and I shall proclaim before the entire public world that there is in Palestine an Arab race deprived of its rights."

A New Currency for Palestine?

It is becoming probable that at long last Palestine may be given a currency of its own. Since the British Occupation Egyptian money only has been legal tender, and we still use the stamps issued for the Egyptian Expeditionary Force. On the whole the result has been good and advantageous for trade. Prices have remained high and the valuta has never varied—a fact of which the importance has been brought home to the Palestinian owing to the recent insecurity of the currency of his neighbours in Syria, where the Syrian piastre fell in sympathy with the franc. It is the small purchaser in Palestine who has suffered most with the change from Turkish to Egyptian currency; whereas previously small trade thought in terms of the Metallik (a halfpenny) and Beshlik (fivepence), it now thinks in terms of piastres (two-pence halfpenny) and shillings, with the result that the smaller necessities of life increased anything from two-fold to five-fold in price. The Palestine Government now announces the formation of a Committee, under the chairmanship of Mr. S. S. Davis, Treasurer of the Government, to include representatives of the chief banking institutions in Palestine and others, to "consider and report upon the advisability of the introduction of a Palestine currency, the currency system to be adopted, the design and denomination of coins and notes, and the steps to be taken to redeem the present currency, and to prevent any undue circulation of foreign currency in Palestine." There are confident hopes that the near future will see the desired change, and with it, of course, the introduction of special Palestinian stamps. Four months ago the Postal Department organised a competition for the best photographic views in Palestine suitable for stamp designs.

The Arab paper Mirât esh-Sharq thus comments on the new project: "The sole topic of conversation is the new currency system which the Government shortly hopes to introduce. Many see in it a Jewish scheme aiming at complete economic control of the country, while others see in it an English device with which to threaten the people of Palestine if the latter should, one of these days, desire to rise up against the Government. However this may be, it is a subject which entirely appertains to experts in economics, whose opinion we soon expect to learn. Yet this does not prevent us from expressing our view of the question —which is that the Palestinians will have no confidence in any currency which is not based on the English pound. No confidence will be forthcoming if the Government were minded to rob the Palestinians of the advantage which has remained to them by the use of this fixed currency, whose sweet flavour the Palestinians have tasted since the Occupation; and we doubt whether the Government proposes to make such a change. We have the Syrians before our eyes, who suffer most seriously owing to the incessant changes in the value of their currency: we do not wish to find ourselves in the like dismal plight."

PERSIA.

Teheran, April 2.

The Political Situation.

It is invariably the unexpected that happens in Persia! Just when everyone had made up their minds that a Republic was inevitable, and that its proclamation was, in fact, only a matter of days, the whole situation underwent one of those sudden changes which are so common in this country, and the idea of having a Republic seems to have been definitely abandoned, for the time being, at least. The Press had certainly prepared the ground well in the capital, and Republican agitators in the provinces had carried the work on so successfully that there seemed to be no opposition, save in Tabriz, where they made the great mistake of attempting to close the bazaars, and thus aroused the antagonism of the merchants, still the most important body of opinion in the large cities. This mistake was repeated in Teheran, and was undoubtedly one of the causes of the collapse of the movement. The Conservatives and notables had also appeared to have fallen into line with the Republicans, and at a meeting at Moshar ul Mulk's house, attended by practically all the former Premiers and Cabinet Ministers, including Princes of the Blood and other notables, a resolution was passed and communicated to the Prime Minister to the effect that they considered it in the best interests of the country to support the Republican movement, and that they would accordingly do so. Those chiefs of the powerful Bakhtiari tribe resident in Teheran had also written a letter to Sardar Sepah to the same effect, and offered any assistance in their tribe's power to bring about the desired result. Telegrams continued to pour in from the provinces clamouring for the early declaration of the Republic, and everything seemed to be working swiftly and smoothly towards the desired change in the government. In fact, things were moving too quickly, and the Persian is at heart thoroughly conservative, as subsequent events proved. On Wednesday, March 19, a large demonstration was held outside the Darvaze Dowlat Gate, to the north of the town, and cars and carriages draped in red and bearing red flags paraded the streets in the morning to advertise the fact. The meeting, however, was but poorly attended, and, in spite of violent speeches attacking the Shah and the Kajar dynasty and demanding a Republic, the crowd appeared rather apathetic on the whole, and the demonstration fell flat. A resolution was passed stating that the representatives of the various guilds and trades unions present were all in favour of a change in the régime of the country to a Republic, and they called on the Parliament to effect this.

Meanwhile in the Mejliss, Tadayyon, the leader of the Reform Party, tried to rush through the passing of the credentials of a score of deputies which remained to be examined, but Modarres, leader of the Opposition party, opposed every one of them in turn, thus necessitating further discussion, and very effectively putting a spoke in the wheel of the party in favour of the Republic, which thereby lost its majority, and the opportunity which it meant to seize to bring about the desired change before Norooz was lost. That afternoon slight disturbances took place in the bazaars which the demonstrators had attempted to close, and this was naturally resented by the merchants; but they were eventually closed to prevent further disorders. The next day they were likewise closed, and this, as I have mentioned above, roused the bitter antagonism of all the merchants, who did not particularly care what form of government they had so long as they were allowed to carry on their trade peaceably and profitably, and this forcible interfering with their business, particularly on these two days preceding Norooz, when, above all others, they expected to reap a rich harvest, caused a great revulsion of feeling against the Republican movement, which paid dearly for this ill-advised step. The next day was the Persian New Year, the great festival of the year, and it was remarkable for the fact that the Salaam which the Shah, or Regent in his place, has for many generations past been accustomed to hold to receive the congratulations of his subjects and the representatives of foreign Powers, was not held by the Crown Prince, but instead of the Salaam a reception was held by the latter, as well as at the Ministry for Foreign Affairs for the Corps Diplomatique, who proceeded later to the Prime Minister's residence to offer their congratulations. The next evening (Saturday) had been fixed for the momentous session of the Mejliss to discuss and decide on the future form of government, but in the afternoon large crowds assembled outside the Parliament building and forced their way into the gardens, where violent speeches were delivered by the priests leading the crowds, denouncing the Republic and urging the Mejliss to reject the proposed change. The Prime Minister, hearing of this and fearing disturbances, despatched troops to the scene, and himself repaired to the Parliament a little later. His arrival was the signal for a hostile demonstration, and stones were thrown, some of which are supposed to have hit Sardar Sepah, whose shoulder was also grazed by a stick as his carriage drove past. He thereupon ordered the military to disperse the crowd, which they proceeded to do in none too gentle a manner, using their fixed bayonets and the butts of their rifles, in consequence of which many persons were injured and had to be removed to hospital. The President of the Mejliss, Motamen ul Mulk, remonstrated strongly with Sardar Sepah for his action, and, in view of the general confusion, the meeting which was to have decided the issue was not held, but postponed for a few days, though everybody felt that the movement had received its death-blow.

A few days later the Prime Minister went to Kum to pay a farewell visit to the ulema from Irak, prior to their return to Mesopotamia, which had been arranged, and seized the opportunity to discuss the political situation fully with them and to ascertain their views. These were naturally averse from a Republican form of government, the priests fearing that they would ultimately undergo the same treatment as had been meted out to their confrères at the hands of the new Turkish Republic. The Prime Minister's visit was followed, two days after his return, by the publication of a proclamation by him, which seems to have finally dashed the Republican Party's hopes to the ground. Sardar Sepah, addressing his compatriots, begins by saying that he had not attempted to check the present agitation sooner, as no Government has the right to oppose public feeling, but as the movement was threatening to create disturbances and disorders, which it has always been his special aim to prevent, he thought the time had come to intervene, and with this object in view, and considering the respect he has always entertained for the feelings of the religious authorities, he took advantage of his visit to the ulema at Kum to find out their opinion on the subject, and, as a consequence of his consultation with them, he had decided that a Republican form of government was not suitable for Persia. He therefore calls on the people to refrain from all further discussion on the subject and let the matter drop, as continued agitation may lead to disorders in the country, which he is determined to prevent, and to assist him instead to safeguard the independence and integrity of the country.

The End of the Republican Movement.

Thus ends for the moment a movement started just over a month ago by the Teheran Press, which appeared to be carrying the country with it and to be assured of success. Whether the question of a change in the régime will be resuscitated in future years is an open question, but one knows Sardar Sepah well enough to be sure that, if he wishes the matter to be dropped, he will certainly succeed in having it dropped. Although the attempted Republic is dead, there yet remains the question of the future rulership of the country, which still appears to demand the Shah's abdication and the downfall of the Kajar dynasty, and it is significant to note that no notice was taken of the Shah's birthday to-day. This has always been a public holiday, the Government and other buildings have always been illuminated and decorated the night before, and a public Salaam held by the Sovereign or Regent in the Palace grounds, the Shah receiving the congratulations of all and sundry and listening from the Marble Throne to an address by the Court Poet. This year all this was conspicuous by its absence. The Mejliss was to have met last Wednesday to decide the future form of government, but this was postponed until after the Norooz holidays, which ended yesterday. The general idea seems to be that one of the Shah's young brothers, sons of the ex-Shah, Mohamed Ali Mirza, born abroad since the latter's abdication in 1909, will be placed on the throne under a Regent, as the Princes mentioned as likely candidates are minors—in fact, mere children. Should this be decided on by the Mejliss, who will probably insist on the decision's being made the subject of a referendum, the Prime Minister is, of course, mentioned in connection with the regency, though Mustaufi el Mumalik and Mushir ed Dowleh, both former Premiers and popular with the people, are also mentioned. So Persia is at the moment in the strange position of not knowing what is exactly the form of government of the country, or of having a recognised ruler, both the Shah and the Crown Prince acting as Regent, being discredited!

The Departure of the Ulema.

As mentioned above, the negotiations entered into between the Persian and Irak Governments for the return of the ulema, who left Mesopotamia last year as a protest against the deportation of the Persian Shiah priest Khalisi, have been satisfactorily concluded, and the priests have left Kum, where they have been staying for the past few months. Khalisi himself is at Meshed, and it is said that he will not be permitted to return. It will be remembered that the arrival of the ulema in Persia furnished a reason for a violent outburst of anti-British feeling last summer, and it is a matter of satisfaction that the question of their return to the shrines at Nejef and Kerbela has been settled.

The delegates express the hope that the negotiations will begin on May 1, or as soon as possible after.

THE IDRISI EMIR.

It is reported by the Aden correspondent of The Times that the Emir Seyyid Ali el Idrisi, who succeeded his late father, the Emir Seyyid Mohamed ibn Ali el Idrisi, on March 21, 1923, as Emir of Asir, has been deposed on account of his youth and inexperience and consequent mismanagement of public affairs. The dethronement is said to have been effected by the Emir's kinsman, the Seyyid Mustapha, in favour of the brother of the late Emir Ali, who now reigns peacefully as the Emir Seyyid Hasan ibn Ali el Idrisi.

BRITAIN AND IRAK.

The Constituent Assembly of Irak is now in session, and one of its first tasks will be the ratification of the Anglo-Irak Treaty, with its five supplementary agreements. These latter cover in detail a number of subjects which could not have been fully dealt with in the Treaty without making it unwieldy. They define the juridical position of foreigners, the obligations of an international character which Irak takes over from Great Britain, the financial liabilities of the country, the conditions of service under which British officers and officials will be employed in Irak, and military arrangements. As in the case of the main Treaty, all these supplementary agreements have been the subject of prolonged discussion between the British and Irak Governments; they have not been in any sense of the word imposed upon the Irakis, but in their final form they represent the terms on which Great Britain is prepared to accord her support to Irak in the early stages of her acquisition of the status of a separate nation. The circumstances of the Treaty prevent a detailed discussion of its provisions clause by clause, and the Assembly has to be asked to accept the Treaty and the agreements as they stand. Not unnaturally this fact is being made use of by some ardent politicians to work up opposition against the Treaty. The elaborate details into which the supplementary agreements enter offer easy scope for criticism; but it is not clear that those who are opposing ratification are prepared to face the logical consequences of rejection. In spite of the murderous attack on two prominent supporters of the Treaty, we shall refuse to believe—until the event proves us wrong—that the Irakis can be so blind to their own interests as to miss the opportunity now presented them of making a success of the constitutional régime. Rejection of the Treaty would almost inevitably lead to one of two results—the Assembly would be dissolved and the system of constitutional government modified or abrogated, or Great Britain would withdraw and Irak would fall a prey to internal disorder, with the certain prospect of the re-establishment of Turkish sovereignty over the country.

Both King Faisal and the Government of Jaafar Pasha can be relied upon to work hard for the ratification of the Treaty. For the former it is the touchstone of his own position. In the exceptional circumstances of the case the details of the Treaty had to be accepted by King Faisal before the constitution could be brought into being and the Assembly formed to endorse the arrangement made on its behalf with Great Britain. Rejection of the Treaty, therefore, would be equivalent to a vote of no confidence in the King, who would have either to accept his own dismissal at the hands of the Assembly or to introduce a form of government less liable to produce deadlocks between the Throne and the people. The risk of an immediate British evacuation would also have to be faced. It is known that the Irak question is engaging the attention of the British Government, which, however loyal it might wish to be to engagements undertaken by its predecessors, could hardly remain indifferent to a deliberate and formal intimation of the people of Irak that British help in the upbuilding of the country is not desired. An immediate effect of a hostile vote in the Irak Assembly would be to stultify the approaching negotiations between Great Britain and Turkey in regard to Mosul. The British contention is that Mosul not only is non-Turkish in character, but also is essential to the existence and development of Irak, for which Great Britain has accepted responsibility. If at that same moment Irak is formally dissociating itself from British solicitude on its behalf, there will be no need to worry about the fate of Mosul, still less to make of it a bone of contention between Britain and Turkey.

When the time comes for a dispassionate survey of Anglo-Irak relations we believe that they will be found to constitute one of the most disinterested efforts of British enterprise. For Great Britain's presence in the country no explanation is required; the exigencies of the War are an adequate justification. At no stage since the Armistice have the British serious cause to blame themselves in connection with Irak. The very mistakes of the first period testify to the fact that British policy set little store on the possession of Irak. Bereft of guidance and definite instructions from the Home Government, the British authorities on the spot proceeded to discharge the duties that they had inherited from the War with all the thoroughness that was to be expected of the Army and the Indian Civil Service. When the rebellion of 1920 precluded any further neglect of the Irak problem, the British Government showed conclusively that its main concern was to keep faith with the Arabs. If their independence was to be made good, Britain would have to remain in Irak until such time as an Arab administration could hold its own. The attempts then made to induce Great Britain to prove false to her trust by emphasising the alleged hostility of the Arabs or the heavy cost of the undertaking failed. To-day the work of speeding-up the capacity of Irak to look after itself has been pushed to the furthest limit, and British commitments are restricted virtually to the next four years—a period all too short, perhaps, in the interests of the Arabs themselves, but long enough to show British disinterestedness. If at this particular moment there were to be any unmistakable challenge from the Irakis themselves, it might be difficult for Great Britain to resist the temptation to throw up a thankless task. We do not anticipate, however, despite gloomy prognostications, that the Anglo-Irak Treaty will be the agent of such an abrupt termination of British service. There may be no special motive for bringing our task in Irak to its appointed goal other than the fulfilment of British pledges to the Arabs; but in this instance the maintenance of close relations between Irak and Britain, while it will certainly benefit the former, can hardly fail to react on British interests in the Middle East. It will be little recommendation to have set up a State that is not strong enough to stand alone or too inadequately equipped to win through to prosperity. The Irak experiment must always remain identified with Great Britain, and, for this reason, if for no other, it is to British interests to see that the country, despite the ignorance or the intrigues of some of its own people, is given a fair chance. Irak will remain Arab, and its success as an Arab State does not necessarily presuppose the adoption of British methods or British standards.

THE LIQUIDATION OF THE OTTOMAN EMPIRE.*

The appearance of the sixth volume of "A History of the Peace Conference of Paris," edited by Mr. H. W. V. Temperley, and published under the auspices of the British Institute of International Affairs, coincides opportunely with the ratification by the British Parliament of the Treaty of Lausanne. Certainly those students of contemporary history who wish to believe that in international, as in personal, affairs there is a divinity that shapes our ends, rough-hew them how we will, have reason to be grateful to Mr. Temperley and his collaborators for blazing a trail through "the confused, painful, and long-drawn-out drama" to a clearing where at least the sun can penetrate. If Mr. Lloyd George had taken advantage of this volume to refresh his memory in regard to events in which he played such an important part, he could never have delivered the wild speech to which he subjected the second reading of the Lausanne Treaty Bill in the House of Commons. There is no support in these pages for the view that the Treaty of Lausanne is "deplorable" or "a dark page in the history of British diplomacy"; on the other hand, it is shown to be the more or less logical development of the disastrous policy for which Mr. Lloyd George himself was responsible, but at the same time to contain the promise of "a settlement in the wider sense of the term."

The liquidation of the old Ottoman Empire (which began as early as 1699) was entering upon its final phase. This Empire, with its internal "cultural autonomies" and its external economic juridical and even political servitudes to foreign States, had been completely non-Western in it structure. It was now giving place to a mosaic of sovereign, independent, "self-coloured," national States consciously constructed on the Western model. Hitherto, the process had gone no farther than the secession and reorganisation on the non-Turkish populations in the border provinces, leaving the trunk of the Empire maimed and bandaged, but not itself inwardly transformed. But the appearance of a Turkish National consciousness in Anatolia, and the formation of a Turkish National State by the same procrustean methods as had been employed in the creation of Serbia, Greece, Rumania, and Bulgaria, changed the character of the conflict and foreshadowed its termination, by assimilating the conflicting forces to one another. The truceless struggle between the Western and the Middle Eastern tradition, between the new and the old, was now replaced by the less hopeless strife of molecules approximating to one another in structure, which, in the process of nature, might eventually arrive at an organic harmony.

It is only with the first chapter in the volume, dealing with the Turkish Empire, that we are here concerned, and in this article we shall confine our remarks to the sections on the non-Arab territories, leaving for future treatment the question of the emergence of Arab nationalism. The story of the Turkish Treaty (i.e., the Treaty of Sèvres), it is pointed out, is the story of a Treaty which the Supreme Council momentarily forced on a defeated and discredited Government, only to find that the provisions were unworkable because the Great Powers were not prepared to enforce them. Writing in 1922, the authors naturally felt obliged to discuss fully the Treaty of Sèvres; but delay in the publication of the volume enabled an epilogue to be added in August, 1923, and the plea that the permanent historical importance of that Treaty, in view of the enduring influence which it exercised upon international affairs, justifies what might at first sight seem the disproportionate space allotted to the subject will be generally upheld. It is well to have grouped together the various causes that led to a Turkish nationalistic movement in Anatolia, and to be able to follow in a brief compass the sequence of events that connect the Lausanne Treaty of 1923 with the Turkish National Pact drawn up in January, 1920.

In the past Turkey to the rest of the world has always been the Turkey of Yildiz Kiosk and the Sublime Porte. Even after the Armistice it does not seem to have occurred to any of our politicians that the day might come when the articulate section of the Turkish nation might refuse to allow Turkey to remain identified for all time with the old order. True, the first attempt, in 1908, to break with the past did not carry Turkey very far out of the ruts that she had followed for so long; but at least it should have been regarded as an earnest of what might be. During the War there was, of course, no occasion to inquire whether the Turks, as distinct from their methods of government, might be capable of better things. In November, 1914, Mr. Lloyd George had spoken of them as "a human cancer, a creeping agony in the flesh of the lands which they misgovern, rotting every fibre of life," and he added: "I am glad that the Turk is to be called to a final account for his long record of infamy against humanity." This was the frame of mind in which the British Prime Minister approached the question of the Turkish peace, and it prevented him effectually from realising how ill his proposals accorded with actual conditions. On December 18, 1916, President Wilson had been informed that one of the Allied "war aims" was "the setting free of the populations subject to the bloody tyranny of the Turks, and the turning out of Europe of the Ottoman Empire as decidedly foreign to Western civilisation." By January 5, 1918, Mr. Lloyd George had appreciated the necessity of modifying the original attitude towards Turkey, and said, in a speech defining British war-aims: "Nor are we fighting to deprive Turkey of its capital, or of the rich and renowned lands of Asia Minor and Thrace, which are predominantly Turkish in race . . . while we do not challenge the maintenance of the Turkish Empire in the homelands of the Turkish race, with its capital at Constantinople." The reason for the change was the defection of Russia. At the outbreak of the War, Russia saw a possibility of realising her traditional ambitions in Constantinople and the Straits, and at an early date attempted to secure the agreement of Great Britain and France to her contingent annexation of Constantinople. By January, 1915, the consent of the two Allied Powers to Russia's aims had been given.

Faced by an almost irresistible combination of circumstances making for Russian possession of Constantinople, Great Britain and France had safeguarded their own interests as best they could. Great Britain, in consideration for reversing her long-standing policy of opposition to Russian domination of Constantinople and the Straits, had secured an advantageous revision of the zones of influence in Persia. Of special interest, also, are clauses 2 and 3 in the section of the memorandum (setting forth Russia's territorial claims, which was handed by the Russian Minister of Foreign Affairs on March 4, 1915, to the British and French Ambassadors) reciting the claims of Great Britain and France and Turkey as admitted by Russia. Clause 2 foreshadows the subsequent Sykes-Picot agreement of May 16, 1916. Clause 3 bears indirectly but pertinently upon the same agreement by requiring an independent Arabia under a Mohammedan sovereign.

Thus came into existence the first of the secret treaties which the volume before us sets out to exhibit in the setting to which they inseparably belong, for "unless considered in their true historical setting, the secret Treaties and Agreements bear a distorted and entirely misleading aspect, and possess little relationship with reality." An excuse is found for them on the ground that the gigantic struggle for national survival required of the nations involved in it the use of every expedient permissible in diplomacy and war. The second, the Secret Treaty of London (April 26, 1915), laid down the terms on which Italy entered the War on the side of the Entente Powers. On May 16, 1916, was signed the Sykes-Picot Agreement, which represented an attempt on the part of Great Britain and France to effect a compromise "between interests that were in almost direct and unvarying opposition," in view of the British promises to the Arabs. The disclosure of its terms by the Russian Revolutionary Government led to the collateral Agreement of St. Jean de Maurienne between Italy, France, and Great Britain, and "with certain variations the (Sykes-Picot) Agreement became the basis of territorial change and control imposed by the Treaty of Sèvres and the related Tripartite Agreement upon the Ottoman Empire in Asia." The Allies came to grief in Turkey mainly because they did not appreciate the full significance of Russia's defection. While the Treaty of Sèvres was being drawn up to give effect to the secret agreements, the abandonment by Russia of her Eastern claims under those agreements set in motion a train of very different forces.

If Russia had not collapsed, her geographical and strategical position would have enabled her to enforce with ease whatever settlement the victorious Powers might have agreed upon for the northern provinces of Turkey. But her fall had left an immense gap in the iron ring of hostile armies by which Turkey had previously been encircled. The Western members of the Alliance, though able to break the Turkish resistance on the two Southern fronts, to impose a severe armistice, to occupy the Arab provinces effectively, and to control the remainder of the Empire as far as this could be done from the sea, had not a sufficiently long arm to hold the Turkish population down by force in the Anatolian interior. . . . In this situation the Allied statesmen ought to have made peace with Turkey quickly, and to have offered her terms which were scrupulously moderate and equitable, seeing that, in this region, at any rate, the consent of the conquered was indispensable for any genuine settlement.

The Allies, as we know, procrastinated and finally persuaded Greece to attempt to fill the gap left by Russia. But whereas the Turks would have accepted any fate imposed upon them by a victorious Russia, without attempting resistance, and were, indeed, ready to acquiesce in British, French, and Italian military and political control, in spite of the rather slender foundations on which it rested, the landing of the Greeks in Asia Minor produced an entirely different reaction. By May, 1921, the Allies had officially declared their neutrality as between Turks and Greeks, a "confession of impotence utterly incompatible with the assumption of omnipotence that pervades the text of the Treaty of Sèvres." When, in the House of Commons on April 9, Mr. Lloyd George sought to decry the Treaty of Lausanne as not to be compared in merit with his own Treaty of Sèvres, he ignored the fact that he had himself already torn up or substantially modified the latter document. The first revision in favour of the Turks was made at the London Conference in February-March, 1921, when the military clauses were whittled down. A further modification was offered in Paris a year later, when the terms offered in support of an Armistice between Greeks and Turks included the proposal that the whole Smyrna area should revert to Turkey. Eastern Thrace was abandoned in a Note of the Allied Powers to the Kemalists when in September, 1922, the latter were invited to a conference. Thus in the matter of territorial concessions the Conference held at Lausanne in November-December "did not register any serious departure" from what had previously been agreed. On the subject of the Capitulations, also, Mr. Temperley's History is opposed to Mr. Lloyd George's view. The provisions inserted in the Treaty of Sèvres, it holds, erred in the same direction as the Turkish denunciation of 1914. "They took a high line on a matter in which neither party was sufficiently master of the situation to be able to practise high-handedness with any permanent success." Of the acceptance of the abolition of the Capitulations it is stated:—

At Lausanne the Allied Powers did not challenge the abolition of the Capitulations, but concentrated their efforts on securing the maximum amount of juridical guarantees in substitution for them. The practical wisdom of these efforts was questionable, for the efficacy of the Capitulations had lain less in the written word than in the naval and military ability of the Capitulatory Powers to enforce their own interpretation of these traditional privileges. Even if comprehensive paper substitutes for the Capitulations had been successfully imposed upon the Turkish Delegation at Lausanne, it was evident that under post-War conditions there would have been little or no material force forthcoming in order to impose them in Turkey; and their effect might well have been to exasperate Turkish feeling against foreign residents without securing to the latter any compensatory protection. As it turned out, however, Allied nationals in Turkey were preserved from this possible peril by the ill-success of their Governments at Lausanne.

As for the Lausanne Treaty, the History's verdict is as follows:—

". . . The Treaty of Lausanne, with its Annexes, seemed destined, in all human probability, to inaugurate a more lasting settlement, not only than the Treaty of Sèvres, but than the Treaties of Versailles, St. Germain, Trianon, and Neuilly. . . . The preceding treaties were easily and rapidly drafted in comparatively logical form because they were the work of one party only, and were imposed by the victors upon the vanquished without negotiation. In other words, they lacked the essence of diplomatic instruments, which is that they should embody adjustments between two or more programmes and points of view. The merit of the Lausanne Treaty (with all its obvious imperfections) was that it represented an agreement between the principal parties concerned, in which each had to make sacrifices and bear disappointments, but none was subjected to impossible commitments or intolerable humiliations."

On this optimistic note we may leave this section of Volume VI. of a valuable work. Turkey has not yet made good, but she is at least freed from many of the handicaps that weighed heavily upon her before, and if she fails, it will be as the result of her own incapacity.

A STORY OF CALCUTTA.

"GORA." By Rabindranath Tagore. (London: Macmillan. 7s. 6d. net.)

The scene of this novel by Sir Rabindranath Tagore is laid in Calcutta about 1880, during the lifetime of Keshub Chundar Sen, the founder of the Brahmo Samaj. There is little plot or action. Things seem to happen only in order to change the positions of the characters a little, and thus make new opportunities for the discussion and exchange of ideas on religion. One set of characters are orthodox Hindus of the Brahmin caste, the other set are members of the Brahmo Samaj. To a Western mind the book is very long, the discussions very many, the arguments very often repeated. But it is not really too long for its purpose, as the author succeeds by this discursive method both in representing the minds and spirits of his characters and in giving expression to his own view of religion. To anyone who has read this book the people in it will always remain real and known, and this in spite of the fact that it would have been easy for each to have been shown merely as a type of his or her religious point of view. The saintly Paresh Babu has found strength of spirit and absolute peace in the rational teaching of the Brahmo Samaj, but for Haran it is only an excuse for intolerance and bigoted sectarianism. In Krishnadayal, with his religious austerities, and in the unfortunate old woman, Harimohini, we are shown the evils of superstition attendant on orthodox Hinduism and the tyranny of a strict caste system. Whereas the gentle and intelligent girl Suchirita, inspired by the fiery teaching of the young Nationalist Gora, begins to believe that the great hope for her country lies through the strictest form of its own religion, and feels that to desert this is to desert her people.

> There is something . . . which belongs to India as a whole, which . . . will pierce through all littleness and incompleteness and reveal a vast and wonderful being through which the worship of centuries will be made clear.

It will be seen that the motive of the story consists entirely in the interchange and opposition of religious beliefs. Even the complications in the love story of Lolita and Binoy are caused by the fact that she is a daughter of a leader of the Brahmo Samaj, and that he is Gora's most intimate friend and enthusiastic follower. By making Gora discover that he is after all no Brahmin, but the son of Irish parents who were killed in the Mutiny, and by ending the book on a note of spiritual triumph for him, Sir Rabindranath Tagore would seem to show that true religion is above all tyranny of caste and narrowness of sect. "To-day I am really an Indian. In me there is no longer any opposition between Hindu, Mussulman, and Christian." "To-day I have become so pure that I can never be afraid of contamination even in the house of the lowest of castes. This morning, with my heart absolutely bare, I have prostrated myself wholly at the knees of my India." After having been plunged in all this talk of the enthusiastic idealism of youth, of the conflict between the convictions of age, of the busy doings of the worldly wise, as shown through Baroda and Mohim, we ask ourselves what impression remains in the mind. The answer surely is with one of peace. We are left with pictures of Calcutta when "the Ganges and its banks had not been invaded by the ugliness which commercial greed has since brought in its train," and of the two women, Gora's foster mother, Anandamoyi, with her ungrudging love and her gentle independence, and Suchirita sitting "with her hands in her lap, still and silent like an image in a picture."

THE KHALIFATE.

To the Editor of The Near East.

Sir,—It is really pathetic to read Mr. Justice Ameer Ali's lament on the abolition of the Turkish Khalifate (The Near East, April 17) when one remembers that his letter, written jointly with the Aga Khan last autumn, to the Angora Government proved to be, to the writers' great distress, one of the biggest nails driven into the Khalifate's coffin. One cannot but regret, too, that he has waited so long before saying, as he does now, that temporal power is not essential to the Khalif's exercise of spiritual leadership. For the violent Khalifate agitation in India which he so often blessed was based altogether, as far as it was a religious movement, on the contention that the temporal power, which the Allies wanted to diminish as the penalty for Turkey's wanton entry into the Great War, as well as for her odious methods of government, was essential to the Khalif's spiritual power, with which the Allies had no wish whatever to interfere.

Happily, I am in more agreement with my old and respected friend when he denies the unadaptability of the Islamic laws to modern conditions. In practice they have too often been interpreted as a bar to progressive development, but, I think, quite wrongly, as is shown in the instances of a more liberal interpretation which Mr. Ameer Ali recalls. There he is entirely at one with the greatest and most enlightened of his Indian co-religionists, Sir Syed Ahmed Khan, the founder of Alighur College, which, since it became a Mohammedan University, has by no means always lived up to his teachings, and, least of all, I may remind Mr. Ameer Ali, when it became a hotbed of Khalifate agitation, though Syed Ahmed had himself vigorously combated the legitimacy of the Turkish Sultan's claim to the Khalifate.—I am, etc.,

Dr. D. G. Hogarth writes: "I regard the Khalifate Question as unimportant from any practical point of view. Mr. Thomas Lyell, in his article 'A New Islam?', invested the Khalif with far more sanctity than Moslems do! As for the 'sacrosanctity' of his person—well, the fate of three out of the first four Khalifs and of many another since is sufficient comment!"

NOTES AND NEWS.

167, Strand, London, W.C.2,
Tuesday Morning.

Budget Day.

Before these words appear in print the worst, or the best, will be known of Mr. Snowden's first Budget. The papers have discussed little else besides Budget prospects during the past week, probably because it has been such an uneventful period. It is noteworthy that there have been no suggestions that anything startling is to be looked for, and, it may be added, no one seems to expect any remission of taxes that will be worth having. Cheaper tea and sugar, which, it is generally anticipated, will figure in the Budget, are not likely to cause wild excitement, even among the feminine section of the community. Whatever the Chancellor's proposals, it must be emphasised that the Budget will in no respect represent the Labour Party's intentions, and anyone who is inclined to regard the prosaic propositions of Mr. Snowden in that light is likely to receive a shock when Labour is really in a position to introduce a Budget of its own.

The B.I.F.

The opening of the British Industries Fair yesterday may be regarded almost as the commencement of the London season this year as far as visitors are concerned, for a very great number of foreign business men who will be going to Wembley will time their visit to this country so as to be able to cover either the White City section or the Birmingham section of the Fair, or both as well. That means that specially good business should be done at the Fair. To some extent, of course, the Fair and Wembley overlap, and it was inevitable in the circumstances that this should have been the case. It is satisfactory to find that the Fair has not suffered on this account to any great extent. In an article on another page it is pointed out that one or two sections have suffered from the reluctance of firms to exhibit in two places at the same time, but that, on the whole, the sections are quite up to standard.

The Egyptian Budget.

Brief details are now available of the Egyptian Budget. The revenue is estimated at £E34,400,000, and the expenditure is put at £E33,980,000, allowance thus being made for a surplus of £E420,000. A year ago the estimated surplus was £E550,000 on a revenue of £E34,905,000. It is interesting to note that the general reserve now amounts to £E18,400,000. The financial position of the country is thus very satisfactory at the present time. Of course, Egypt is at the disadvantage of depending so largely on two factors for her prosperity—cotton and tourists; but even if an adverse period were to ensue it is very evident that her present resources should be adequate to enable her to meet it. But there is no reason for anticipating that such a contingency will arise in the near future. The tourist traffic is quite good considering the conditions, and should continue to develop as the purchasing power of the world recovers, while the cotton position is eminently satisfactory from the Egyptian point of view, and all the indications suggest that the next crop should greatly add to the prosperity of the country.

Kassala Cotton Company.

On another page will be found the first report of the Kassala Cotton Company, covering the period from the company's incorporation in November 30, 1922, to December 31 last. The company's management of cultivation in the Gash Delta commences on July 1 next under the terms of its concession, so that the first crop grown by it will not be picked until 1925, and it follows, therefore, that the profit-earning stage is still some little way ahead. The period covered by the report has been utilised for the study of local irrigation problems, for organisation, and for development work, including the improvement of existing water channels, the excavation of a new canal, and the clearing of new areas. The approximate area under cultivation in the Gash Delta in the current season is estimated to have been 9,000 acres, and the directors anticipate that it will be added to considerably as the result of the development work now in hand. It is needless to say that the progress of the company's operations will be watched with the keenest interest in this country, and particularly by Lancashire, for it is to the Sudan that this country must mainly look for the cotton that will make it less dependent on sources of supply outside the Empire. No one expects miracles to be accomplished, but the work already accomplished in the Sudan has been such that it is possible to be very confident as to the consequences in the course of a few years.

A City of Bucharest Loan.

It is understood that negotiations will shortly be commenced here in connection with the issue of a loan for the City of Bucharest. The amount of the loan is reported to be £2,600,000, and it is probable that there will be an issue here and one in New York.

THE BRITISH INDUSTRIES FAIR.

Some Impressions.

(By Our Own Correspondent.)

From Wembley to the White City, where the British Industries Fair opened on Monday, is a very long stride indeed. The one is all-comprehensive, a veritable index of Imperial potentialities, and alight with colour and movement, as it must be to attract the masses; the other is restricted in scope and designed solely for the specialist. In a word, the Fair is purely a business undertaking, as, indeed, an event of this kind must be if it is to be successful. On the whole, the exhibits at the Fair probably gain from the absence of background, for there is nothing to distract the attention.

It was considered possible that the Fair would suffer to some extent from the competition of Wembley, and one or two of the sections make rather a poor showing in comparison with last year, owing to the decision of a number of firms not to be represented at both events, and to give Wembley the preference. But most of the sections are fully up to the high standard that has been set hitherto, and at least one shows a great advance on any previous fair. This only goes to emphasise the widespread realisation of the assistance that has been rendered by the Fair to British industry in past years, and one can only regret that it has not been possible on this very special occasion to make every section the best on record.

While it is, of course, too soon to give any considered estimate of the probable results of the Fair, it needs no special optimism to anticipate that in the special circumstances it will be uniquely successful. Conditions at home and abroad are more favourable than they were a year ago; indeed, the indications point forcibly to the fact that at long last the corner has been turned, and that a war-distressed world is making progress towards convalescence. Even in the worst year of trade depression there was no lack of foreign buyers at the Fair, and the gradual economic recovery would in any case have meant a much greater influx this time to provide for the increased demand for commodities a few months hence, when the development of purchasing power begins to make its influence felt. When the added attraction of the Exhibition is borne in mind, it will be realised that the prospects of the Fair must be exceptionally good.

I was one of the earliest arrivals at the White City, and this is usually not to be recommended at trade fairs, but it did not matter in this case, for if some of the stands were not quite complete and the cleaners were still in evidence, the Fair was, to all intents and purposes, ready, and it was possible, therefore, to obtain quite adequate impressions of the wealth of British manufactures that are on view. Incidentally, a tour round the Fair is not exactly the thing for anyone who does not care for pedestrian exercise. Like Felix, one has to keep on walking along corridor after corridor, upstairs and downstairs, until one literally sighs for those most convenient runabouts that are so much in evidence at Wembley.

The section devoted to chemicals and drugs was the first to engage my attention. Last year there was a splendid display in this section, but it has suffered sadly this time because of Wembley. Among the notable stands in this section is that of the Marley Hill Chemical Co., who show coke, pitch, and coal tar by-products and sulphate of ammonia.

A very different showing is made by the musical instruments section. This is a long way the best that I have seen at the Fair, the display of pianos by the leading makers being particularly striking. The export trade in these goods has been on the up grade for some time, which no doubt accounts to some extent for the improved display. An interesting stand in this section is that of Barnett Samuel and Sons, who show their Decca gramophones, flutes, etc. A feature of the stand is an exhibit showing all the stages in the making of a flute, from the rough wood to the finished product.

Generally speaking, the stands at the Fair are most tastefully arranged, and it would certainly seem that the Brighter London movement has not been without an effect. I was particularly impressed by a stand simply but artistically decorated with clusters of red and yellow roses. There are plenty of stands more bizarre in appearance with curious colour contrasts, but none that makes so effective an appeal to the eye as this one. Of course, in many of the sections the exhibits do not lend themselves to artistic display. It would be difficult to beautify chemicals, while objects like pianos must be left to speak for themselves. On the other hand, there are classes of exhibits themselves so delightful to look at that they need nothing to set them off. These naturally are to be found in the glassware and chinaware section, where there are some perfectly charming stands—notably, that of Stevens and Williams, who show some exquisite glasses, decanters, etc., in green and yellow and violet. Another stand in this section that made me linger is that of W. Moorcroft, showing a wonderful display of pottery in blues and shades of brick-red. Every stand in this section is of interest.

I do not propose to comment on the other sections in the present article except to say that in general they seem well up to standard, and the exhibits as a whole certainly leave nothing to be desired. As an exhibition of the potentialities of the British manufacturer, the Fair is a veritable revelation. It shows very plainly the advance that has been made during the War, and affords the clearest possible proof—if such be needed—that in the matter of quality British commerce has no reason to fear any competition. In the matter of variety, also, there is no ground for criticism. New ideas and developments are to be found everywhere, and it is very evident that despite the trade depression there has been no standing still, and that the British manufacturer is still as alert as ever in the matter of improvements. Therein lies the hope of the future. I shall not be at all surprised if the Fair (in conjunction, of course, with the Exhibition) proves the turning point in our post-War trade history. Certainly if the indications go for anything the Fair will be visited by more foreign buyers than on any previous occasion, and if that be the case British industry will soon feel the benefit. It is sincerely to be trusted that if British traders, as I expect they will, do good business at the Fair, they will not be content with that, but will carefully cultivate the markets from which they receive orders. Particularly is this essential in the case of the Near East On this occasion there will be a large number of buyers present from that region, and the business they will do will provide an opening for an enlarged and permanent trade in the important markets in that region, given a little enterprise on the part of our firms and less unwillingness to use the ordinary means of publicity. Their reluctance to do so at present would almost suggest that they are afraid to advertise their wares.

(To be concluded.)

PERSIAN AMBARI HEMP PRODUCTION.

Persian ambari hemp, locally known as Kenaff, before the war was grown to quite an extent in Guilan and Mazanderan, Persia's two richest Caspian provinces. Russia consumed practically the entire production. The ensuing disorganisation of the Caucasus and Russia's virtual extinction as a market wiped out this industry just as they ended Persia's formerly flourishing Caspian silk cocoon production. Whereas in 1913-14 Persia exported to Russia 2,408,848 lb. of raw hemp and flax, its exports in 1920-21 only reached 19,670 lb., and in the following year 213,811 lb. (says an American Consular report). The entire exportation, both pre-war and present, represents the raw material, shipments of hemp cord being negligible.

The Guilan villager is free to plant hemp if he so desires, provided that it does not involve sacrificing the cultivation of his allotted rice fields or mulberry groves. It requires higher and drier land than rice, and is commonly planted in the hedgerows. Most villagers raise just enough for their own use. Since the mulberry groves have been allowed to deteriorate, however, following the demoralisation of the silk industry, they are gradually planting more hemp.

Hemp is planted in the spring and matures in the autumn. It is then buried in mud for some days and the fibre stripped off. Persian manufactures of hemp are confined to cord for domestic use. The quality of the fibre is said to be improving, but still too soft for effective ropes of any size.

SPECIAL MARKET REPORTS.

The following extracts are taken from recent reports received by the Imperial Ottoman Bank :—

Jaffa, March 29.

There has been a drop in the orange prices; nevertheless, the season is ending very favourably. Other markets are unchanged.

Cyprus, March 22.

Rain is again badly needed for growing crops. Prices of cereals tend to harden. Business in general is extremely quiet.

Basrah, April 5.

The market remains dull, and a certain tightness of money is felt. Grain shipments continue for the United Kingdom. The old crop is not yet entirely exhausted. Reports on this year's crop are less favourable on account of the lack of rain in March. Shipments should commence, as usual, about July. The news respecting the fresh date crop continues satisfactory, but it is too early as yet to make any definite pronouncement.

British Consular Reports.

1.—CZECHO-SLOVAKIA.

The following extracts are taken from the report on Czecho-Slovakia in 1923 by Mr. E. C. Donaldson Rawlins, Commercial Secretary to H.M. Legation at Prague :—

In the opening months of the year 1923 Czecho-Slovakia was faced with economic difficulties arising from the sudden rise in the Czech crown which had taken place in the autumn of 1922. In the country itself this sudden appreciation in the local currency had had the effect of increasing automatically the costs of production, and, as a corollary, it meant that Czecho-Slovak goods had a hard struggle to compete in the world's markets, and Czecho-Slovak manufacturers could not sell their goods abroad except at a loss. In the early months of the year under review the products which found the best outlet were coal, iron, and timber, which, owing to the occupation of the Ruhr, were sent in large quantities to Germany. This latter country had ever since the foundation of the Czecho-Slovak Republic been the chief purchaser from, as well as chief seller to, this country, having monopolised some 50 per cent. both in value and weight of the total trade. Towards the middle of 1923, however, owing to the complete collapse of the mark, Germany became unable to pay for such large imports, and so for the first time she lost her position as Czecho-Slovakia's chief purchaser, and by the month of September she had ceded the first place to Austria, who then became the principal purchaser from this country. Internal conditions in Germany became then more unsettled, and in November she had sunk to the third place, Austria still maintaining her position as chief importer, with the United Kingdom holding the second place. Germany, however, still heads the list of countries exporting to Czecho-Slovakia with a total of 40.8 per cent. of the total trade, the United Kingdom in this instance being only ninth on the list with a total of 3.3 per cent.

In the industrial sphere the main effort of this country throughout 1923 has been directed towards a reduction in the costs of production, and this has been effected, so far as it was possible, for though the Government directed all its efforts to keeping the Czech crown stable at its present high level, it has not been found possible to reduce taxation, transport, and cost of living in proportion to the increased value of the crown. Thus the position of the local manufacturers has been, and still is, one of very great difficulty. The authorities, for instance, are busy trying to obtain arrears of taxation for the last four years, and were local manufacturers forced to make over all at once such large amounts in taxation to the Government, they would evidently find themselves short of working capital and have to retrench on the production.

Another important factor in the year's industrial situation was the coal strike, which lasted some seven weeks, and which is calculated to have cost the country some three-quarters of a milliard Czech crowns, whilst several factories were obliged to close down.

According to the official figures of the Czecho-Slovak Statistical Office, this country had in 1922 a favourable trade balance of some 5½ milliards of crowns, whereas for the year 1923 this credit balance amounts to less than 2½ milliards. It will be seen, therefore, that the credit balance for 1923 is less than half of that of 1922, and in the month of October, 1923, there was, for the first time since the foundation of the Republic, an adverse trade balance of some 57 million crowns. Nevertheless, one must admit that although the trade figures for 1923 do not make such good showing as in previous years, the industrial situation has gradually improved since the beginning of the year under review, and local industries are slowly adapting themselves to the changed conditions. It is true also that the present decrease in the trade credit balance is largely due to the result of last year's rise in the value of the Czecho-Slovak crown and to the necessarily reduced prices of local products sent abroad. I have already stated that, owing to the occupation of the Ruhr, there were heavy exports of raw and semi-manufactured articles from Czecho-Slovakia (especially coal, iron, and timber), but this favourable state of affairs was only temporary and has already practically come to an end.

The pivot of Czecho-Slovakia's economic policy has been the due protection of her national industries, especially against the competition of neighbouring countries with greatly depreciated currencies. The severity of this protectionism has had to be modified and to give way to a more elastic policy, and towards the end of 1923 various orders were issued by the Ministry of Commerce freeing quantities of goods of which the import had been previously restricted.

Czecho-Slovakia can be said, however, to have come through the year 1923 with no small amount of credit, due in great measure to the determination of her local industry to hold its own at all costs. If the Government were to take a hand in reducing, to the greatest degree possible, the burdens caused by heavy taxation and high transport charges, by introducing still further economies in State finances, there would be no reason for taking other than an optimistic view of Czecho-Slovakia's industrial advance, except that there are signs that the country is over-industrialised, and for lack of markets abroad, combined with foreign competition in those markets, it is possible that some of the smaller industries may be forced to close down in the future, with a resultant effect on the whole economic structure of the country which cannot be accurately gauged to-day.

Industry and Production.

The energetic steps which the glass manufacturers took to overcome the difficult situation created by the rapid rise in the crown towards the end of 1922 have resulted in a most remarkable recovery from the gloomy outlook with which the industry was faced at the beginning of the year.

The beginning of the year 1923 found the Czecho-Slovak textile industry in the throes of the biggest crisis in the history of the trade. For the first six months of the year the industry was in a state of a complete stagnation, but in June and July orders for export began to come in, and gradually business increased in volume until the last quarter, when the majority of the mills, some of which up to that time had remained shut down, were working up to 60 per cent. of their capacity.

Costs of production, however, are still too high, and, although manufacturers have, since the unprecedented rise of the Czech crown in the second half of 1922. done much to bring them down, Czecho-Slovak textile manufacturers cannot profitably compete in the world's markets. What they have really accomplished is to reduce the amount of their losses on goods exported.

The future prospects of the industry are still very obscure. The determination of the Government to keep the Czech crown stable at its present high figure, and its inability to reduce taxation freights, cost of living, etc., in the same ratio, makes the position of manufacturers increasingly difficult. Many manufacturers are suffering from lack of working capital, but to work with a bank credit is at present almost impossible owing to the exaggerated interest and charges demanded by the banks, which, even to really first-class firms, amount to at least as much as 12 per cent. per annum.

The state of complete stagnation which prevailed in the wool industry at the opening of the present year slowly improved as the year advanced, until during the last quarter the majority of mills were working on an average 40 to 48 hours per week, or 60 per cent. of their pre-war capacity. The recent steady hardening of wool prices probably gave a fillip to trade, as manufacturers were able to work up old stocks and sell at old but remunerative prices. Once these stocks are exhausted and manufacturers are obliged to replenish their stocks of raw material at advanced prices, they will have to increase the prices of their goods, and this, it is thought, will not only again have an adverse effect on the home demand, but will seriously handicap Czecho-Slovak manufacturers in competing in the world's markets.

The prospects of the trade in the near future are not unfavourable, as Germany, on account of internal conditions, has, for the time being, ceased to be a dangerous competitor, but the situation is likely to change for the worse should prices of raw materials continue to advance.

Although the Czecho-Slovak production of flax is still insufficient to cover the requirements of local spinners in raw material, the latter were able to satisfy the demands of the weaving mills for local yarns in which, owing to lack of orders, there was an over-production. The mills are obliged to purchase a large proportion of their yarns abroad as local spinners cannot manufacture the higher counts in the quality required. Prices for linen goods in sympathy with cotton goods were much lower, and export orders were executed at a loss in order to keep in contact with old connections. On the whole, the situation in the linen industry in 1923 shows a great improvement over the previous year, but it is still far from satisfactory, and an improvement in the general situation cannot be looked for until taxes, fiscal charges, and freight rates, with which the industry is overburdened, have been reduced in accordance with the changed conditions.

The stimulus given to the Czecho-Slovak coal industry at the beginning of the year by the French occupation of the Ruhr continued up to the outbreak of the general miners' strike in August. In July the production of hard coal came within 3 per cent. of the pre-war output, the highest figure reached since the revolution, whereas the lignite output dropped to 28 per cent. of pre-war production, the lowest figure reached for twenty years.

Czecho-Slovakia is one of the richest of all European countries in timber. The timber area is about equally divided between Bohemia, Moravia, and Silesia on the one hand, and Slovakia and Sub-Carpathian Russia on the other. But owing to the lack of adequate transport facilities in the eastern part of the Republic, the timber cut in the western provinces is of greater commercial value. In Bohemia, Moravia, and Silesia coniferous forests prevail to the extent of 78 per cent.; deciduous woods cover 10 per cent., and mixed woods about 12 per cent. of the total wooded area. In Slovakia and Sub-Carpathian Russia beech predominates with 42 per cent., 32 per cent. is pine and spruce, and 26 per cent. oak.

Czecho-Slovak timber is chiefly suitable for building material, battens, railway sleepers, pit-props, telegraph poles, and for the manufacture of wood pulp and cellulose. There are 805 saw mills in Bohemia, Moravia, and Silesia driven by steam or electricity, and 1,853 using water power. In home demand the building trade requires large supplies for the erection of public works, and large quantities are used in the manufacture of furniture, barrels, packing cases. carriages and wagons, matches, pencils, toys, musical instruments, etc. There are 91 paper, wood pulp, and cardboard factories in Slovakia.

It is announced that tenders for the construction of the proposed new water-supply system for Athens and Piræus will be received up to July 1.

Persian 5 per Cent Loan.—The numbers are announced of 160 bonds of the Persian Government 5 per Cent. Sterling Loan, 1911, amounting together to £8,800, which have been drawn for redemption on May 15 next.

COMPANY NOTES AND REPORTS.

Kassala Cotton.

The report of the Kassala Cotton Company for the period from November 30, 1922 (the date of the incorporation of the company), to December 31, 1923, states that under the terms of its concession the company's management of cultivation in the Gash delta does not begin until July 1, 1924. The period covered by the report has been devoted to the study of local irrigation problems, to organisation, and to development work, including the improvement of existing water channels, the excavation of a new canal, and the clearing of new areas. The first cotton crop to be grown under the company's auspices is due to be sown this autumn and to be picked during the early months of 1925. Consequently, there can be no earnings from this source until the year 1925. The approximate area under cultivation in the Gash delta in the season 1923-4 is estimated to have been 9,000 acres. Under the concession agreement, this area is taken over by the company, and the directors anticipate that it will be added to considerably during the coming season as the result of the development work now in hand. Satisfactory progress has been made in the building by the Sudan Government Railways Department of the railway line from Haiya (on the Atbara-Port Sudan line) to Kassala. It is expected that railhead will reach the Kassala terminus by the end of the present month. The Government of Eritrea are reported to be studying the possibility of using water from the Gash for irrigation in that country. In this they are acting within their rights, but anything in the nature of interference with the river upstream of Kassala is naturally a matter of concern to the directors. The British and Sudan Governments are aware of the circumstances, and the directors trust that the former as guarantors of the Kassala Railway Company Debentures, and the latter as trustees for the interests of the inhabitants of Kassala and of the company operating there, will be successful in the representations which they are making with a view to averting any action in Eritrea prejudicial to the interests of all parties concerned. The profit and loss account shows, after payment of debenture interest, a debit balance of £17,277 11s. 9d. Meeting, Winchester House, Old Broad Street, May 7, 12 noon.

Egyptian Markets.

The report of the Egyptian Markets for the year ended December 31 states that the number of cattle market days lost during the year in consequence of cattle plague was 1,564, as compared with 118 during the year 1922. During the year under review, seven markets were entirely closed for several weeks on account of plague amongst human beings, which affected the receipts of both cattle and general markets. During the latter part of the year, the company's markets in Upper Egypt were also closed for the sale of fowls owing to the prevalence of chicken cholera.

The gross receipts from the cattle markets, exclusive of slaughter-houses, show an increase of £5,426, as compared with the year 1922, the total being £65,329, against £59,903. This increase would have been considerably greater but for the large number of market days lost on account of cattle plague. The gross receipts from the general markets for the year under review were £37,979, as compared with £35,460 for the year 1922, an increase of £2,519. The net receipts from the slaughter-houses worked during the year were £1,283, against £1,085 during 1922, an increase of £198. No slaughter-houses have been taken over by the Government during the year 1923. The expenses in the trading account show an increase of £942 under cost of maintenance and repairs of markets. On the other hand, rents, salaries, and wages show a decrease of £189 during the year under review. The net revenue from all sources for the year 1923 amounted to £57,350 2s. 7d., as compared with £49,168 10s. 3d. during the previous year, an increase of £8,181 12s. 4d. After deduction of the amount of £23,723 9s. 3d., which it is estimated will be required to meet payment of the Government share of profits for 1923, a balance of £33,626 13s. 4d. remains, which, with the amount of £11,595 19s. 2d. brought forward from 1922, makes a total of £45,222 12s. 6d. to be dealt with. After meeting the fixed charges of the annual premia for the amortisation of the share capital and debentures, aggregating £3,720 16s. 6d., debenture interest amounting to £2,840, and carrying the sum of £2,500 to reserve, a balance of £36,161 16s. 0d. remains available for distribution. The directors recommend the payment of a final dividend (No. 39) on the ordinary shares for the year ended December 31, 1923, of 5 per cent., and a bonus of 2 per cent., making with the interim dividend of 5 per cent. paid in November, 1923, a total of 12 per cent. for the year, absorbing in all £20,964, and in accordance with the terms of the memorandum of association of the company, and subject to the settlement of the proportion of profits due to the Government and to such Corporation Profits Tax, as may be payable, the payment of a dividend (No. 14) on the deferred shares at the rate of £11 15s. 3 287-300d. per share for the year 1923, which will absorb £3,529 18s. 11d., and leave a balance of £11,667 17s. 1d. to be carried forward, which balance is also subject to the settlements above referred to. Cyprus Asbestos.

The report of the Cyprus Asbestos Co. for 1923 shows, after making provision for depreciation, a loss of £27,205, which, after deducting £7,018 brought forward, leaves a debit balance of £20,186. The directors state that various difficulties have now practically been overcome, and the mills are working satisfactorily, and great economies have been effected by means of improved machinery. The first section of the aerial ropeway from Limassol to Spitalli has been completed, and the whole line is expected to be in operation during May next. A large warehouse is in course of construction, as well as a pier for handling shipment of company's fibre. These installations will considerably reduce transport and handling costs, and together with economies effected in the production of the raw material and in milling should substantially increase the margin of profit on the total output, and thereby compensate the company to a large extent for the great fall in the selling price of fibre. Working costs, which have been already very materially lowered, will be still further reduced as the scale of operations extends. So far as the directors are able to judge, the current year's working should show good results. In order to provide the necessary funds for liquidating loans from bankers and the additional capital expenditure required the directors have decided to call up the remaining 5s. per share payable on June 30 next.

The Municipality of Eskishehir has signed a contract with the Houloussi-Vidal Co. (Turkish), for the rebuilding of the city (says an American consular report). A number of buildings are to be erected for the municipality at a cost of £T500,000, to be repaid in 10 years with interest at the rate of 9 per cent. per annum. The company on its own account will expend £T100,000 in new buildings.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Futures Firm.

The Alexandria Commercial Company in their report for the week ended April 17 state :—Since our last report the futures market has been very firm, especially for Ashmouni. The firmer tone of our market may be attributed to an improved demand from abroad falling on a rather limited spot supply. Tenderable cotton, both Sakel and Ashmouni, is strongly held; in fact, we think that stocks are anything but ample. At to-day's session a sharp rise resulted for April Ashmouni; some speculators were caught short on this position, and had to close their contracts at any price. The strength of the Ashmouni position is demonstrated by the fact that, despite all the rise in futures, F.G.F. spot continues to be worth much more than April futures, nominally $$\frac{1}{2}$, but for business to materialise probably $1 has to be paid. New York has been quiet, and prices have receded somewhat, with the result that the difference between American and Egyptian has further widened. The consumption figures of cotton in the United States for the month of March are: 484,000 B/s, against 508,000 B/s last month and 623,000 B/s a year ago. The total since August 1 is 4,081,000 B/s. The Egyptian Liverpool market has been fairly firm, with a large daily turnover of business on the Spot; prices, however, are still relatively cheaper than those of Alexandria. New crops, both Sakels and Ashmouni, have been neglected this week and have lost some ground; we attribute this to the fact that spinners during the week have not shown much interest in them, whilst we understand also that some straddle operators have, to a limited extent, sold Egyptian new crop against purchases of American same options. The statistical position of Egyptian in Liverpool and America is almost as strong as that of Alexandria. Under the circumstances we expect that the market will continue to show a rather firm tone. The week's receipts amount to 46,052 crs., against exports 91,472 crs.; the stock stands at 1,296,627 crs.

Spot.—We have had a fairly active week at Minet-el-Bassal, and sales for the five business days amount to about 8,100 B/s, of which we estimate 5,700 B/s Sakel, 2,300 B/s Uppers, and 100 B/s of Brown, White, etc.

Sakellarides.—The bulk of the demand continues to be for cotton from Good Fair to about Good. The lower qualities still fail to attract much attention and continue neglected. Prices of spot against contracts are generally without much change, except for the grades below Good Fair, which are a little easier. Good staple cotton of a desirable style is steadily becoming scarcer and harder to buy.

Uppers.—The demand continues mainly in the medium and good grades, the lower qualities finding only a small inquiry. Prices of spot against contracts are well maintained at last week's rates, with the exception of cotton below Good Fair, which is rather easier.

Brown and Pilion.—A small business has been done. Prices of spot against contracts are a little easier.

White.—Is neglected, and only a few bales have been done. Prices of spot against contracts are unchanged. Crop 1924.—Climatic conditions have continued favourable. The young plants in general have a good healthy appearance. Sore shin attack is extremely light in most districts. Latest reports from various sources confirm a slightly larger acreage than last year.

LIVERPOOL COTTON REPORT.

Good Inquiry, but Restricted Business.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson, of Liverpool, report as follows for the week ended April 23 :—

Egyptian Spot.—The Easter holidays, coupled with a considerable break in American futures, have put an effective check for the time being on the steady flow of business which last week was such a prominent feature. Probably this check will prove to be of only a temporary character, as the situation for Egyptian cotton remains fundamentally the same, and, under the circumstances, spinners are not likely to miss any opportunity that offers of obtaining their requirements for the remainder of the season. Erratic futures markets invariably upset trade, and we must wait until the markets become more stabilised before we can expect any serious buying movement to reappear.

The general inquiry during the three days under review has shown no signs of slackening, though we fear that much of it has been of rather a fruitless character. The fact is, that the attractive lots of Egyptian cotton are either going out of sight, or are hardening in basis so rapidly, that many spinners are finding it extremely difficult to co-ordinate the buying of actual cotton with the selling of yarn. The inquiry has followed the customary lines. Sakel "75 to 150 on," and "175 to 225 on," have proved to be the most popular ranges, but the former is yielding a very mediocre selection, and even the better quality is becoming rapidly thinned out. Fine cotton continues to attract an increasing amount of attention, and on one day over 25.00d. was paid.

Sudan Sakel and Tokar Sakel maintain their popularity, and in the latter quite a rush to obtain offers of the early shipments has been witnessed. Between 23.50d. and 24.00d. is still the market value of the Sudan Sakel, and we are of the opinion that the No. 1 quality of the Tokar cotton may obtain an even higher figure before the season is out. White Sudan has again been popular, and up to "350 on American" has been paid. Actual business in Sudan, as in other growths, has only been of moderate extent. Upper Egyptians, what is left of them, are being sold at extravagant prices.

Cotton from "50 on" downwards, including the inferior and Scarto qualities, has met with very little support. Speculators are still busy picking up Good Fair to Fully Good Fair Sakel at about 125 points on when it can be found. A fairly good c.i.f. business has been reported, in spite of the premium at which the Alexandria market stands above ours, a sign of the times which those who are still in need of cotton will do well to observe. Forwardings to spinners for the week ending April

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

Business on Small Scale.

The Manchester cotton trade review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended April 26 states :—

As usual, the market was slow in settling down after the holidays, and a further impediment to active operations has been the pronounced weakness in raw cotton which developed in New York on Monday last whilst the markets on this side were closed. Owing to the latter circumstance buyers have exercised considerable restraint, and yet there is a persistence in the inquiry which gives rise to hope of reasonably good business if some measure of stability could be attained.

Yarn.—There is no change to report regarding this section. Spinners of American hold very firmly to their determination to maintain improved margins, and only reluctantly concede to buyers the benefits of cheaper raw cotton. For the reasons mentioned above, the turnover has not been large, but there is still a shortage of certain counts which is proving a great hindrance to the weavers who need them. Egyptian Spinnings are in good demand at enhanced prices.

Cloth.—Inquiry has been on an encouraging scale, even though much of it has had to be refused. The demand still runs chiefly on fancy goods, but India and China have displayed more interest in staple lines of shirtings than for some little time back. Egypt remains quiet, and the Levant generally takes only cheap stock lots.

Raw Cotton.—As stated above, there was a considerable break in New York prices last week-end, and quotations in Liverpool for "spot" were reduced on Tuesday and Wednesday last by over ½d. per lb. each day. Since then a part of the fall has been recovered. The price of Egyptian which sympathetically declined on Tuesday, has since been carried by an active demand to nearly ¾d. per lb. over that prevailing last week-end. Closing prices yesterday were as follows :—American Fully Middling, 18.20; Egyptian Fully Good Fair, 23.40.

Company Meeting.

AGRICULTURAL BANK OF EGYPT.

Increased Profits.

The report of the directors on the working of the bank for 1923-4, submitted to the shareholders at the twenty-first ordinary general meeting of the bank held in Cairo on April 15, states:—

The directors have to report that the net profits of the bank for the financial year 1923-24, established in accordance with Article 40 of the Statutes, amount to £E570,526.167. From this amount there have to be deducted: (i.) interest on debentures, £E222,158.016; (ii.) provision for the reserve fund, £E16,052.506; (iii.) provision for the special reserve fund, £E19,017.421; leaving £E313,298.224. And there have further to be deducted: (iv.) dividend on £1,250,000 preferred shares, £E48,750; (v.) commission to the National Bank of Egypt, £E11,488.705; leaving, £E253,059.519; which is available for distribution as dividend on ordinary and deferred shares. The ordinary shares have to receive, in the first instance, dividend at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, £E120,900; leaving a balance of £E132,159.519. The balance of £E132,159.519 is available for the ordinary shares to the extent of one-half, or £E66,079.760, and for the deferred shares to the extent of one half, or £E66,079.759.

Ordinary Shares.—The amounts therefore available for dividend on these shares are as follows:—Balance from the year ending January 31, 1923, £E283,226.341; interest for the year, accrued on the above balance, £E14,161.317; dividend at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, as stated, £E120,900; further amount available, £E66,079.760; making a total of £E484,367.418. The directors propose to pay a dividend at the rate of 9¼ per cent. per annum requiring £E223,665, and to carry forward the balance of £E260,702.418.

Deferred Shares.—The amounts available for dividend on these shares are as follows:—Balance from the year ending January 31, 1923, £E195,758.294; interest for the year, accrued on the above balance, £E9,787.915; making a total of £E205,546.209; further amount available, £E66,079.759; in all, £E271,625.968. The directors propose to pay a dividend of £52 10s. per share, requiring £E102,375; and to carry forward the balance of £E169,250.968.

Owing to the cancellation of debentures to which allusion is made below, it has not been necessary to provide the annuity, amounting this year to £E12,696, established to extinguish, over the life of the debentures, the discount and expenses of their issue. This sum, and the increase in the encashment of arrears, practically represent the amount required to cover the increased dividends which the directors propose.

Debentures.—In accordance with the resolution approved by the extraordinary general meeting held on April 25, 1923, the directors have, before closing the accounts of the year, cancelled £855,000 nominal 3½ per cent. bonds, first series, and £1,540,000 nominal of the series guaranteed directly by the Egyptian Government. The difference between the nominal value and the average price at which the total holding stood in the bank's books has been applied in writing off the balance of the discount and expenses of the whole issue, and this item has now completely disappeared from the balance-sheet.

General Investments.—During the year we have sold £150,000 nominal of British War Bonds 1927, and have replaced them by the same nominal amount of Sudan 5½ per cent. Loan, thus assuring a better yield of interest for a longer period. The profit realised on the sale of the former has been utilised in writing down the cost of the latter, which were acquired at a price above their redemption value.

Mortgage Company of Egypt, Ltd.—The dividend paid by the Mortgage Company of Egypt, Ltd., for the year ending March 31, 1923, was again at the rate of 12 per cent. on the ordinary shares. The business of the company has followed a steady course with no important change during the past year. Proposals for loans which the company could entertain have not been numerous, and, as a consequence, the amount of outstanding loans shows a slight decrease owing to the repayment of the capital included in the yearly instalments, the collection of which was satisfactory. Despite the transfer to Egypt of the control and administration of the company, the British Government has claimed that the company is still liable to income-tax. This question is under discussion, and some time may elapse before a final decision is reached.

Arrears.—Out of the instalments in arrear on January 31, 1923, amounting to £E229,203 a sum of £E202,120 has been either collected or written off during the year; the amounts collected are included as profit in the profit and loss account for £E118,812 as capital and £E81,562 as interest. The instalments due in 1923-24 which have not been collected in the year amount to £E180,715, of which £E71,424 are for interest; no credit has been taken for this sum in the profit and loss account as, in accordance with the statutes, only interest actually encashed can be included in the profits. The balance, £E109,291, representing capital due and not received in the course of the year has, as required by the statutes, been deducted from the receipts before arriving at the net profits for the year. Any encashments on the total outstanding arrears—£E207,798—will be included in the profits of the year in which they are effected.

Output and Collections.—We have made during the year 356 A loans for a total of £E9,592 and 286 B loans for a total of £E93,005. The total of loans exceeding £E1,000 each was £E106,884 on January 31, 1924. The arrears on these loans were £E4,806. A sum of £E398,219 was collected out of the annual instalment of £E578,934, and £E200,374 was collected from the arrears, making a total collection of £E598,593. The percentage of the annual instalment collected is the same as in the previous year. The collection of arrears, however, has again improved, the percentage reaching 87.4 per cent., and amount of arrears carried forward has fallen to £E207,798.

Land Acquired.—The area of land owned by the bank has slightly decreased during the year, and we hope gradually to dispose of it.

Expropriations.—The number of expropriations made by the bank during the year are as follows:—Number of cases in hand on February 1, 1923, 802; number of cases begun during 1923-24, 1,467; total, 2,269; cases settled, 1,457; balance, 812; cases brought to expropriation, 51; balance pending, 761. In twenty-seven of these cases of expropriation 197 feddans were bought in by the bank, and in twenty-four remaining cases 428 feddans were bought in by third parties.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The Turko-Syrian Frontier.

In spite of the fact that the Grand National Assembly stands adjourned for six months there are no indications as yet that Turkey is to enter upon the period of internal and external peace of which she stands in need so badly. The strained relations with France invest the situation on the Syrian frontier with a significance that the actual happenings may not as yet have earned for themselves. Both Governments affect to make light of the matter, the French attributing the exaggerated reports to official Turkish inspiration designed to affect the negotiations for the ratification of the Treaty of Lausanne, the Turks describing the fighting as merely the outcome of local resistance to French attacks. In the meantime there are reports of villages being destroyed by French artillery fire and of punitive expeditions being despatched from Syria to cope with Turkish irregular and regular forces. It is not clear what is at the root of the trouble. The frontier was mutually agreed upon by Turks and French, and the reason for the objection of the former to the presence of French troops on the southern side of the frontier is not apparent.

The Ottoman Public Debt.

Turkey has profited so much by recalcitrance in the past that none of her rulers seems able to realise that, as a settled policy of the Republic, it may have its drawbacks. The National Assembly when in session was inclined to force the Government's hands in many directions, but it might be expected that Mustapha Kemal Pasha would take advantage of the present respite to place the country's relations with foreign countries on a more satisfactory basis. So far, however, no practical step to this end would seem to have been taken. The instructions issued by the Turkish Government to the effect that in future all revenues hitherto paid into the account of the Council of the Ottoman Public Debt should be paid to the credit of the Angora Treasury is stated to have elicited an emphatic protest from the Council, which saw itself likely to be deprived of all funds. The Vekil of Finance, however, has stated that the Government has no intention to modify the status of the Public Debt without discussion with the bondholders, and we must wait for the explanation of the attempt to transfer the funds administered by the Debt to the Government.

Turkey's Potentialities.

A commercial report, published elsewhere in this issue, on conditions in Western Asia Minor gives a very satisfactory account of the agricultural progress made in the wide region served by the port of Smyrna. The statistics of the export trade recall the fact that it was the Turk and not the Greek who was the agricultural labourer of these parts. In a very short time the Turk has shown marked recuperative powers, with the result that trade returns are already of a most encouraging character. If the value of these conditions is not wholly lost on the Turkish authorities, it is to be hoped that they will strengthen the hands of General Rafet Pasha, who has resigned his Constantinople seat in order to defeat the machinations of those who accuse him of intriguing against the President. His object, he declares, is to save Turkey from being divided into two hostile camps. The surest way of achieving this is to persuade the Government to confine its attention to essentials, and not to go out of its way to administer rebuffs to those whom it regards as its enemies abroad or at home. While the peasants of the Aidin vilayet have been minding their own business, to their own manifest advantage, the Government has been far more concerned to have a finger in the business of everybody else, while neglecting its obvious duties. The financial position must be getting worse instead of improving, and Turkey cannot be said to be nearer a foreign loan than she was a year ago, but the number of pinpricks administered to those from whom the loan must ultimately come shows few signs of decreasing.

The Messenger of the Greeks.

First thoughts are inclined to find something rather pathetic in the idea of turning the Hermes of Praxiteles into a commercial traveller. The suggestion that this masterpiece should be shipped to America to undertake a dumb lecture-tour on behalf of the Greek Refugee Fund originated with Mr. Morgenthau, the able and energetic supervisor of the League of Nations Greek Refugee Settlement Committee, and with a fine gesture the Greek Prime Minister has offered to make a free loan of the statue to the United States for a year. At the moment of writing it is not known whether the American Government will accept the Greek offer and whether the marble Hermes will cross the Atlantic as the messenger of Greek gratitude, or in a capacity more closely connected with those attributes which, among the Latins at least, made him the god of merchandise. Certainly no nation is likely to do more justice to such an innovation in international relationships than the American, and Greece need have little fear that she will not be amply rewarded for allowing her choicest work of art a year's leave of absence from the remote seclusion of its home at Olympia. What the Americans will think of Hermes is known already; how the novel experience will strike him will, unfortunately, be revealed only to the infant Dionysus. Let it be hoped that the success of the undertaking will not prompt India one day to return thanks for American interest by sending the Car of Juggernaut through the streets of New York.

Britain and the Hejaz.

A question in the House of Commons last week elicited the fact that the British Government had not seen its way to meeting King Hussein's recent requests in connection with the treaty negotiations. As is known, a draft agreement was drawn up with the representative of the Hejaz in London, and was duly transmitted to King Hussein for his signature. The document, it is stated, failed to reach its destination, and for many months neither the King's representative in London nor the Hejaz Government seems to have given the subject another thought. When King Hussein was reminded of the draft Treaty and had received a duplicate copy, he proposed to reopen the negotiations by a fresh envoy to be sent to London. As the present representative has not been recalled, the British Government replied that there was no point in sending a new one, and that any further communications from the Hejaz Government could be made through the British Agent and Consul at Jeddah. To use military phraseology, there has been bad staff work in the Hejaz official world, and the British Government sees no particular reason why it should be made to suffer for it. Moreover, it is not apparent that any amount of further discussion will bring the parties any nearer agreement than they are at present.

Unrest in Turkestan.

Reports by devious routes speak of unrest in Turkestan, where the Soviet organisation is said to be hard pressed by insurgents. As the Bolshevists have triumphed over opposition of this nature in the past, it will be well to wait for further news before the expulsion of the Red régime from this part of Asia is contemplated. The news, however, coupled with accounts of friction in the Soviet camp and of the attitude of imperturbable aloofness that the Russian peasantry has maintained all along towards Bolshevist doctrines will inevitably strengthen the belief that the Soviet days are numbered and will increase reluctance to make too great a surrender for the beaux yeux of the present Russian Government. The course of the London negotiations suggests that the presence of the Soviet Mission has not been without its advantages in providing useful correctives to the valuation that the Bolshevists had previously placed on their own régime.

India's Outcastes.

Recent news from India suggests that a new chapter has opened in the wretched story of the Indian outcastes, or panchamas, or depressed classes, or Adi-dravidas, call them what you will. Unfortunately, the change is not in the upper classes, who have the power to transform the situation, but so far have not found the will; the new fact is that the sufferers are making up their minds not to suffer any longer. Under the present electoral law, with its high property qualification, they stand practically outside the Constitution, and, in order to secure recognition as human beings, they must either appeal to the British people or make themselves unpleasant to their oppressors. The evidence given by their representatives before the Lee Commission constitutes in effect an appeal to England, and they would be wise to reprint it in pamphlet form, and circulate it widely throughout the Empire. The alternative of creating unpleasantness has now been given a trial, appropriately enough in the State of Travancore, which claims to be enlightened to an exceptional extent, but where the social restrictions on the outcastes are embodied in the local law.

The Present Impasse.

The situation in Travancore can best be described by an imaginary parallel. Suppose that, with the entire approval of the local shopkeepers, the City dustmen, street-keepers, and charwomen were prohibited from using Ludgate Hill, or entering St. Paul's Cathedral. After years of submission they decide to protest, and day after day small numbers of them peaceably enter the prohibited area, allow themselves to be arrested, and are duly sentenced at the Mansion House. In England the thing would not go on for very long, because public opinion would soon decide that the obsolete prohibition must be abolished. In India, on the other hand, public opinion either supports the prohibition, or at best mutters uneasily, and then turns over in its sleep. If, therefore, the sufferers are in earnest, it becomes practically certain that by and by the protests will cease to be peaceful, and that defiance of the law, always an evil in itself, but a great evil in India, where law is not yet firmly established, will eventually be accompanied by violence and bloodshed. In these circumstances it appears to us to be necessary that England should give a strong and definite lead, not, of course, in this particular State, but in the Presidency of Madras, where the social oppression is in practice almost equally great.

The Way Out.

The most effective line of action is indicated by the fact that already there are a few cases where outcastes in Madras have enough votes to make them important in the eyes of party organisers, and are, in consequence, courted by rival candidates, who may indeed despise them, but cannot do without their support. What is wanted now is to increase the number of such cases until the ground is fairly covered, and this could be done with little difficulty if the depressed classes were given voting power in proportion to their numbers rather than to their property. Of late they have been showing signs of the possession of organising ability, and it is reasonably certain that, if they have votes to offer, they will be able to use them with effect; what Parliament can do is to see that they are given votes. Once they are brought inside the Constitution, the temptation to violent action, now undoubtedly strong and increasing, will become weaker and weaker as time goes on, the classes concerned will have a remedy in their own hands, and will have, at any rate, the chance of developing into useful citizens. So long as they are left outside, the risk of disorder must remain.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Tuesday Morning.

Proportional Representation.

The Liberals go monotonously from one mistake to another. Last week they presented to the Government what was practically an ultimatum on the subject, of all ridiculously unimportant things, of Proportional Representation. The Government, being challenged on so silly an issue, took the obvious course: they ignored the threat of the Liberals, instructed their followers to vote according to their own particular ideas, and so helped to defeat Mr. Rendall's Bill.

Now, there are people who profess to understand what Proportional Representation exactly means, but I incline to believe that Mr. John Humphreys alone in this country really understands it. Most people confuse it with the Alternative Vote—a very different thing, which has much that P.R. has not to recommend it. It is easier, however, to grasp what P.R. would effect than how it actually works. It would involve for ever the disappearance of the two-party system; it would so enlarge the size of the constituencies as to reduce seriously the personal relationship between member and the represented; and it would inevitably increase the power of the caucus, which is a bad enough curse already.

But it is safer to base one's objections to the measure on general grounds. The representation of the people is not, and never can in the ultimate result be, an affair of mathematics, but one rather of spirit. An enormous amount of juggling with electoral machinery may, it is true, secure a theoretically perfect mirror of popular wishes, but what if the mouse of government be not, after all this labour, born? This country will take very slowly to Continental conceptions of democracy: what it wants is more good government than mathematical justice to minorities. And there is the further psychological factor. These new-fangled methods do not appeal to the Englishman's sporting instincts. He wants to know exactly what happens to his vote—how the fellow he personally backed got on. So that one rather suspects the apostles of progress who say that the adoption of P.R. in Great Britain is only a question of time.

The Royal Academy.

The Exhibition this year at Burlington House is, I think, a dull show. It contains a considerable number of really bad pictures, and, of course, a still greater number of moderate ones. No two critics are agreed on what is the most stimulating picture of the whole, so that I may as well utter my discordant note in asserting that it is in front of Mr. Glyn Philpot's "The Resting Acrobats" that one can stand longest in admiration. This is one of the very few oil-paintings with a human and hodiernal appeal: there is stuff in it as well as on it.

Of the portraits, Sir William Orpen's of Viscount Milner impresses one deeply—a beautiful, profound study. Other emotions are stirred by the Sargent portrait of Sir Philip Sassoon. Here the artist seems to paint all sides of his subject at once: he conceals nothing, neither the good nor the less highly esteemed.

The ordinary visitor will probably find as much entertainment in the etchings and the sculpture as anywhere else. Here one can get away for a while from the eternal silks and the medals and the sheep and the flowers. There is more joy in some of the sculptured children's heads and in the smallest picture in the Exhibition, "A Cotswold Barn," than in many of the biggest canvases. The difference between, say, Mr. Charles Sims and Mr. Leonard Squirrell is as wide as that between Mr. William Watson and Mr. de la Mare.

Ireland.

The past week has been brightened—and Heaven knows we needed it, for the weather has been too execrable for words in a weekly journal—in quite the old pre-War style, by angry words between Lord Birkenhead and Sir James Craig on the subject of Ulster's boundaries. The cause of the dispute is serious indeed, but the dispute itself between these two veteran "galloping" statesmen is amusing.

Lord Birkenhead, as might be expected from one who at some time or another has upheld most points of view on prominent political questions, advises moderation and a compromise to Ulster; and, as might equally be expected, Ulster rejects with quick scorn its erstwhile champion's advice.

The Free State has the whole weight of the Treaty on its side. Ulster appears to rely on a compact made between Sir James Craig and the late Michael Collins, by which they personally would, in the last resort, determine Ulster's frontiers. Ulster is now too distrustful of Britain's good faith to wish to be permanently bound by the Commission to be set up by the Act of the Treaty. But one foresees scarcely any other solution.

months' run, is to be withdrawn; the Carl Rosa Company at the Scala, and an international company at Covent Garden (they started last night with "The Ring").

The visit of the Germans and Austrians to Covent Garden is causing no end of excitement, especially among those whose judgment of opera is made on pre-War standards, but these things have a way of turning out to be greatly disappointing, and it is better to wait for their actual performance than to indulge in premature and perhaps unjustified welcome. The Carl Rosa is sure to go on its steady and mediocre path. But the B.N.O.C. is likely to be either the success or the failure of the season. It is down to do, among other things, Vaughan Williams' "Hugh the Drover," and some Russian operas, such as "Le Coq d'Or" and Borodine's "Prince Igor," and to have Nigel Playfair staging Mozart.

The Budget.

The Budget is rather stale beer now, but it would be wrong not to record the favourable impression that it created. The opposition that has been shown to it in the House has been a little half-hearted, and the country generally felt that if only a Conservative Government had done the things that Mr. Snowden proposes to do, it would be a very good Budget indeed. That it is an electioneering Budget is an obvious and not damaging remark, for the working-classes are not the only ones who benefit under its provisions.

Sir Robert Horne in the House had little serious criticism to make, except on the ground of the McKenna Duties and the attitude of the Government towards Imperial Preference. Such criticism was inevitable, and from the point of view of the Conservative Party perfectly justified, but there does not appear to be much doubt that the first Labour Budget will, in all its essentials, at any rate, get through without being cut up.

But it is very bad luck for the Dominions and for those firms who have really been able to carry on through the imposition of the McKenna Duties alone. What such manufacturers have to fear, however, is not, as is commonly thought, rivalry from America, but from the Continent. And it is supposed that they will not let drop without a struggle the making of such things as cheap cars and so on, but rather that they will now be stimulated to still greater efforts. Alter Ego.

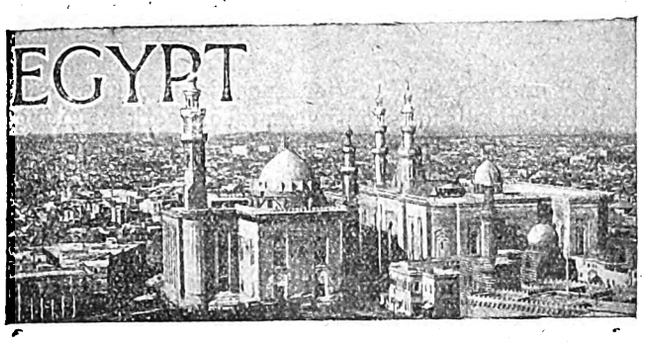
The Near and Middle East.*

From Our Own Correspondents.



Cairo, April 20.

The Murder of Corporal Ryan.

Eleven and a-half months completely free from political crimes had been long enough to make most people hope and think that the period of street shootings and bomb throwing had been definitely finished. The last political outrage was on May 5, 1923. It was generally thought that with the passing of Martial Law there went the main incentive to political crime. But, although at the time of writing the political character of the murder of Corporal Ryan, R.A.F., on Friday evening, is not quite definitely established, there is very strong ground for suspecting a political motive. If, finally, it is proved that the murderers were actuated by political considerations, the Egyptian Government will probably begin as searching and earnest a hunt for the organisation behind the men who have done the actual killing as, recently, has been displayed in the chase of Communists. The Egyptian Parquet, which has never before had the exclusive handling of a case of attack on a British subject, is on its mettle, and may be trusted to leave no stone unturned. The Government, too, has every interest in running down the murder organisation, if it exists, for a campaign of violence is as likely to be directed against the members of the present Government as against British soldiers or airmen. On the day King Fuad inaugurated Parliament Cairo was subjected to a shower of seditious circulars, some sent through the post, some pasted on walls, warning the members of the Zaghloulist Ministry that, if they did not do their duty, "our weapons are still bright, our bullets are ready." It should not be forgotten that the British Government's act of amnesty towards military court prisoners, although, no doubt, an inevitable piece of clemency, loosed into the country scores of desperate criminals who had proved in the past that they did not stick at murder.

Towards Negotiations.

It was singular and most unfortunate that Friday night's murder should have been almost coincident with the beginning of conversations regarding the coming negotiations between Great Britain and Egypt. Hitherto there has been much talk of the desirability of the representatives of the two countries getting round a conference table as soon as possible, but nothing has been done towards that end beyond mutual efforts to create a favourable atmosphere. Yesterday morning, however, Mr. Clark Kerr, Counsellor at the Residency, went down to Mesgid Wassif, Zaghloul Pasha's country house, where the Premier is spending a fortnight's rest from administrative cares, and remained all day discussing with the Egyptian leader the preliminaries to negotiations.

Administrative Innovations.

Zaghloul Pasha's long stay in the country just at the present time, when there is so much requiring his attention in Cairo, has given rise to all sorts of rumours regarding Ministerial difficulties and differences of opinion, but, so far as can be discovered, the motive of the Premier's retreat to his farms lies, as the official explanation maintains, in his desire to have a complete rest and change before the very strenuous few months immediately ahead. There is no denying that his absence has a paralysing effect on the Government machinery, for he has made himself so much the hands as well as the head of his party that, without him, practically no important decision can be taken. On the other hand, the administrative problems demanding, and being denied, attention now are as nothing to the political tangles which will have to be tackled very soon. Quite apart from the forthcoming negotiations with the British Government, which, in themselves are no doubt a quite sufficient preoccupation, there will have to come in the near future a serious debate in the Chamber of Deputies on the Government's policy. Up to the present the two houses have fully occupied themselves in discussing matters of relatively small importance, and the Cabinet have been able to leave the deputies to amuse themselves, with no fear of awkward debates or divisions. But, now that negotiations are in the air, a full-dress policy debate is inevitable. And, despite his apparently overwhelming majority, Zaghloul Pasha is not in a position to feel absolutely certain of the temper of the House when once it gets on to the subject of the Sudan.

What has been most interesting in the recent past has been the Government's failure to bring about a number of administrative innovations known to have been in the Ministry programme. First of all there was the question of Parliamentary Under-Secretaries of State on the British principle, on which the Government, to judge by the articles in the Press which supports it, had set its heart, but which now, because of powerful opposition to the idea, on grounds of economy, has fallen through, while the Government Press declares that the proposal never had official support.

Copts as Mudirs.

Equally novel, and still more interesting, was the Premier's intention to appoint Sinnot Bey Hanna, a member of one of the largest and wealthiest Coptic families of Assiut, as mudir of his native province. There has never yet been a Coptic mudir, and, until lately, it was taken for granted that there never would be one. The eligibility of Copts for such appointment is not a new subject for discussion. Sir Eldon Gorst dealt with it in the last of his reports from Egypt, and arrived at the conclusion that, for various reasons, Copts would not make good mudirs or sub-mudirs. But there have been many changes since Sir Eldon Gorst's time, and not least in the position and power of the Copts. One of the most recent innovations has been the presence of two Copts in the Cabinet, a thing never known until Zaghloul Pasha took office. The Copts to-day are more powerful than ever before. So why not a Coptic mudir? But there are still many people in this country, it seems, holding the views of Sir Eldon Gorst, and the proposed appointment has had to be dropped, at least for the time being.

The Labour Movement.

Another disappointed aspirant to political honours is Aly Bey Shamsy, generally regarded as one of the rising young men in the Zaghloulist ranks, but whose previous association with the ex-Khedive, both before and during the War, has been a sufficient bar to keep him out of a position in the Cabinet in the first place, and out of even an Under-Secretaryship ever since. Now Aly Bey, assisted by a number of other comparatively young Zaghloulist deputies, is devoting his energies to organising the Cairo workmen into a Labour Party, whose most remarkable feature, if it comes into existence, will be the fact that none of its leaders has any connection with or knowledge of Labour, almost all being men of wealth. So far as can be gathered, this movement towards a local Labour Party is purely political, aimed, not so much at serving the interests of the working men as at getting them, properly organised and disciplined, into shape as a unit of the Zaghloulist forces.

The World Flight.

Squadron-Leader Maclaren and his companions have come and gone almost before we had time to realise that he was here. None the less the Arabic Press has given him and his effort a gratifying amount of space and an obvious realisation of the gallantry needed to undertake such a journey. What most forcibly impressed those of us who met Maclaren while he was here was his exceeding modesty.

Cairo, April 27.

The Prime Minister's Return.

Zaghloul Pasha arrived back in Cairo on Thursday afternoon, after over three weeks spent on his country estates at Mesgid Wassif, taking an almost complete rest from administrative cares, if not altogether from politics. For it is inevitable that the Premier must, in his country retirement, have been completing his plans for the approaching negotiations in London, to which he knew an invitation would be forthcoming before long. Now that it has come, and has named the end of June as a time suitable for an Egyptian delegation to reach London, the Premier and his associates will have first to dispose of the mass of work awaiting attention here in Egypt. The first and most urgent administrative need is to get the Budget through Parliament. Normally the Budget should be approved by March 25, and come into force on April 1. A clause of the Constitution enables the King, by decree, to continue the previous year's Budget in force if, for any reason, it has been impossible to get the new Budget through Parliament by April 1 of any year. That has been done this year, and now, more than a month after March 25, the Budget has not yet even been introduced. It has, however, been approved by the Council of Ministers, and there is some prospect of its being submitted to the Chamber of Deputies at a fairly early date. It has been stated that the Chamber, unaccustomed as it is to such work, will need at least a month to dispose of the Budget, which will also take up about a month of the Senate's time, two months in all, which would bring the earliest date at which it could be passed finally as about July 1. But the Egyptian delegation should be in London by the end of June, and the Premier has no wish to have Parliament sitting on here in his absence. So some sort of speeding up of the machinery of Parliament will have to be devised. In addition to the Budget, the programme for the next few sessions comprises several other important items, including the debating all the legislation enacted since 1914, and without some form of acceleration the deputies will certainly be quite unable to get through all the tasks facing them in the very limited time left between now and the end of June, or even, at a stretch, the middle of July.

Party Organisation.

Speeding up of Parliamentary work there obviously must be, but how is it to be done? To everybody it has been plain for long that there was one very obvious method of hastening the labours of the Chamber of Deputies, but that, since it would involve sacrificing one of the dearest slogans of the Zaghloulists, has not hitherto been favoured. Making his first important speech after his return to Egypt last autumn, the present Premier declared, "They call us a political party; we are not a party, we are the nation." This theory has been sustained in the Chamber. The result, though it might be consistent with the national as opposed to the partisan conception of Zaghloulism, has had great disadvantages. Without any party organisation, without whips, leaders, or any of the features of Parliamentary party life, in their zeal to earn the salaries of £E500 a year and free railway passes, which they have just voted themselves, and in their anxiety for their names to figure in the newspapers, the deputies, even some of the best and most faithful of Zaghloulists amongst them, have bombarded the Ministers with question after question, some most difficult, some impossible to answer. Furthermore, although in some divisions, such as that which resulted in the unseating of Mohammed Pasha Mahmoud last Saturday night, the Government has shown clearly enough in which way it wanted its supporters to vote, there have been not a few deputies who have strayed from the Zaghloulist fold into temporary opposition. This wandering was most marked in the division referred to when, in a house with a nominal Opposition of a dozen or fifteen, thirty-eight deputies voted against the Government, and, had the voting been by ballot instead of by show of hands, the Opposition might well have been doubled. These considerations have decided the Wafd that it is time to throw overboard the old war-cry about not being a party but the country itself, and to organise along accepted Parliamentary lines. Furthermore, the voting regarding the Mohammed Pasha Mahmoud protest has been taken as a test of fidelity to the Zaghloulist creed, and all those who raised their hands in favour of the Liberal Constitutional leader have been driven out of the fold. This was shown at a dinner party given last night by Hamad Pasha el Bassel, Vice-President of the Wafd, to which were invited all the deputies—including two hitherto supposed to be Liberal Constitutionals—who had voted for the unseating of Mohammed Pasha Mahmoud, while the guests did not include a single one of the five and twenty odd hitherto supposed to be unimpeachable Zaghloulists who had on this occasion gone over to the other side. After dinner there were discussions, the exact nature of which has not yet been made known, but which, it is understood, resulted in agreement on forming a party in Parliament and deferring until later the appointment of the necessary officials. So the die has been cast, and the Chamber, which, according to Zaghloulist estimates of a few weeks back, contained not more than three genuine opponents (and this was the number who voted against the Government after the Premer's speech, just before his departure for the country, in which he outlined his policy), now, by the calculations of the same authority, has no less than thirty-eight. This, on the face of it, is scarcely a Zaghloulist advance, but, in practice, the Zaghloulists will probably be found to have been well advised to shed the thirty or so of their less faithful followers. The party has rid itself, not, as has been stated it intended to do, of its extreme Left, but of its extreme Right.

The Heliopolis Murder.

The inquiry into the murder of Corporal Ryan, R.A.F., at Heliopolis a week ago, although it seems to have established clearly enough that the motives of the crime were political, has not brought to light any signs of an organisation behind the actual murderers. There has been a good deal of malicious hinting in the Zaghloulist papers about the Nationalist Party's propaganda being responsible for the youths who are alleged to have committed the murder being drawn into political crime, and one of the accused has stated in his confession that he is a supporter of that party, but, so far as can be gathered, nothing else has been brought to light which justifies the scarcely veiled accusations referred to.

Cairo's New Fire-Fighter.

One of the organisations of which Cairo can justly be proud is its fire brigade. Splendidly equipped with the finest British engines and appliances, the brigade, under its British chief, is by general consent one of the best disciplined and most efficient bodies of men in the country. Fire fighting in the crowded native quarters of Cairo is no easy job and no very safe one either, for in these congested areas demolition is frequently the only way to stop a fire spreading, and although the houses are often so rickety that a jet from a hose working at 120 lbs. to the square inch pressure suffices to bring the walls crashing down, more violent methods are often necessary, and then the firemen have to be very lively if some of what they bring down is not to come tumbling on their own heads. Now the brigade is to have another arm—a fire-float, for which the commandant has been agitating for years as absolutely essential for dealing with conflagrations in some of the congested riverside districts. At last his prayer has been answered, and a float, equipped with all the latest devices, is now being mounted in the Cairo arsenal.

Egypt's Waifs.

Of interest as a sidelight on the changing conditions in this country is the transfer effected last week of the Waifs' Industrial and Training Home from British to Egyptian control. The Home was founded three years ago by local adherents of the Brotherhood movement, and has since been supported mainly by British efforts and British money. Recently, in order to remove any suspicion of proselytising—there never was anything of the sort, and the Brotherhood movement is not a religious movement in the ordinary acceptance of the word—the Brotherhood connection was dropped. There has of late been an increase in the support received from Egyptians, and now, so many British members of the original committee having left or being about to leave the country, a new committee, preponderantly Egyptian, has taken charge. There have been and are Egyptian-run homes with similar aims, but none of them has achieved any real success. It will be interesting to see what will be the result of turning over to local management a real, live, going concern like the Waifs' Home.

The Parliamentary Recess.

The first round of the contest between the Government and the Assembly has finished to the advantage of the Government, which has got rid of the Assembly for six solid months—and much can happen in six months. From a purely journalistic point of view, one will regret the absence of the frequent slanging matches in which the rivals periodically indulged, and which were generally so useful in revealing, sometimes prematurely, the intentions and the motives prompting the intentions of one or the other side. On the other hand, the vacation of the Assembly appears, on balancing up the pros and cons, likely to be advantageous to the country. In the first place, the deputies, and especially those who have been most vociferous during the late session, will have a chance of going to their constituencies and finding out what the electors think about them and their doings. To judge by the remarks of the Constantinople papers, there is a pretty kettle of fish stewing for the representatives of the ex-capital, and it would not be surprising if the provincials also had something to say to their deputies.

The most important, and probably the most beneficial, result of the parliamentary recess will be that now at last the Cabinet, through the executive authorities, will have a chance of doing a job of work without being hampered by the clamour of three hundred impatient reformers with a passion for legislation. The past eight months have been occupied in making earthquaking changes in high theoretical politics; the Republic has been proclaimed, the organic statute has been composed and approved, the Khalifate has been abolished, and the Imperial family turned out neck and crop.

New and Old Turkey.

But the question remains: Will the Cabinet devote itself during its breathing space to the pressing problems of internal administration and seriously set itself to the task of governing the country in efficient and civilised manner, more or less consonant with its profession of modernism and advanced Westernism? For the past eight months, while the professional politicians, imprisoned in Angora, have been deluding themselves that by Acts of Parliament they have been creating a new Turkey, the old Turkey outside Angora has been doing nothing but growing older and feebler; the Administration is less efficient, owing to ceaseless changes of personnel, and more hopelessly tangled in red tape, owing to hastily drafted and incomprehensible legislation, and to well-meant but ill-devised attempts at checking abuses; the courts of law have not improved in the least—in fact, the reductions in that department have seriously affected the level of its efficiency and probity; the attempts at reviving agriculture have been a failure, except in the western portion of Asia Minor, and visitors to Anatolia report that the country resembles a wasted desert almost as closely as it did eighteen months ago; the settlement of the Moslem immigrants from Greece does not go forward, the great majority of them languish in misery a few kilometres away from the port of disembarkation, if indeed they are not still camped out in close proximity to the quayside where they stepped on shore months ago; the State finances are still a paltry comedy, and it appears to the observer that every chance of destroying the State's credit abroad has been utilised; the only two great ports that Nature has provided are rapidly declining in every branch of commerce, and so on ad infinitum.

This catalogue of the evils is not intended as a hostile demonstration by an ignorant and prejudiced foreigner, but as a digest of what nine-tenths of intelligent Turks are saying and writing about the state of affairs. The Turk attributes the trouble either to the Cabinet, or to the Assembly, or to the veiled hostility of foreign Powers, according to his political predilections, but he does not attempt to deny the facts. During the next six months the Cabinet will have an opportunity of showing its friends whether it is right in the contention that the Executive, unhampered by the presence of the Assembly, is capable of grappling with the crying evils and taking some effective steps towards bettering matters. If they cannot, après eux le déluge, sooner or later.

The Mosul Vilayet.

Now that the ratification of the Treaty of Lausanne by Great Britain is an accomplished fact, the next move in the game is the conference to settle the fate of the Mosul Vilayet. The British delegate, Sir Percy Cox, has long been chosen, but one had to wait until the other day to learn on whom the Turkish choice was to fall. The nomination of the President of the Assembly, Fethi Bey, to the post of chief delegate has produced some queer comments and not a little surprise, as many people thought that Ismet Pasha himself would act. The gesture of Ismet in choosing Fethi has been widely interpreted as a sign of hostility towards Fethi; rightly or wrongly, many consider Fethi useless and incapable, and Ismet is supposed to share this view. Why he should entrust him with this responsible and delicate task is therefore incomprehensible to many persons except on the assumption that he expects the Conference to be the grave of the reputation of the Turkish representative, and chooses this as the most convenient method of interment.

The British Colony.

In Constantinople the life of the foreign residents, and of the British colony in particular, is comparatively uneventful, and for those who have business interests in the country much too uneventful. The social life of the colony is, however, returning to normal, now that everyone has adjusted himself to the absence of the troops, who played such a preponderating part in the social life during their stay. A new British tennis club, which promises to be a flourishing affair, has just begun with three excellent courts and the prospect of a fourth, all in the centre of Pera, near Taxim. The golf course still claims its staunch band of enthusiasts, notwithstanding the warm weather which has come with a rush. Last week, too, we had an excellent couple of performances of A. A. Milne's comedy "Belinda," by an amateur cast, in aid of the British Relief Society, a charitable organisation which has been doing excellent work in relieving distress among our countrymen in the Near East since early in the seventeenth century under one form or another. Notwithstanding the financial crisis and stagnant trade, the large hall of the Union Française was filled with an audience whose chief anxiety, according to the Consul-General's announcement, was to pay the top price for their seats whether they got front seats or not. This unusual idiosyncrasy and a roaring sale of programmes has resulted in a handsome profit for the benefit of the Relief Society.

The Dry Régime.

Another feature which is causing us to look at the approaching summer with a less jaundiced eye is the partial lifting of the ridiculous pretence of the "Dry Régime." Since the first month after its application the regulation has been practically a dead letter, for there is hardly a hotel or place of refreshment at which alcoholic liquor could not be obtained as long as you were prepared to submit to the humiliation of drinking from a tea or coffee cup, according to the drink of your choice. Now the ban has theoretically been lifted; beer is obtainable in unlimited quantities, but the sale of wines and spirits is still technically illegal until the police and the prefect have finished wrangling as to the exact procedure to be followed in removing the ban. One of the ironies of the whole of the Prohibition comedy consists in the fact that some genius, a Turk, discovered the other day that we might have gone on calmly trafficking in wine throughout the dry period, because the law was so defectively drafted that it mentions only beer and liqueurs, and omits to prohibit wines; that loophole, plus the other one previously discovered, namely, that any quantity less than an oke did not fall within the scope of the measure, might have proved a blessed relief to the most exacting winebibber—if one had only known about it in time.

The Government and Arab Accuracy.

Reference was recently made in this column to the Jaffa incident of a few weeks ago, when, as the result of seemingly indiscriminate use of firearms, some Jews and Arabs were shot; and it was also told how, in "official, representative" Arab quarters (i.e., the Executive of the Arab Congress), the incident provoked the idea that there must be at large an armed, organised, secret Jewish society ready and avid to take the law into its own hands on the slightest excuse; while the strenuous activity of the Palestine police in arresting several Arabs on suspicion, and its slackness in not rounding up a similar quota of Jews, proved with how great an anti-Arab bias the Government functioned. And all this was embodied in a long written protest sent in by Musa Kazem Pasha el-Husseine, President of the Arab Executive, to the High Commissioner, and published simultaneously in the Arab Press. It was an ex parte caricature of the episode, of the most nonsensical kind, but perhaps not much more distorted than is usual here when any party feels itself moved to write an account of its grievance. What was, however, most unusual was the answer returned a few days ago to this grievance by the Chief Secretary. One had become so accustomed to the regulation type of official reply in such cases—one of laborious and defensive explanation couched in a tone of abject politeness—that it came as a shock to read the Government's curt reply (which the Government promptly published broadcast); in place of gentle remonstrance or polite correction came a brusque snub—that the letter addressed to the High Commissioner was "so full of glaring inaccuracies and gross misrepresentations of fact as to render any detailed reply unnecessary," and that, "before addressing such letters to the Government in the future, it would be as well to satisfy yourself by inquiry from the appropriate quarters of the accuracy of the statements which you propose to make therein."

In its way, this letter is epoch-making in the history of the relations between the Administration and the professional malcontents; its implications are many and obvious.

Easter in Palestine.

To-morrow is the Easter of the Eastern Churches, and to-day is the last day of the Jewish Passover week. In other words, we are now passing through the moments in the year which, for the last century, at least, have always proved the most trying for those responsible for public order. But everything is most exemplarily peaceful, and nothing untoward is anticipated. The Moslem feast of Nebi Musa (which, since the Easter of 1920, has been looked upon fearfully as the chief ingredient of trouble during the critical days) is this year postponed. Since its establishment as a make-weight against Jewish and Christian festivities, it has been timed to coincide with the Holy Week of the Eastern Churches; but this year the feast would have fallen in the middle of Ramadan, and so has had to be put back a month. Most unadvisedly certain Jerusalem Jews in high places had conceived the notion of having a patriotic "educational" procession winding from end to end of Jerusalem; but this was promptly vetoed by the Governor—and, curiously, for once nobody has found fault with him for so doing.

Jewish Pilgrims for Passover.

A notable feature of the Jewish Passover this year has been the influx of Jews from abroad to celebrate the feast. It has introduced a new type of Jew to the present conditions in Palestine, and raised mild hopes in Zionist circles. Speaking generally, Zionism has hitherto attracted to Palestine three types; the "organiser" sent and supported by some large European or American Zionist organisation; the professional man—journalist, author, medical man, or educationist of higher or lower degree; and the skilled or, more frequently, unskilled "labourer." But there have been comparatively few of the middle-class tradesman, the skilled artisan with small capital, and the "one-man business" type—just those who are, conventionally, regarded as the economic backbone of a State, a self-supporting element, and not likely soon to fall back on the support of Zionist funds. Most of the Jewish "pilgrims" who have been keeping Passover this year in Jerusalem are of this new type, and it is said that many of them have decided to throw in their lot with the Jewish Palestine and to transfer here their small business and capital from the towns of Poland.

There is not much doubt that Zionism would be the better for such an influx of independent elements. The Palestine Immigration and Travel Department has begun to publish figures of emigrants from, as well as immigrants into, Palestine. These figures show most plainly that, with present economic limitations and present Zionist methods, Palestine has all but reached "saturation point." Two thousand permits are, it is true, to be granted to more Jewish immigrants in the coming few months on the strength of the call for labour by the new and extensive tobacco-growing activities; yet it is notorious that an indefinite but very considerable number of Jews are only too ready to emigrate at the first opportunity. The official returns for the last two months ending March 31 show that there were 836 immigrants (including 76 non-Jews) and 716 emigrants (including 105 non-Jews). Of the 716 who left the country during these two months, no less than 529 were drawn from recent immigrants.

A PILGRIMAGE TO PALESTINE.

The Bishop of London, who is out of town, delegated to the Bishop of Willesden the duty of blessing the Anglo-Catholic Pilgrims to the Holy Land at All Saints' Church, Margaret Street, on April 28. The pilgrims left London the following day and hoped to reach the Holy Land on Wednesday, May 7. The Bishop of Nassau is conducting the pilgrimage, assisted by the Rev. G. Napier Whittingham and the Rev. Maurice Child. Those taking part will present a silver repossé panel of St. George slaying the Dragon to the Church of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem. On the day of their arrival the pilgrims will be welcomed by the Bishop in Jerusalem on the Mount of Olives. The following day the Orthodox Patriarch will receive the pilgrims and present each of them with a souvenir. Later they will be conducted round the Church of the Holy Sepulchre by Greek Clergy. Bethlehem, Nazareth, Jericho, the Jordan, and the Dead Sea will all be visited, and the Via Dolorosa will be traversed by the pilgrims.

THE KING AND QUEEN OF ROUMANIA.

In view of the visit to London of the King and Queen of Roumania next Monday, it may be of interest to give a few biographical details of the respective careers of their Majesties. This is the first time that King Ferdinand and Queen Marie have paid a State visit to England.

King Ferdinand was born at Sigmaringen on August 24, 1865, being the second son of Prince Leopold of Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen and the Infanta Antonia of Portugal. He came to Roumania in 1889, and, as heir of his uncle, King Carol I. of Roumania, who had no son, became Crown Prince of Roumania. On King Carol's death, he became King of Roumania, on October 11, 1914. His aim had always been the realisation of the national ideals of the country, and to it he held closely, even in the darkest hours of the fight against the Central Powers. On October 15, 1922, he was at Alba Julia crowned King of all the Roumanians.

His reign will be remembered as a remarkable epoch, chiefly because during it Roumanian national unity was established, and because, largely owing to his efforts, a revolution in the agrarian organisation of the country has been accomplished, the large estates having been split up and placed in the hands of the peasants.

Queen Marie was born on October 29, 1875, at Eastwell Park, Kent. She is the daughter of the late Duke of Edinburgh and Coburg, second son of Queen Victoria, and of the Grand Duchess Marie, only daughter of Emperor Alexander of Russia. At the age of seventeen she married Prince Ferdinand, Crown Prince of Roumania, by whom she has had six children—Prince Carol, Princess Elizabeth (who married ex-King George of Greece), Princess Marie (who married the King of Yugoslavia), Prince Nicolas, Princess Ileana, and Prince Mircea (who died during the War). Her artistic and literary qualities are well known, but what assured her the love of her people was her attitude during the War, in which she did much service in the hospitals. The titles of some of her books include "Ilderim," "The Lily of Life," "My Country," and "Steelers of Light."

Last Friday, at the Dorien Leigh Gallery, Millais House, Cromwell Road, the Exhibition of Roumanian Arts and Crafts was opened by the Roumanian Minister, M. Titulesco. In his speech M. Titulesco referred to the misfortune that attended the opening of the Exhibition, for the ship containing some rare and beautiful samples of Roumanian art had failed to arrive, and it was mainly owing to the energy of the promoters of the Exhibition and the kindness of ladies in loaning their collections, and particularly to Mrs. Asquith, Baroness d'Erlanger, Mrs. Locke, Mme. Jonesco, Mrs. Bateman, Mrs. Bram Stoker, Mme. Beza, and Mme. Titulesco, that the present Exhibition had been so quickly arranged.

The Exhibition, even as it stands in its incomplete state, contains some interesting and lovely things. Mr. Hoppé's fifty pictures have been taken with all this well-known photographist's skill; many of them, indeed, are artistic triumphs. The work of many districts in Roumania, done by people as far apart as the inhabitants of Bessarabia in the north and those (Vlachs) of Macedonia in the south, is shown. There are exquisitely coloured socks and carpets; there are pottery and leather work, Roumanian literature, and ladies' wear.

During the Exhibition lectures and music recitals, of which particulars have been given already in The Near East, will be given at Millais House.

THE MARRIAGE OF MLLE. HELENE STANCIOFF.

The marriage of Mademoiselle Hélène Stancioff, youngest daughter of the Bulgarian Minister in London and Madame Stancioff, to M. Félix Guépin, son of Commander Guépin, of the Dutch Navy, was celebrated at the Brompton Oratory, London, on April 30. The bride, who was given away by her father, wore a dress of soft white satin, made in Venetian style, with a long, full skirt, the bodice being trimmed with old needle-point lace. She carried a sheaf of white lilac. Miss Rosalyn FitzJames and Prince George Galitzine were trainbearers to the bride, and her other attendants were Miss Aldonce Guépin with Master Paul Howell and Miss Emilia Gantche with Prince Dimitri Galitzine. Father Ross officiated, and the best man was M. Anthony Guépin.

The very large attendance at the Oratory testified to the esteem and popularity that the Bulgarian Minister and his family have won during their four years in London. After the service a reception was held at the Bulgarian Legation, 51, Queen's Gate, and among those who were present were Madame Stancioff, Mlle. Féodora Stancioff, Sir Alexander Kay Muir and Lady Muir (née Mlle. Nadejda Stancioff), M. Ivan Stancioff, Commander and Mme. Guépin, M. and Mme. C. H. Guépin, Comte de Grenaud, the Princess Galitzine, the members of the Diplomatic Corps, Mr. Noel Buxton, Mrs. Stanley Baldwin, Lady and Miss Hanbury-Williams, Sir Vincent Caillard, Sir Harry and Miss Lamb, Sir John and Lady Pretyman-Newman, Lady Swathling, Lady (Ian) Hamilton, Mrs. Philip Snowden, the Hon. Mrs. Ewan Montagu, the Hon. Mrs. Fitzroy Stanhope, the Hon. Hugh and Mrs. Godley, Lady and Miss Mullens, Lady Barker, Sir Edward and Lady Boyle, the Dowager Lady Boyle, Lady O'Conor, and Mr. Harry and Lady Ada Boyd.

Early in the afternoon M. and Mme. Félix Guépin left for the Pyrenees, where the honeymoon will be spent.

TO QUETTA BY MOTOR.

Major F. A. C. Forbes-Leith left London on April 30 on his enterprise to drive in a motor-car all the way to Quetta, except for the short crossing from Folkestone and the sea voyage from Salonika to Alexandretta. The contemplated route is Dover, Lyons, Genoa, Fiume, Belgrade, Salonika, Alexandretta, Aleppo, Baghdad, Teheran, Meshed, Quetta.

It is anticipated that the journey of five thousand miles will be completed in about a hundred days. The car is a 14-h.p. Colonial Model Wolseley touring one, and the only spares carried will be the standard set that would cover a trip to Brighton. New tyres will be picked up at Baghdad, and it is expected that the 400 mile fuel capacity tank will give independence of supplies except for one or two dumps along the caravan route.

THE ROUMANIAN ROYAL VISIT.

The relationship that links the British and Roumanian Courts assures King Ferdinand and Queen Marie a warm welcome in Great Britain, and in ordinary circumstances it would be unnecessary to look for any political significance in their approaching visit, especially as it will be the first time that King Ferdinand, who ascended the Roumanian Throne early in the War, has been able to come to London. The visit, however, forms part of a tour of the chief Allied capitals, and takes place at a time when the trend of their foreign policy is vested with considerable importance for Roumanians. It is a tribute to the close identification of the King and Queen with everything that promotes the well-being of the country and serves its interests, whether at home or abroad, that the Royal tour should be followed so closely in Roumania, and that the Government itself should be at no pains to disguise its own expectancy. The departure of the King and Queen was marked by the adjournment of Parliament and the placing of the country into a form of political cold storage, in order that no differences of opinion at home should mar the harmony of the tour. M. Duca, Minister of Foreign Affairs, is in attendance on King Ferdinand, and has already paid a preliminary visit to London with a view to preparing the ground for negotiations during his Majesty's stay. As was the case in France, the presence of the King and Queen is intended to do no more than to provide the most favourable setting for these negotiations, which will, of course, be influenced by the dictates of policy rather than of sentiment. It is well, however, that the political authorities and the business community of Great Britain should be reminded of the predisposition of the Roumanians as a people to close relations with the British. The English origin of Queen Marie, whose popularity is unlimited, is not forgotten, and, although Roumania has been brought actually into closer touch with France through French culture, and with Germany through German business dealings, she knows enough of Great Britain to realise that, to say the least, British characteristics and British methods suffer in no way from comparison with those of any other country.

Occasionally, however, qualities which are most approved of in theory are found to have disadvantages in practice. Most of the smaller nations of Europe have reason to regret that the disinterestedness so often associated with British policy does not figure in that of other countries; but they prefer that disinterestedness should stop short of complete detachment from their affairs. The Balkan States, in particular, would appreciate a policy that enabled them to turn to Great Britain for guidance and help with more certainty of meeting with the practical response of which they stand in need, and it is with some such subconscious thought that Roumania sets special store on the advocacy of her King and Queen in her present dealings with the British Government. There is no secret as to her wants. She is uneasy in regard to her national security owing to the uncertain atttitude of Soviet Russia towards the Roumanian annexation of Bessarabia, and requires money for her army. Because French policy has been more active in the Near East than that of any other Power, the Roumanian Government turned first to France, hoping that all it needed would result from the visit of the King and Queen to Paris. The event has proved that French demands are too high, and the attempt will now be made to interest Great Britain in Roumania's requirements. Here, accordingly, is an opportunity of serving the wider interests of the British people. France is anxious to make Roumania subservient to her European policy, which aims at perpetuating the German system of dividing the nations into two categories—the dominating and the dominated. To prevent Germany from dominating France, the latter has to dominate Germany, and as she despairs of Great Britain's lending herself to this policy, she is seeking substitutes among the smaller nations of Europe. Such a policy can be supported by argument, but Great Britain is convinced there is a better and a surer way of maintaining the peace of the world. She has little chance, however, of winning France to her view, unless the French find that they can gain no support for their policy of domination. So far they have gained to their side Poland and Czecho-Slovakia, and they would now like to make sure of Roumania and Yugoslavia. There is no reason why Great Britain should not engage in friendly rivalry with France in urging the superiority of her policy in the cause of peace. A helping hand to the Roumanians now would save them from the danger of having to give way to France's demands. Roumania's need is pressing, and if she cannot meet it, except at the cost of subordinating herself to France's European policy, she may have to pay even that heavy price.

We should feel more certain of the success of the negotiations in London if the present Roumanian Government had been able to show a more united country supporting the main lines of its policy. The Bratianu Cabinet is given credit for the courage with which it has forced a definite financial policy on the country and for the good results achieved in some directions; but, while alienating the sympathy of foreign financial interests, it has exposed itself to a measure of criticism at home which lends colour to the belief that it is temperamentally unsympathetic. There is reason to suppose that official views in Bucharest have been modified since M. Vintila Bratianu, Minister for Finance, last visited London, and it is hoped that on the occasion of the visit of the King and Queen, M. Duca will be able to satisfy British financial interests that Roumania is making appreciable progress towards stability as a necessary preliminary to the meeting of all her obligations. In regard to Bessarabia, the Roumanian Government will not expect Great Britain to pick chestnuts out of the fire for her; but the Roumanian annexation of the province has been formally recognised by the British Government and the British interests require that there should be no disturbance of the peace in Europe. An exchange of views on the subject between the Roumanian Foreign Minister and the British Foreign Secretary will give the former an opportunity to explain the failure of the negotiations with the Russian Soviet in Vienna, and may enable Mr. Ramsay MacDonald to suggest a plan which will settle the Bessarabian question and meet the obvious desire of the Roumanian nation—which the Bratianu Cabinet has not yet been able to do—of living in peaceful relationship with its Russian neighbour.

THE BYRON CENTENARY CELEBRATIONS.

(From Our Athens Correspondent.)

Britain and Greece, the two nations to which Byron belongs, have paid part of their big debt to the poet and the Philhellene.

Not since the Olympic Games of 1906 has Athens been so stirred over any event. The interest shown in the celebrations was enormous. Fully six weeks before the festivities commenced the bookshops in Athens had sold almost every copy of works—whether English, Greek, or French—in connection with Byron's life. Many Athenians whose knowledge of the poet's biography was very limited, after spending many hours at the public libraries in careful perusal of books pertaining to his life, are to-day expert Byronians. The Director of the National Library was telling me that rarely before had anyone asked for a book on Byron.

For a whole week (I write on April 25) Athens has been a mass of British and Greek colours, and even cabs and motor-cars were decorated with small Union Jacks. The newspapers devoted two of their four pages to descriptions of the fêtes, and the leading articles (surely for the first time in the history of Greek journalism) spoke of Byron, and not of politics. Many shop windows in the capital exhibited a portrait of the author of "Childe Harold's Pilgrimage," a film of the poet's life was shown on the screen of the most popular picture house, a new confectionery shop was named after the bard, and even special "Byron" cigarettes were on sale for those who could afford to buy them.

The Byron Centenary Committee are to be warmly congratulated on the excellent and thorough manner in which they performed their exceedingly difficult task. All—but particularly Professor Andreades and M. Kalopothakes—worked like Trojans to ensure success of the festivities and to dissipate any misgiving which the distinguished British guests may have had that they were coming to a country which did not know how to entertain them. With the exception of the moonlight excursion to the Acropolis—which proved to be a complete fiasco, and for which the police authorities, and not the Centenary Committee, were to blame—everything went off like clockwork.

The journey to Missolonghi was made under such pleasant and comfortable conditions that one hardly realised that it was taking place in Greece and by Greek trains and boats. The special trains left and arrived on schedule time, and the boat which conveyed us to Kryoneri, en route for Missolonghi, was scrupulously clean, which, to those acquainted with the condition of Greek coastal steamers during the summer months, would seem a miracle. Like Athens, Missolonghi, too, was en fête. The town's population, which is normally about 10,000, was more than doubled on Saturday, so great was the influx of visitors from the neighbouring towns and villages. All these people had managed to squeeze in either on the heights surrounding the "Heroon," or on the balconies and verandahs of the houses situated in the narrow streets leading from the station to the "Heroon." Thus nearly everyone succeeded in getting a glimpse of the "real Lords," the first their sleepy fishing town had seen since the days of its famous foreigner 100 years ago.

After an extremely interesting but, owing to the intense heat, rather uncomfortable half-hour at the "Heroon," the party were conducted to the "Xenokration," a spacious building used as a girls' school, where luncheon was served. Needless to say, we were delightfully surprised to discover that one of the best Athenian restaurants was catering for us, and that, in addition to the thirty waiters who had travelled from Athens for the occasion, all kinds of delicacies which it would have been utterly impossible to obtain at Missolonghi had been brought all the way from the capital. Afterwards I learned that even the plates and cutlery had come from Athens, which fact gives one a very good idea of the many difficulties with which the Organising Committee had to contend. After all, it would have been far too much to expect the people of poor little Missolonghi to provide the requisites for the gastronomic needs of over 250 visitors.

The journalists—both Greek and foreign—who accompanied the party to Missolonghi as the Government's guests could not refrain from expressing their surprise when they saw a special room all fitted with writing paper, ink, pens, and, in short, everything a journalist might wish for, in the post office building there. The postmaster, a kindly old gentleman who had obviously never before seen his establishment so crowded, at first exhibited signs of nervousness, and did not quite know "whether our telegrams would go via Patras or through Athens." Thanks, however, to the special telegraphists who had been sent to Missolonghi from Athens and Patras, everything worked smoothly, and our telegrams left twice as quickly as they usually do from Athens. Although the post office stock of the new Byron stamps had to be replenished on two occasions, there were enough stamps for everyone.

The unveiling of the stele on the site of Kapsalis's house, where Byron lived and died, was probably the most touching scene of the Missolonghi celebrations. Standing on the very spot where, a hundred years ago, Byron breathed his last, one could not but realise the enormity of his self-sacrifice. It was here, and while the guns were booming the thirty-six years of the poet's life and the band played the British and Greek national anthems, that Miss Lytton and Miss Byron deposited a wreath in memory of their illustrious forefather.

The enthusiasm with which the townspeople along the route of the special train in the Royalist Peloponnesus greeted M. Papanastasiou and the other members of the Republican Government who participated in the Missolonghi ceremonies, was one of the pleasing incidents of the centenary celebrations.

At Patras, to which the Byron celebrants were brought from Missolonghi, the Monarchists, who, but a week ago, had voted against the Republic, turned out in force to welcome their successful opponents, and at a banquet in the Hotel d'Angleterre one of their spokesmen, M. Rallis, son of the late Demetrius Rallis, took advantage of the occasion to promise the Republicans the support of his followers in the interest of peace. Byron, he said, urged the Greeks to unite, and 100 years later the poet's command is being carried out. The British visitors warmly applauded M. Rallis's happy and magnanimous words, and Sir Rennell Rodd congratulated him for his fine spirit.

Wherever the special train stopped on the return journey the townspeople crowded the railway platforms to cheer the Republican Premier and his British guests. In almost every instance they brought flowers, and school children sang the melodious Greek national anthem. The journey was a great personal triumph for M. Papanastasiou, who has a happy faculty of popularising himself by his friendly democratic spirit. He made a deep impression on the British visitors.

DINNER TO THE EGYPTIAN MINISTER.

A dinner of welcome to the Egyptian Minister and Madame Izzet was given on May 2 at the Savoy Hotel by the Near and Middle East Association. Owing to indisposition, Madame Izzet was unfortunately unable to be present. Major-General Lord Edward Gleichen presided over a very large gathering, among those present being :—

Mr. Arthur Ponsonby, M.P., Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, the Dowager Lady Boyle, who received the guests, H.H. the Aga Khan, the Ministers of Poland, Czecho-Slovakia, Bulgaria, Hungary, Persia, and Siam, the First Secretaries of the German, Roumanian, and Afghan Legations, M. and Mme. Sabit Bey and the staff of the Egyptian Legation, Lord Lamington, Lord Headley, Lord Clifford of Chudleigh, General Sir George and Lady Milne, Sir Thomas Arnold, Sir Edward and Lady Boyle, the Hon. Sir Reginald and Lady Coventry, Lady Downes, Lady Helen Brocklehurst, Sir John Foster Fraser, Sir Krishna Gupta, Sir Ali and Lady Imam, Brig.-General Sir George Macaulay, Sir Ian Malcolm, Sir Malcolm McIlwraith, Sir Reginald Macleod, Sir George and Lady Sutherland, Sir Montague Sharpe, Lady White Thomson, Count and Countess Cippico, Count Grixoni, Dr. and Mrs. Alan Gardiner, Mr. and Mrs. R. H. Foa, M. Yusuf Ali, Brig.-General A. Burt, Mr. and Mrs. Frank H. Cook, Mr. J. Beatty Pownall, Capt. and Mrs. E. N. Bennett, Mr. and Mrs. Leland Buxton, Major J. S. Liddell, Mr. Montague Bell, Mr. J. M. N. Jeffries, Mr. Charles H. Woods, M. and Mme. Yovanovitch.

In proposing the health of Aziz Izzet Pasha, who, he recalled, had been in his early days a British gunner, Lord Edward Gleichen read a message from Mr. Ramsay MacDonald expressing appreciation of the efforts made by Aziz Izzet Pasha since he came to London to promote the cause of friendship between Egypt and Great Britain.

Mr. Arthur Ponsonby, in supporting the toast, said that he hoped that the last obstacles to a complete understanding between Great Britain and Egypt would soon be removed. There were still difficulties to be faced, and he urged that the amateur diplomatists, who were often disguised as journalists, should stand aside and let the principals attend to their task. Mr. Ramsay MacDonald and Zaghloul Pasha were not only Prime Ministers of their respective countries, but also personal friends.

In responding, Aziz Izzet Pasha said that he regarded that gathering as a testimony of the friendship now existing between Great Britain and Egypt. He had himself remained unmoved in his conviction that one day the British people would themselves stand for the fulfilment of British pledges to Egypt. Britain had offered her hand with all the sincerity of a gentleman who recognises the value of a friend, and Egypt would grasp that hand most heartily, knowing that she had need of a good friend among the nations. They knew that if the sincere friendship of Britain is assured, the whole Nile Valley will be able to face the future with the utmost confidence. After a reference to Mohamed Ali, under whose beneficent rule a just and enlightened administration was created in the Sudan, Aziz Izzet Pasha said that his project of reaching the sources of the White Nile was completed under the Khedive Ismail, who recognised the truth of M. Delcassé's remark about the history of a country—"As a thing organic which has its natural limits and ways of growth, within which alone it can attain full and healthful development," and he added, "To force or compel a country to surrender or forfeit a vital part of its organism can only sooner or later lead to inevitable grief." He reminded his audience that so far back as January 6, 1876, The Times correspondent in Egypt had written : "Egypt is a marvellous instance of progress. She has advanced as much in seventy years as many other countries have done in five hundred." It was their earnest endeavour and ambition to recreate a glorious Egypt, rebuilt upon a modern foundation, hospitable to all and grateful to all those who had helped her in her path towards progress and regeneration. If the British principles of honesty and fair play could be permanently secured between Britain and Egypt, not only those two countries would benefit highly, but the whole world would profit. He hoped that they would be celebrating in the near future the conclusion of an Anglo-Egyptian Treaty, consecrating honourable and everlasting friendship and peace between Britain and Egypt upon a foundation of mutual regard, respect, and good will.

Other speakers were Sir Ian Malcolm, Mr. Yusuf Ali and Captain E N. Bennett.

NOTES AND NEWS.

167, Strand, London, W.C.2,
Tuesday Morning.

The Budget.

In most of its salient features the Budget is much in accordance with expectations. The income-tax, which for most people is the chief thing that matters, is left untouched. while the breakfast table is cheapened by a series of remissions of duties. There are two unexpected features—the abolition of the Corporation Profits Tax and of the inhabited house duty—both welcome as far as they go, but in the main the Budget is one which is calculated to affect principally only one class of the population. It is not, however, a Labour Budget any more than it is a Conservative one. It represents the kind of compromise that must be expected under the new party system, and to see in it, as some writers do, a preparation for a Budget next April which will really be a Labour Budget is, in my view, absurd. If it is regarded as indicating the proximity of an election, one is much more likely to be correct.

The McKenna Duties.

In two respects the Budget is peculiarly unsatisfactory. One is the decision of the Government with regard to the McKenna duties, which, as at present arranged, are to end on August 1. Those duties have served the invaluable purpose of protecting a number of trades against foreign competition, and the present satisfactory condition of the motor-car and piano industries is largely, if not wholly, to be attributed to their incidence. The duties, it must be emphasised, have not been heavy enough to put an end to competition, but they have prevented our rivals from competing with us in the home market on unequal and unfair terms, and, as regards light cars, the effect has been to induce foreign firms to start factories in this country. Their abolition can only mean one thing, the increase of unemployment, and it seems almost incredible in the circumstances, when such a clear case can be made out for the maintenance of the duties, that any Government, however great an adherent to the doctrine of Free Trade, should contemplate their removal for a moment. Needless to say, the decision has created widespread alarm in the industries concerned, and in the House itself will be hotly contested, and it is not improbable that the result will be, at any rate, an extension of the date, though that would be no remedy but merely the postponement of the evil day.

The Imperial Conference Decisions.

Much more serious in its wider implications is the attitude of the Government towards the preference resolutions of the Imperial Economic Conference. When I referred in these columns recently to the delay of the Government in giving Parliament an opportunity to ratify these proposals it was already obvious which way things were going. Mr. Snowden dealt with the question tersely, and what he said makes it evident that the Labour Party is no more capable than the Liberals proved themselves before the War of taking a broad view of Imperial questions. He gave an assurance that the pledges that the proposals would be submitted to Parliament will be carried out, but he declared that the question was one which had been before the electorate and had been pronounced on in no uncertain terms, and he indicated that the Government would be unable to give the proposals their support. For the present therefore there can be no hope that the proposals will be carried into effect, but, though it can only be a question of postponement, the effect on the Dominions is bound to be most unfortunate, and it is to be hoped that some machinery will be devised that will prevent such a regrettable incident from recurring in the future.

The Situation in Turkey.

I wish to draw the special attention of my readers to the extremely interesting comments on the economic outlook in Asia Minor in the annual report of Messrs. C. J. Giraud and Co., which will be found on another page. It is by far the most encouraging picture of conditions in Turkey that has yet been received. It had been readily, and evidently too hastily, assumed that the disappearance of the Greek population from Asia Minor would mean the end of the prosperity of that of the region served by Smyrna. Messrs. Giraud state, however, that the Turkish farmers are working very hard, and that the extent of cultivation in the province is of the most favourable augury. Given favourable weather, excellent yields are anticipated from the vineyards and fig orchards, while the crop prospects are also highly favourable. "From the agricultural point of view," it is stated, "and allowing for the upheaval and devastation brought about by the events of 1922, the outlook could not at present be more favourable. The fullest credit should be given to the farmer and peasant for their efforts and hard work to revive the cultivation of the soil and develop its riches."

THE REVIVAL OF SMYRNA.

Turkish Farmers at Work Again.

In an exceedingly interesting report on the Smyrna market Messrs. C. J. Giraud and Co. give the following summary of the agricultural outlook in Western Asia Minor :—

Agriculture is admittedly the master industry of Turkey, and it is an industry for which, as they have shown under favourable conditions, the Turks have a natural instinct and capacity. Conditions, as they present themselves at present, offer a pleasing and hopeful contrast to the past two or three years. Farmers are not sparing themselves, and the extent of cultivation all over our province augurs well for the future. Atmospheric conditions have been favourable, though some further rains over the next few weeks are urgently needed. Agricultural machinery of all sorts is being freely imported. Labour is plentiful and cheap. The agricultural banks are being reorganised, and the Government is lending all financial assistance possible to stimulate and assist the development in progress.

The reports generally being received about the crops in this province are distinctly favourable. Vineyards and fig orchards have been well cultivated, and the vines are carrying a fine show of blossom. If weather conditions continue favourable, the yields in both cases may prove as satisfactory as last summer. As regards cotton, the plantations are estimated as likely to exceed three times the acreage of last season, and hopes run high that the crop in this province may reach some 30,000 bales, and that the Cilician crop may top 100,000 bales. The valonea and olive trees are carrying satisfactory crops. The olive trees especially are blossoming copiously, and the country should resume exports of the liquid on a large scale in the coming autumn.

The sowings of wheat, barley, and beans are very much larger than last year, though still well under the normal. It is generally estimated that the lowland districts will yield about 4/500,000 sacks of barley, in which case some 200,000 sacks would be available for export. The sowings in the highlands are on a fairly large scale, but it is too early as yet to forecast the possibilities of these districts, particularly as conditions of transport are still faulty. Beans promised exceptional results, but sharp frost in the early part of March affected the crop. It is reckoned, however, that 80 to 100,000 sacks will be harvested, most of which will be exportable. The wheat acreage is reported to be very much larger than last year, and if this crop is successful it should free for export other seeds, such as dari, millet, maize, etc., which, when wheat is short, are largely consumed in the country. With the improved prospects of cotton, it is anticipated that some 10/12,000 tons of cottonseed will be available for export.

From the agricultural point of view, and allowing for the upheaval and devastation brought about by the events of 1922, the outlook could not at present be more favourable. The fullest credit should be given to the farmer and peasant for their efforts and hard work to revive the cultivation of the soil and develop its riches. The more serious problem is of an economic nature. Money is continually required, and will become more necessary as the season advances in order to finance harvesting and the movement of produce to market centres. Dealers and merchants in the towns, as customary, are financing farmers to all the extent that their means will permit of, but money is scarce, credit is restricted, and commercial confidence has not yet sufficiently revived to permit of capital flowing in from abroad during the period of stringency ahead of us. The laws of supply and demand are inexorable, and with the existing tightness of money, the high rates of interest charged to the hard-working farmer cannot but deprive him of much of the fruit of his labour and industry.

The details given in the report are as follows :—

As the period of activity is now drawing to its close and the produce of the past year has been almost entirely exported, a review of the conditions disclosed after the uncertainties which prevailed twelve months ago will doubtless be of considerable interest, and may enable some guidance to be obtained as to the prospects of the coming season.

Sultanas.—The results of the past season have belied all expectations and forecasts. The winter of 1922-23 was exceptionally rainy, labour was scarce and dear, work on the vineyards was delayed, and the outlook of the raisin crop appeared generally very unfavourable. The forecasts in March and April last year were based on a likely production of about 20,000 tons. Farmers, however, spared no effort to make up for lost time when dry weather set in, and the vineyards in the majority of districts were got into fair shape in the way of pruning, digging, and weeding before spring had run its course.

We have now obtained complete data of the shipments effected from our port from the opening of the season in August last up to the present date. Shipments to the United Kingdom have been as follows :—To London, 605,918 boxes, 74,640 bags; to Liverpool, 559,350 boxes, 80,700 bags; to Bristol, 83,161 boxes, 1,782 bags; to Glasgow, 52,713 boxes, 600 bags; to Hull, 19,450 boxes, 4,500 bags. This gives a total of 1,320,592 boxes and 162,220 bags, or 18,500 tons. Shipments to Holland, Belgium, Germany, and Northern Europe have been 15,500 tons; shipments to Trieste, United States, Canada, Australasia, etc., have been 3,400 tons—37,400 tons. Local consumption and distillery account for 1,000 tons; the stock remaining in Smyrna and in the interior is 1,300 tons, giving a total of 39,700 tons.

The fact must be borne in mind, however, that, after the expulsion of the Greek forces in 1922, and as a result of the chaotic conditions which prevailed for several months, a considerable quantity of sultanas remained in the country. The Government having made certain provisional regulations governing the transport of produce, with a view to preventing loot and the sale of unlawfully gotten merchandise, some 5,000 tons of sultanas were thus immobilised, and only reached market when the new crop began moving and all the restrictions had been raised.

The actual production, therefore, of the past season may be assessed at about 35,000 tons. The stock of old fruit was in fairly good condition, and owing to its cheap cost was used up either in mixtures with new season's sultanas, especially in deliveries of G.A.Q., or sold as such to Holland and Germany, the lowest grades being worked off in local distilleries.

Figs.—The total arrivals of figs from the Meander Valley have amounted to 227,000 sacks, or about 23,000 tons. Shipments to the United Kingdom have been as follows:—To London, 10,366 sk/cases, 337,429 bags, 37,563 boxes, 445 cases; to Liverpool, 8,708 sk/cases, 161,077 bags, 12,658 boxes; to Bristol, 438 sk/cases, 16,062 bags, 187 boxes; to Glasgow, 209 sk/cases, 7,159 bags, 3,923 boxes; to Hull, 66 sk/cases, 8,957 bags, giving totals of 19,787 sk/cases, 530,684 bags, 54,331 boxes, and 445 cases, equal to 10,700 tons.

We much regret our inability to obtain from the various s.s. agencies handling American and Continental shipments detailed information of the quantities manifested for these markets. But the distribution of the remainder of the yield can be fairly closely assessed as follows:—To the United States and Canada, Australasia, 9,000 tons; to the Continent, Egypt, etc., 3,300 tons—12,300 tons.

Red Raisins.—The yield amounted to about 750 tons Carabournou and 2,000 tons Vourla quality. The Continental markets practically absorbed the entire production.

Valonea.—Between 1900-1914 the valonea crop of Turkey averaged about 60,000 tons yearly, the bulk of which was exported from Smyrna, whilst the principal consuming centres were as follows (the figures representing tons):—Germany and Scandinavia, 15,000; Russia and Poland, 12,000; Austria-Hungary, 10,000; United Kingdom, 10,000; Italy, France, and sundries, 13,000—60,000 tons. Since 1914 it has been impossible to obtain any reliable figures of the crop or of exports, neither custom house nor shipping companies' statistics being available.

From the Armistice onwards, i.e., from 1919, there has been a serious shrinkage in the crop, due partly to destruction and partly to scarcity of labour in the upland districts. It is estimated that during the past five years the crop has averaged about 35,000 tons. Of this quantity, some 6/7,000 tons have been annually required by our factory here, producing the well-known tanning extract known under the trade mark "Valex," and the remainder has been exported as follows (the figures representing tons):—United States, 7,000; United Kingdom, 6,000; Germany and Scandinavia, 4,000; Russia and Poland, 2,000; Italy, 1,500; Czecho-Slovakia, Roumania, and Bulgaria, 2,500; France, 1,000; sundries, 5,000—29,000 tons.

Last year's excessive rainfall told heavily on the quality of the crop, which is estimated to have amounted to about 33,000 tons. Heavy transport charges make the marketing of low grades very unremunerative, and, as a result of the active demand experienced during the past few months, supplies have run short, and stocks on our market have been almost exhausted.

Cotton.—The yield in our province previous to 1914 varied between 35,000 and 55,000 bales. The abnormal conditions of the past two or three years caused a serious setback in the cultivation of this article. The crop during the past season returned about 10,500 bales, of which 8,500 bales were exported to Continental markets, the remainder being taken up by local factories and home consumption.

The crop in the Cilician district has totalled about 70,000 bales, of which about 50,000 bales have been exported, 10,000 bales used by local spinneries, and the remainder, mainly of inferior quality, is in stock.

Cereals.—The grain crops in all parts of the country have proved very short and insufficient for even home consumption.

Olive Oil.—The same may be said of the olive crop, exports of oil having been practically nil this season.

BRITISH INDUSTRIES FAIR.

Further Impressions.

(By Our Own Correspondent.)

The sections of the Fair with which I dealt last week—those devoted to chemicals, musical instruments, and glassware and chinaware—convey but a small indication of the comprehensiveness of the exhibits, which range from furniture to machinery for making envelopes, from basketware to toy soldiers, and from scents to optical instruments. The Fair is, in short, a very complete index of what may be called for simplicity the lighter side of the manufacturers' art. The other aspect is left entirely to the Birmingham section of the Fair, but I suppose that this is the last time that there will be any division, seeing that Wembley will be available next spring. However, for that we must wait and see.

It is too early yet to attempt to estimate the amount of business done at the Fair. My two visits last week were on Monday and Saturday, and on neither occasion was there the throng of buyers that I have noticed at previous Fairs, but it has to be remembered that the days in question are the worst in the opening week, and I gathered that the stallholders generally are fairly satisfied with the business that is being done, though there is no doubt that the relative attractiveness of Wembley has been somewhat underestimated.

Next to the musical instruments section, I should say that the section devoted to silver, cutlery, jewellery, etc., has strong claims to be regarded as one of the most notable features of the Fair. It is a wonderfully representative section, and is, as a matter of fact, larger than before, and some of the stands make a wonderful showing, especially those devoted to silver and electro-plated ware. There is a most pleasing variety of these goods, and I was particularly struck by some presentation plate and challenge cups. The jewellery section is very comprehensive, and includes a most attractive range of such things as wristlets and pendants. The cutlery exhibits have always been a feature of the Fair, and when I say that they are quite up to the usual standard this time it is the fullest measure of praise.

The leather and leather goods section is again very important. A large number of stands show travelling goods of all kinds, while fancy leather goods are also very prominent. The exhibits in this section seem to lend themselves particularly well to display, and some of the stands are very attractive. Like the previous section, this shows an increase on last year. The brushware section is also representative.

The stationery and printing section is invariably one of the leading features of the Fair, and it is satisfactory to note that there is no falling off this time. This section provides, indeed, a wonderful display of the trades concerned, and a survey of all the stands in this section alone would take the best part of a day. The size of a section at the Fair is incidentally not a bad index of the well-being or otherwise of the industry concerned. It is certainly a true indication in this particular case.

Sports goods and toys and games occupy a considerable number of stands, though sports goods are not quite in such evidence as on some previous occasions. The counter-attraction of Wembley is, I presume, the reason, for it is certainly not due to any decrease in the markets abroad for these commodities. The reverse is, as a matter of fact, the case, for not a year passes without this particular field being enlarged. It is to be hoped that next year this part of the section will again adequately reflect the importance of this leading British industry, for the Fair is the gateway to the foreign markets, and it would be little short of ridiculous if we were not supreme in this line so peculiarly our own.

In this brief survey it has been impossible for me to touch on many of the aspects of the Fair; indeed, to do real justice to any of the sections. To do so would need far more space than is at my disposal. It will be noted probably that in the present article I have refrained from naming any of the exhibitors. It seems to me invidious where the general level of excellence is so good to select for special mention a few firms, and there is no getting away from the fact that this time a very high standard is maintained throughout. That is indeed the keynote of the Fair. As a whole, the Fair may not impress quite to the extent that previous Fairs have, because one or two sections are this time incomplete, but the quality is there throughout, and the shortcomings of some sections in point of numbers is compensated for by the larger sections devoted to other industries. It is, in fact, a great display of British trade potentialities, and it is very evident that its value as a medium for trade enterprise is becoming widely realised, and that the Fair may now be regarded as a permanent institution.

RELIEF GRANT TO ALBANIA.

In response to an appeal by the Secretary-General of the League of Nations, acting under a resolution of its Council, the Government proposes to make a grant of £5,000 in aid of the relief of distress in Albania, where urgent need exists owing to famine in the mountainous districts following three successive bad harvests. A supplementary estimate for this sum was issued last Friday. Towards the minimum amount estimated to be required, £15,000, approximately £11,000 has been promised by other Governments and bodies. The funds provided will be administered under the supervision of the League.

The traffic receipts of the Egyptian Delta Light Railways, for the ten days ended April 10, amounted to £E7,688.

TOBACCO CULTIVATION IN PALESTINE.

Prior to the Occupation, tobacco cultivation in Palestine was vested in a monopoly granted to the "Regie Co--Interessée des Tabacs de l'Empire Ottoman," who also controlled the movement and sales of tobacco. Cultivation was prohibited excepting in a few villages in the Kaza of Akka; but during the War this prohibition was removed in Northern Palestine, where considerable quantities were produced for the use of the Ottoman troops. The Palestine Government abolished the monopoly in January, 1921, and cultivation and trade in tobacco became unrestricted, with the result that the areas planted have increased year by year (says the Palestine Commercial Bulletin).

The cultivation of tobacco has received all possible encouragement from the Government. The Land Tax was fixed by the Tobacco Taxation Ordinance, 1921, at £E4 per dunam for land planted with Turkish tobacco, and £E2 per dunam for land planted with Baladi tobacco. However, in order to assist growers in the initial stages of the industry, it was decided to reduce the land tax on Turkish tobacco to £E2 per dunam for a period of two years as from January 1, 1922 (Tobacco Taxation Ordinance, 1922). The Department of Agriculture also provides an expert to tour the country instructing growers in the best methods of cultivation. Seeds are obtained for issue on repayment. Tobacco growing has rapidly become popular, and from 1,779 dunams planted in 1921, the figure rose to 4,832 dunams in the following year, and to 5,122 dunams in 1923, while the estimated area that may be under tobacco in the present season is 20,000 dunams. The average production per dunam is 65-70 kilos for Turkish tobacco and 120 kilos for Baladi.

The varieties of tobacco grown include Macedonian, Anatolian, Kavalla, Havana, Seres, Samsuni, etc. These varieties are generally classified among local growers as "Turkish," the native plant being known as "Baladi," which is a coarse kind consumed by the fellaheen. An even coarser variety, Heisheh, is grown in the sub-districts of Beersheba and Hebron for the use of the Bedawin. The quality of the tobacco produced during the first two years was naturally inferior to that of the imported varieties, but an extensive series of experiments have been carried out with the object of ascertaining the most suitable varieties of high-class tobacco for cultivation. Success has been obtained with two varieties of the highest class, namely "Samsuni Baphra Turki" and "Seres." The former has been declared by experts to compare favourably with the original "Samsuni." It is further stated on expert authority that considerable areas in the Northern District are suitable for the growing of many high-class Turkish tobaccos, including many of the best Macedonian varieties. Great interest is being shown by cultivators who are adopting scientific methods of drying, and it is anticipated that within the next few years Palestine will be exporting large quantities of tobacco and cigarettes annually. Among the Jewish colonies a co-operative movement has given an impetus to scientific production, proper curing methods and storage.

A fair estimate of the consumption of manufactured tobacco in Palestine for 1924 would be about 300 tons, all of which will be Turkish or imported varieties. In addition, some 300 tons both Turkish and Baladi, might be consumed unmanufactured, that is to say, be cut by the peasants for personal consumption. On the basis of these figures and the estimated acreage for cultivation next season the quantities remaining for export will be approximately 805 tons of Turkish tobacco and sixty tons of Baladi. Possible markets for the surplus Turkish tobacco might be found in Egypt, Great Britain, and other European countries.

The removal of the embargo on the cultivation, manufacture, and sale of tobacco has resulted in the opening up of cigarette factories throughout the country. There are now approximately 20 factories in Palestine, and although accurate statistics of the output are not yet available, it is known that in the case of smaller factories (which produce an inferior grade of cigarettes) the tobacco used is almost entirely local. In the case of the principal factories, of which there are four with a combined output of a little less than half the total consumption, large quantities of local tobacco have been purchased.

NEAR EAST MARKET REPORTS.

The following extracts are taken from the market reports in the current issue of the monthly circular of the Imperial Ottoman Bank:—

Basrah.—The market remains calm. Demand from the interior has been insignificant if compared with the importance of the existing stocks and of the arrivals expected. On the other hand, agricultural conditions are good and the area under cultivation is much larger than last year's. Peasants have disposed of their stocks of cereals which in normal years they usually hold in reserve. Consequently, important consignments of wheat, barley, canary seed and maize arrive in Basrah at regular intervals.

Baghdad.—The demand for cotton seed is brisk now that the sowing season has started. The total amount of cotton seed issued by the British Cotton Growing Association is 50 tons, sufficient to sow 3,762 acres. Cotton cultivators are giving much more attention than hitherto to the preparatory cultivation of the land and to the ridge making. There exists a fair demand for ploughing of cotton land by tractor; a British firm in Baghdad is at present meeting this demand in part.

In the experiments with flax cultivation which have been undertaken by the Department of Agriculture for the past four years, it has been definitely proved that conditions of soil and climate in Irak are well suited to flax cultivation on irrigated lands. The crop may be sown either in the early winter months or as a spring crop; and with an average rainfall flax requires about two waterings. It is a relatively easy matter to grow a crop of flax, but the separation of the fibre from the stalks is a process which cannot be undertaken satisfactorily by the native grower. It appears that the Government of Irak, in its desire to encourage the development of the agricultural resources of the country, appreciates the difficulties which attend the production of flax on a large scale, and is now prepared to consider requests from those interested in the flax trade to import and erect flax machinery in suitable localities on very favourable terms.

It is rumoured that the Persian Government will inaugurate shortly a new desert route which will link up southern and northern Persia. This route, which will be practicable for vehicle and animal transport, will have as its starting point Mohammerrah, and terminus at Teheran. It is believed that it will take only nine days to travel from Mohammerrah across this route, and that the Persian authorities have already sent important military detachments to safeguard it against raids by neighbouring mountain tribes. It is thought that Irak will be seriously affected by this route, as a good deal of the goods from Europe destined to Persia now passing through this country, and on which a transit duty of 1 to 2 per cent. is levied, will find their way direct into Persia through Mohammerrah. It is also said that transport of the goods by the new route will present a double advantage over that by the present route (Baghdad-Kermanshah), both in freight and time. This news has created a certain amount of concern amongst the commercial community.

Jerusalem.—The outstanding feature has been the opening of the tourist season. Several specially conducted parties, consisting in all of over 1,600 tourists, visited Jerusalem, Bethlehem, and the Dead Sea. Pilgrimages to Palestine are reviving and the first party since the war arrived in Palestine during the month. The effect of the tourist season is felt to an appreciable extent in the retail market, and hotels, motor-car owners, etc., benefited. Trade in general was livelier during the month and the rising prices of wheat, flour, sugar, coffee, kerosene, benzine and alcohol encouraged merchants to place orders abroad.

Dead Sea.—The commercial possibilities of the Jordan Valley and the Dead Sea are enormous, but it will take time and capital. The Dead Sea brine forms one of Palestine's most potent economic resources Within the British Empire there are no known potash deposits of any importance except those in the Dead Sea brine. From the surface to 200 feet deep the amount of potassium chloride present increases from 10 parts per 1,000 to 15 parts per 1,000, below which the composition is uniform. From these figures it is calculated that the Dead Sea contains 2,000 million metric tons of potassium chloride in addition to common salt, magnesium bromide, magnesium and calcium chloride. The special feature of these deposits is the tremendous solar evaporation of the area, and the possibility of recovering the potash compound by solar heat with a purity to make it of high commercial value as a potash fertiliser. This area has been known for a long period for its bitumen and oil springs. Considerable work has been done recently in exploring the possible oil resources of Southern Palestine, and results lead to the hope that within a limited period Palestine may be among the oil-producing countries of the world.

GOOD DEMAND FOR IVORY.

Messrs. Hale and Son report as follows on the quarterly ivory sales which took place last week:—

They comprised 52 tons (against 46¾ tons at this time last year)—viz., 19½ tons Zanzibar, Bombay, Mozambique, East African, and Siam, 1½ tons Abyssinian, 10½ tons Egyptian (10 tons Alexandrian, ½ ton Malta description), 18¾ tons West Coast and Central African and Lisbon, and 1½ tons land carriage; also ¼ ton rhinoceros horns and sea horse tusks. Total 52 tons. Of the above quantities, 2½ tons consisted of lots previously offered or indirect import, viz.: ¼ ton East Indian, ½ ton Alexandrian, ¼ ton West Coast African and Lisbon, and 1½ tons land carriage.

The following was the assortment of the East Indian description: 13¾ tons soft tusks, 1¾ tons hard and a few Siam, ½ ton billiard ball pieces, ¼ ton bagatelle pieces, ¼ ton billiard ball scrivelloes and few bagatelle, ¾ ton cut points for balls, ½ ton cut points off large tusks, ¼ ton scrivelloes and under-size points, and 1½ tons cut hollows. During the progress of the sales about 3½ tons were bought in, viz.: 3 tons Congo and ½ ton East Indian.

There was a good attendance of buyers, and good competition throughout, all kinds being keenly competed for. America and the Continent bought freely and the home trade about the usual quantity. Soft grain ivory was in moderate supply, and hard rather larger than usual.

Abyssinian.—Large and medium tusks were firm to £2 a £4 per cwt. higher. Ball scrivelloes much dearer.

Egyptian.—Soft large and medium tusks were firm to £2 to £4 per cwt. higher, and hard was £4 to £8 per cwt. higher. Ball scrivelloes advanced £10 to £20 per cwt. Scrivelloes £2 to £3 per cwt. dearer.

The Roumanian Minister of Finance announces that he will resume this month the drawing of lots for the redemption of bonds of all Roumanian consolidated loans, external and internal, except in the case of the 1922 Expropriation Rentes, which have not yet been fully issued (says a Reuter message).

Cotton and Cotton Goods.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Futures Quiet.

The Alexandria Commercial Company, in their report for the week ended April 24, state :—

Since our last report the futures market has been quiet for Sakel, but extremely firm for Ashmouni. New York has fluctuated widely, and at one time showed a rather poor tone, but this has not turned our market from its last week's bullish tendency. Ignoring New York reactions, it has kept very firm indeed, the main explanation being the active demand from abroad and the difficulty of meeting it owing to the restricted spot supplies. The rise which Ashmouni has secured is to a great extent undoubtedly due to speculative manipulation. Some people have been caught "short," and the holders of the remaining small supplies are endeavouring to make them pay dearly for their mistake. April Ashmouni was at one time quoted over May Sakel, an absurd state of things. Naturally, the Ashmouni position has now become very risky, as, owing to the relative cheapness of Sakel and the competing qualities of American and to the huge discounts of new crop options, spinners may at any time find it convenient to exchange or cancel their outstanding Ashmouni contracts. At the third April tender 3,750 crs. dockets were issued. The Liverpool Egyptian market has also been very firm. Prices of futures there are relatively much cheaper than Alexandria, but spot cotton daily commands higher premiums. All reports indicate a healthy and improved business in Lancashire, with good prospects for a continuation of these conditions during the summer months. On the Continent the situation is also, on the whole, certainly much better. New crop options have continued to depreciate in comparison to the old crop, but October Ashmouni has been actively dealt in, we think both for straddling and commercial account. The week's receipts amount to 44,431 crs., against exports 101,642 crs.; the stock stands at 1,239,416 crs.

SPOT.—Minet el Bassal has only been open three days this week owing to holidays, but we have experienced a rather improved demand from spinners, and sales amount to about 6,900 B/s, of which we estimate 4,100 B/s Sakel, 2,500 B/s Uppers. 100 B/s Brown and Pilion, and 200 B/s White. The feature of the week's business has been the eager demand and very high premiums paid for Upper Egypts.

Sakellarides.—The demand continues to run on cotton from good fair to about good, and very little interest has been shown in the lower qualities. Spot prices as against contracts are at last week's rates.

Uppers.—There has been an eager demand for all Upper Egypts, with the exception of fully fair and below. Prices of spot against contracts are very much dearer than last week, except for fully fair and the lower qualities. Fully good fair at present is worth two dollars over June contracts. We consider premiums artificial and due to the fact that the Upper Egyptian position is partially cornered.

Brown and Pilion.—A fair business has been done. Prices of spot against contracts are much dearer than last week, influenced by the position of Upper Egypts.

White.—An improved demand has been experienced, principally for cotton about good fair. Prices of spot against contracts are firm at last week's rates.

CROP 1924.—We continue to receive favourable reports on the progress of the crop, especially from Upper Egypt. The increase in the acreage of land under cotton is now estimated at about 10 per cent. Upper Egypt and the northern districts of the Delta show the largest increases.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Inquiry on Wider Scale.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended May 1 :—

Egyptian Spot.—The temporary cessation in spot purchasing which followed the Easter break proved to be of short duration, and the past week has witnessed a further broadening of the inquiry, which has resulted in a succession of daily sales of a steadiness and bulk which has rarely been exceeded. The seriousness of the situation as regards the supply of Egyptian cotton is no longer questioned by spinners, and a general scramble to secure cotton is taking place. The only quality in which a respectable selection still remains is Fine to Extra Fine Sakel, and merchants who have in many cases held blocks of this cotton for a considerable time are making the most of the opportunity by meeting buyers on every possible occasion. The result has been a further weakening in the basis for these qualities. At the other end of the scade, we find Good Fair and below in all growths still comparatively neglected, and a similar easing in the basis for these qualities has been observed. All the intermediate grades are in strong request, and the basis throughout tends to harden each week. The stock figures for Liverpool, published 25th ult., gave the stock of Egyptian cotton as 56,845 bales and Sudan as 10,965 bales, remarkable figures when the time of year is considered. Rather more business has been done latterly in the 50 off to 50 on style of Sakel, and there seems little doubt that this lower cotton will attract considerably more attention in the near future, particularly the staple lots. Cotton at from 250 to 300 on has been the most popular range asked for, and if present conditions continue, it will not be long before the cream of this market is skimmed. In Uppers, only the lower qualities now remain, and cotton between Fair and Good Fair has changed hands at about three farthings off May contracts. Slightly more interest has been taken in Brown cotton, but actual business has been difficult to trace.

Sudan cotton of all descriptions has enjoyed wide popularity, the inquiry leaning mostly towards the White. The early arrivals of Tokar Sakellarides have moved off rapidly at prices between 300 and 400 on. This cotton is highly valued by certain spinners, but there is a limit, above which the cotton loses its attractiveness. Sudan Sakel is firmly held and finds a steady market at from 24d. to 24½d. per lb., and anything short of a collapse in futures seems to have practically no effect on the basis. A fair c.i.f. business has been done in spite of the prices quoted from Alexandria. Forwardings to spinners for the week ending 25th ult. were returned as 9,120 bales. Estimated sales 11,500 bales Egyptian and 1,950 bales Sudan. Quotations of Upper are advanced 25 points for Fair, 70 points for Good Fair, and 105 points for other grades. In Sakellaridis, Fair and Fine are 40 points higher, Good Fair to Good 75 points higher, Extra Fine is exceptionally 5 points lower. In Brown, Fair is raised 25 points, and Good Fair 35 points, all other grades 45 points. F.G.F. Sakel to-day 23.15d.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

Position Practically Unchanged.

The Manchester cotton trade review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended May 3 states:—

There is little change in the state of affairs prevailing in this market; if anything, actual transactions have been of smaller volume, although inquiries have been numerous. Manufacturers of certain cloths are booked up for a month or two, and cannot, therefore, guarantee deliveries until well into the summer, whilst on the other hand the discrepancy between raw cotton prices for new and old crop months makes merchants abroad disinclined to commit themselves so far ahead.

Yarn.—Experiences in the yarn market appear to have varied somewhat, spinners of Egyptian and the finer counts of American having had a satisfactory week, the demand for these qualities from Germany and the United States being particularly noticeable, whilst spinners of coarse counts find their productions moving very slowly. The short-time movement is being supported with as much strength as hitherto.

Cloth.—The good volume of inquiry reported previously has been maintained, but, as usual, the contracts booked are comparatively small in proportion, buyers being very slow to raise their prices to Manchester's lowest limits. A steady business is done in small lots for India and China, but orders of any size are conspicuously lacking. Egypt and the Near East give little support.

Raw Cotton.—Fluctuations have occurred day by day, but not on such a wide scale as recently. Interest centres on, and sentiment is largely governed by, reports from the United States as to the weather and the possible increase or otherwise in the acreage. Recent indications have been fairly favourable. "Spot" sales of American have been rather larger, and the price is only a little lower on the week. Egyptian continues to be in good demand at prices which on balance are unchanged. Closing prices yesterday were as follows:—American Fully Middling, 17.85; Egyptian Fully Good Fair, 23.40.

DRIED FRUIT MARKET.

Messrs. J. C. Houghton and Co., of Liverpool, in their report dated May 1, state:—

We express satisfaction that the Budget provides for the remission of the extra 50 per cent. duty on all dried fruits other than currants, which was imposed as a war measure. This is to date from August 1, and will consequently benefit the new season's fruit.

Currants.—The past month has again proved very disappointing from a trading point of view. Prices kept wonderfully firm, considering the smallness of the turn-over, having been helped mainly by the strength of the Greek market, where values have been shillings higher than those ruling here. Another factor which militated against activity was the approach of the Easter holiday, and past experience has shown that when trading is interrupted markets are slow in settling down again. There are signs of an early resumption of activity when the Budget is out of the way, as this always exercises a restraining influence on operations.

S.s. Miranda, with 300 tons, consisting largely of cleaned Pyrgos and Amalias, which qualities were scarce, met an active demand, prices paid being 46s. and 47s. 6d. respectively. Business in other grades can only be described as dragging. Zante, at 49s. to 50s.; Gulf, 50s. to 52s.; Panariti, 54s. to 55s.; Vostizza, 55s. to 60s.; Vostizza, Shade Dried, 62s. to 72s. Cleaned small fruit selling 48s. to 56s. Quotations:—Calamata, 45s.; Zante, 48s. to 50s.; Gulf and Panariti, 50s. to 56s.; Vostizza, 60s. to 72s. Australian.—The first of the new crop are expected to arrive per s.s. Ulysses, due May 9.

Raisins.—Valencia: Further reductions were made, without stimulating demand, and sales are quite insignificant at 40s.; seedless, 38s. Australian Lexias cleared—2 crowns, 42s.; 3 crowns, 45s. Cape Raisins: Further arrivals per s.s. Walmer Castle and s.s. Briton are selling slowly—f.a.q., 46s. to 48s.; g.a.q., 56s.

Sultanas.—Smyrna: Concessions have been offered by holders, without any undue pressure, as underlying conditions are firm, but buyers have taken very little interest in the article, and the volume of trade is most disappointing. Sales principally in good average quality, 53s. to 55s.; and cleaned 55s. to 58s.; old fruit, 45s. 6d. to 46s. Cretans: 54s. to 56s. Cape: neglected.

Figs.—Stocks of bag figs in first hands are now very light. Sales during the month have been on a larger scale at 37s. for genuine quality.

Steaua Romana (British) is advised that the production of the Steaua Romana Co. during April was 20,850 tons. In addition, on the field at Aricesti approximately 500,000 cubic metres of natural gas were produced.

BRITISH CONSULAR REPORTS

I.—CZECHO-SLOVAKIA (Concluded).

River Transport

The nationalisation of river transport has made further progress through the flotation of the Czecho-Slovak Oder Shipping Company, in which the Government holds a controlling interest on the analogy of the existing Danube and Elbe Shipping Companies. The management of the Oder fleet is at present in the hands of the Mahrisch Ostrau Iron Works, which obtain their supplies of Swedish ore by this channel. A Czecho-Slovak-Bulgarian steamship company, with its headquarters at Rustchuk, is also in process of formation for Danube shipping. Fifty per cent. of the capital of 60 million levas is to be found by the Bulgarian Government, 10 per cent. by private Bulgarian investors, and 40 per cent. by the Czecho-Slovak Government. The following sums have been set aside for the improvement of port works: At Bratislava 65 million, at Komarno 20 million, and at Melnik 25 million crowns; while 74 million crowns are being expended in regulating the Moldau. The development of inland waterways by the construction of new canals continues to form a frequent subject of discussion; and the Government has not lost sight of the advantages of connecting the Danube with the Elbe and the Oder. But these schemes require larger capital investments than can conveniently be provided at present; and they cannot be regarded as an immediate practical solution of transport problems. It is more likely that an attempt will be made to centralise traffic in the first instance by developing the connection of the State railways between the Danube and the Elbe, and constructing large bonded warehouses at the terminal ports to facilitate international through traffic.

Exports and Imports.

Statistics of exports and imports show that during the year 1923 Czecho-Slovak export trade has decreased by about one-third in value as compared with 1922, and that her imports in 1923 have decreased by over a fifth. In weight, however, it appears that this country imported more articles than last year (1922) for which less money had to be paid, the Czech crown having not only had a higher purchasing power, but prices also having been in many instances lower in 1923 than in 1922. The total exports by weight are greater than in 1922 owing to the large consignments of timber, coal and iron (all of which reached record quantities) exported to Germany on account of the occupation of the Ruhr. Thus Czecho-Slovakia has been exporting in 1923 large quantities of raw and semi-manufactured goods which fetch lower prices than wholly manufactured articles.

The falling off of Czecho-Slovak exports to Germany (whose position as chief purchaser has now been taken by Austria, which country heads the list for 1923) should be noted.

As regards Germany's large export trade to this country, which places her at the head of the list of all countries supplying Czecho-Slovakia, it should not be forgotten that all transit trade via Hamburg is credited to Germany for statistical purposes. What proportion of this trade should be debited to Germany in favour of other countries it is impossible to ascertain, but there can be no doubt but that quantities of British goods coming over from Hamburg are not credited to the totals given under the heading of United Kingdom imports into Czecho-Slovakia.

Great Britain ranks third amongst the countries importing from Czecho-Slovakia, with a total of some 1,200 million Kc or £8,000,000 sterling (at the rate of 150 Kc to £), whilst she only exports to Czecho-Slovakia the very moderate amount of some 330,000,000 Kc or £2,200,000. The chief Czecho-Slovak exports to the United Kingdom in 1923 are there shown to have been sugar (403 million Kc), glass and glassware (159 millions), hides and leather (94 millions), woollen goods (68 millions), timber (58 millions), ready-made clothing and hats (46.5 millions), cotton goods (44.5 millions), and linen goods (42 millions). The chief British exports to Czecho-Slovakia were wool and woollen goods (117 millions), cotton and cotton goods (63 5 millions), iron and ironware (26 millions), machinery and scientific instruments (16 millions), colonial goods (13 millions), and chemical products (12 millions). It is difficult to understand how, or why, exports from the United Kingdom to Czecho-Slovakia have decreased so greatly during the year under review, but when all is said and done, it must be recognised that Czecho-Slovakia is a manufacturing country like ourselves and that, during the first nine months of 1923, the foreign import trade was subjected to severe restrictions. I cannot also but think that, as mentioned before, large quantities of British goods shipped via Hamburg, or having otherwise come to Germany, are entered, for statistical purposes, as coming from Germany, so that our import trade into Czecho-Slovakia may be of greater volume than it appears to be on paper.

Hope for an improvement in the future may be looked for in the relaxation of the import restrictions which has lately taken place in this country, as well as from the benefits which will accrue to British traders under the most favoured nation clause of our recent Treaty, whenever custom tariff reductions are obtained by other foreign countries when concluding commercial conventions with Czecho-Slovakia.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The Roumanian Visit.

If the visit of the King and Queen of Roumania to London this week will have been a short one, there was no lack of variety in the programme, and a tribute is due to the indefatigable way in which the many claims on their Majesties' time have been met. A State banquet in the evening followed their arrival on Monday afternoon. On Tuesday came the presentation of an Address by the Corporation of the City of London and a luncheon at the Guildhall; in the evening a dinner and reception at the Roumanian Legation. Wednesday's programme provided for a visit, in the company of King George and Queen Mary, to the Exhibition at Wembley, where luncheon was to be taken; a reception at five o'clock at the Roumanian Legation, and in the evening a State ball at Buckingham Palace. It is too early—at the moment of writing—to look for the practical results that are expected in Roumania to follow from the Royal visit to Britain. Sufficient is it that the political orbits of the two countries have been thus prominently brought into touch, and we may hope that the interest in Roumanian affairs that has been reawakened in this country will lead to a cementing of still stronger business ties between the two peoples. British policy favours a strong and stable Roumania, not for the sake of engaging her attention in matters outside her own sphere, but in order that she may play adequately the part for which she is fitted by position and interest in South-Eastern Europe.

Central European Politics.

No definite progress appears to have been made with the attempt to enlarge the Central European bloc on which France has set her heart. In Paris it is denied that the negotiations with Roumania have been terminated, and the very vehemence of the denial suggests that the desire to continue them is strong. There is much coming and going at the present time in Central Europe. French hope for an understanding with Yugoslavia will not be abandoned before the visit of King Alexander to Paris. In the meantime Dr. Benesh, Czecho-Slovak Minister for Foreign Affairs, is paying a visit to Rome with a view to coming to an agreement with Italy which will serve to modify the unfavourable impression gained in Europe as a whole from the Franco-Czecho-Slovak alliance. An understanding between Italy and Czecho-Slovakia would help to disarm some of the criticism against the other alliance, and might exercise some influence, in conformity with French wishes, on the attitude of Yugoslavia and Roumania. If the guiding motive in all this scheming were the maintenance of the peace of Europe, based on voluntary acquiescence in an agreed settlement, there would be good reason to commend it; but if the purpose is to crystallise by force, or the threat of force, an unworkable arrangement, it is to be hoped that the States which have nothing to gain from the maintenance of unrest in Europe will set their faces against the bolstering up of a mistaken policy.

Yugoslav Politics.

The political deadlock in Yugoslavia continues. King Alexander is as loth to dissolve the Skupshtina and force new elections on the country as M. Pashitch is determined that this course shall be adopted. The latter has refused to assist in the formation of a "business Government," and the King is now engaged in trying to find a politician able to secure a sufficient majority among the various parties in Parliament to carry on the administration of the country. In the end it is expected that he will be obliged, as so often before, to fall back upon M. Pashitch, who will then appeal to the electorate again in association with M. Pribitchevitch. The moral of the Ministerial crisis would seem to be that, until there is an agreed Constitution in Yugoslavia, political instability must continue. Precarious majorities may be secured to enable this party or that to hold the reins of power for a period; but each Cabinet is left to struggle with its back against a wall, more bent on scoring an advantage over its opponents than in laying deeply and broadly the future welfare of the country.

The Bulgarian Reparations Commission.

Exactly a year ago when the Inter-Allied Reparation Commission in Paris approved of the agreement made between the Bulgarian Government and the Reparation Commission in Sofia in regard to the amount of reparations to be paid by Bulgaria it was urged in these columns that the time had come when the Sofia Commission could begin to think of disbanding itself and handing over to the Legations in Sofia such work as remained in connection with the payment of reparations. Last week Lord Newton raised the question in the House of Lords, and expressed the hope that the Government would be able to announce that the British Mission, at all events, was going to be withdrawn. In his reply Lord Arnold said, that, although the Commission had accomplished the most difficult part of its task, its labours were not over, but an eye was being kept on administrative economy, and he hoped that the cost of the Commission for 1924 would be within £16,000, as compared with £36,000 in 1923 and over £40,000 in the two preceding years. As is known, Sir Elliot Colvin, the British delegate on the Inter-Allied Commission in Bulgaria, has intimated his wish to resign, and it may be inferred that for the present the headship of the British section of the Commission will devolve on Mr. H. J. Bruce, second in command. Lord Arnold paid a well-deserved tribute to Sir Elliot Colvin's work on the Commission. His Majesty's Government, he said, felt that the country was greatly indebted to him for the conspicuous ability with which he had performed the tasks incumbent on him. He had succeeded at all times in working in harmony with his French and Italian colleagues, and had successfully maintained friendly relations with the Bulgarian Government. All those who have had occasion to watch the work of the Commission will recognise that Lord Arnold understated rather than overstated the part played by Sir Elliot Colvin in bringing it about that the Commission came to be regarded as the sincere friend of Bulgaria.

The Hermes of Olympia.

It does not seem to be the foregone conclusion that Mr. Morgenthau had anticipated that Praxiteles' masterpiece, the statue of Hermes and the infant Dionysus, now at Olympia, will be sent to the United States, either for the express purpose of raising funds for Greek refugees or as a loan to the American Government in gratitude for the services that it has rendered to Greece. Whatever may have passed between M. Papanastasiou and Mr. Morgenthau on the subject, the scheme does not appear quite so feasible to the Greek Government, on second thoughts, and it is to be hoped that the United States will put an end to possible embarrassment on Greece's part by dissociating themselves from the proposal. The internationalisation of works of art by temporary exchange may be an admirable idea, but there was nothing attractive in the loan of Greece's archæological wealth merely for money-making purposes, or to expose her to the gibe that gratitude is a lively sense of favours to come.

The Sudan and Eritrea.

An interesting question has arisen between Italy and Great Britain as a result of the development work that is being undertaken in the Kassala province of the Sudan. The Sudan Government and the Sudan Plantations Syndicate are jointly interested in irrigation work, intended to promote cotton cultivation in the region where the Gash river loses itself in the soil north of Kassala town. The head waters of this river run for a considerable distance through the Italian colony of Eritrea, and although the Italian Government, in 1906, at a time when irrigation works were contemplated at Kassala, claimed to be considering a scheme for using the river, nothing more was heard of the idea. With the revival of the British plan for the opening up of Kassala, Italy has been moved to direct her attention again to the Gash waters. It is not yet known whether any irrigation scheme is practicable, but the anxiety of the Kassala Cotton Company lest there might be an appreciable reduction in the volume of the flood reaching their ground, as a result of irrigation works in Eritrea, is natural. The subject is under discussion between the British and Italian Governments, and a conference between the Governor of Eritrea and the Governor-General of the Sudan, assisted by experts, may take place to consider the lines of an agreement.

Transjordania.

The Transjordanian Administration came in for some harsh criticism last week in the House of Lords from Lord Raglan, whose uncompromising terms must have left doubt in the minds of his hearers as to the practical purpose which his questions were intended to serve. Lord Arnold, Under-Secretary for the Colonies, in replying, would not accept Lord Raglan's implied impeachment of the Palestine Government, but admitted that the present state of affairs in Transjordania could not be regarded with unmixed satisfaction and that there was room for improvement. To the credit of the Emir Abdullah's régime could be placed the cessation of raids into Palestine from Transjordania, and the security with which the Air Service between Cairo and Baghdad had been able to use Amman as its starting point for the flight over the six hundred miles of desert to the Tigris. Lord Arnold stated that the British Government was now engaged in considering the whole question of the direction in which improvement might be effected in Transjordania, and it hoped very shortly to enter into friendly discussion with the Emir on the subject. The recent change in the post of British Adviser to the Emir Abdullah, now occupied by Colonel Cox, has been followed, it will be noted, by the resignation of the Prime Minister, and it would seem as if the Transjordanian Administration was already taking to heart its shortcomings.

Rebellion in Afghanistan.

For some time past it has appeared to competent observers very doubtful whether the Ameer of Afghanistan would be able to carry through his programme of radical reforms without serious disturbances in the country. Even in Kabul he has found it difficult to collect round him for administrative purposes an adequate number of his subjects whose zeal for reform is up to the required standard, and it is no secret that the success of the Ameer's policy so far has been due to his own untiring efforts to keep the Government, so to speak, up to the mark. While, however, the capital could be persuaded to accept the new order with more or less readiness, the more distant tribes have at no time shown any approval of the measures introduced for the moral and material improvement of Afghanistan. Dissatisfaction with the Ameer's reforming zeal recently came to a head over the attempt to enforce strictly a system of compulsory military training which had previously existed in theory, but had not been applied with any attempt at consistency. A further cause for unrest was provided by the steps taken by the Afghan Government to arrest the perpetrators of the Kohat and Landi Kotal murders, who had taken refuge among the tribesmen. According to the latest reports the authorities have the situation in hand, as a result, no doubt, of the success that has attended the Ameer's efforts to reform the Army. Apart from the inherent conservatism of the tribesmen, and the fact that certain parts of Afghanistan have given in the past only nominal allegiance to the Ameer, religious prejudice has been evoked by the reforms, and the fanaticism of the mullahs is said to be evident in the risings that have taken place.

Bahrein.

A year ago important changes were made in the administration of the Bahrein Islands, and in THE NEAR EAST of July 12, 1923, our correspondent in the Persian Gulf described the abuses that had been allowed to grow up in the native Government and the measures then being taken to remove them. In our issue of November 29, reference was made to a letter that we had received from a member of the al Khalifah family, a grandson of the reigning Sheikh, which suggested that the new order was by no means to the liking of the people of Bahrein. Our comments on that letter have prompted the father of the writer to send us a communication which appears on another page. Sheikh Abdullah was appointed to assist his brother, Sheikh Hamad, when the latter was made regent in the place of their aged father, Sheikh Isa al Khalifah, who had already held the supreme authority in the islands for fifty-five years. Sheikh Abdullah explains that the letter sent by his son neither represented the latter's views, nor, indeed, corresponded with the true facts, and he pays a tribute to the part played by Great Britain in the control that she has exercised over the Persian Gulf. The Sheikh's testimony is the more welcome, as it is given without any prompting, and suggests that the native administration is indeed in progressive hands when one of the rulers takes advantage of the correspondence columns of an English newspaper to remove possible misconceptions about his country.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Tuesday Morning.

Scottish Home Rule.

There may be Englishmen who would regret it if Scotsmen were to pack up their somewhat extensive goods and chattels and to depart for ever for their native land; but in the House of Commons, at any rate, there are, as one suspects after last Friday's debate on the Scottish Home Rule Bill, introduced by Clydeside members, none such. For then occurred, if not the most indecent display of the extreme Socialists, then certainly their most uproarious display.

The Speaker was treated by them as any professional referee is treated by a partisan crowd in the lowest type of football. He had hurled at him all sorts of abuse, in which Messrs. Kirkwood and Maclean seem to have distinguished themselves. One would imagine from their remarks (kindly translated by the newspapers for us from their Gaelic English) that there was a sort of conspiracy to prevent the closure from being applied to their motion. But these people appear to see a conspiracy against them every time they do not get their own way. If they were only a little more intelligent they would perceive that they have only to incorporate into their Bill proposals that they should in future hurl their jibes only in Glasgow or in Edinburgh, and they would get their blessed Home Rule. Nobody wants to deny to Scotsmen the right to rule themselves. If they wish only to develop in peace their own country and forgo the wider game of ruling Great Britain, then who are the puny Englishmen to resist the appeal? Avanti! Mustapha Kemal has gained yet another convert. But just as the Anatolian peasant may not have said his last word yet, so, one imagines, the shrewd home-loving Scotsman is looking with tired dismay upon the Clydesiders' follies.

Mr. Churchill.

The trouble about Mr. Churchill, who has recently relapsed into customary activity, is that he is nearly always at once so engagingly right and so dazzlingly wrong. He is obviously right in insisting that there is no real, practical difference of principle between Liberal and Conservative, and his scheme to have a great Conservative Party with a Liberal wing is, therefore, attractive; but he is equally wrong in shouting that Socialism—and, incidentally, Socialism of a very similar nature to that which he was prepared to indulge in when a Minister in Mr. Lloyd George's Cabinet—is the real enemy of all upright men. This terrific bogey of Socialism which, with all the command of his splendid rhetoric, he is trying his hardest to realise, is, as most people know, an illusion. It is impossible for Liberals and Conservatives to effect a union on so unreal a basis as this, and it is equally impossible to resist the conclusion that this basis implies a union under Mr. Churchill's ægis. In short, it is a personal, not a national issue, this policy of anti-Socialism. As a side-line of a policy it would suit the country admirably, but of itself it is not important enough to swing the nation against a Labour Government.

But there is no doubt that when Mr. Churchill gets down to real anxieties, as apart from vague fears, he has the country with him. At Liverpool last week he had no difficulty in showing that it is stupid policy of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to abandon the McKenna Duties and to repudiate the resolutions of the Imperial Conference. He has so great a faculty for crystallising the definite objections to those immediately responsible for present discontents that it is hard to think that he will be out of Parliament very much longer. But it seems that wherever he goes he is bound to meet with bitter opposition, not only from the Labour Party, but also from his erstwhile colleagues, the Liberals. Only the other day Mr. Lloyd George had to write a letter to the papers pointing out Mr. Churchill's errors of fact. It was done, and accepted, very nicely, but it was none the less significant.

A Club for Labour.

Some months ago I recorded the move to secure for the Labour Party a club, and at that time premises were practically arranged somewhere on the Embankment. But at the last minute the negotiations fell through, and the party is still clubless, for the Parliamentary Labour Club is far too small an affair—merely a sort of rendezvous.

There is now revived talk of securing the Westminster Palace Hotel—which the Liberals had until they could return to the National Club—but the expense is the stumbling-block. The cost of getting it is said to be about a quarter of a million, and this at present is beyond the means of the Labour Party. However, it is inevitable that they should eventually hit upon some place that can be at once a political meeting-ground and a residential centre.

Cricket and the Weather.

There is, so we are told by the literary people who write on these things, no time like the period between the seasons of football and cricket; it is, they say, a pulsating, zestful time, when new youth flows into one. And it is a likely lie, certainly believed in by the very young and the very old. But ask any club cricketer, who has just spent three successive Saturdays moodily looking out of the pavilion (what time he has not spent therein playing bridge); ask any fair aspirant to tennis honours on grass courts; above all, ask the South Africans, every single one of whose matches so far has been spoiled by rain, what they think of our English weather, and they will reply, in strength of language according to their enumeration above.

We have had, in recent weeks, a perfect orgy of what the Admiralty and the Meteorological people call "fair intervals," which merely means a sufficient time between the showers to encourage one to keep in one's flannels. For the first considerable time that I can remember, Kipling's words have been justified.

Waterloo Bridge.

Waterloo Bridge was closed to all traffic on Sunday night, and the closing was a nasty reminder to the public that time and tide wait for no man. To this route across the river there is no real alternative, for the ways over Westminster and Blackfriars Bridges are a most inconvenient and roundabout route to Waterloo Station.

It was, of course, absurd that between Westminster and Blackfriars there should have been but this one bridge, but it is not untypical of our age, which believes in the new methods of getting about at all costs, that it should at this time in our history have run short of bridges, and in consequence be handicapped until stocks are once more adequate.

Dominant Topics.

What are the inhabitants of these islands most interested in at the moment? Housing, French Elections, the Derby? Not at all: Byfleet and Crumbles, where two very obnoxious murders have recently been committed. At any rate, that is so if the Press, which day after monotonous day devotes its hectic columns to the sordidest details of these two murders, can be used as a guide. It is simply appalling the amount of space that the papers give to these things; the more horrible or outré a criminal case may be, the more space must be given to it.

For this kind of "news" there can be no conceivable justification. The reading of it can do nobody any good.

The Leader of the Conservatives.

The Conservative campaign for the rumoured forthcoming general election has already begun with speeches by Mr. Baldwin and Lord Curzon. Both these speakers seemed confident that before long a Conservative Government would be in power. How far this confidence is shared by the country at large it is impossible to say; if the Press counts for anything at all it is not very wide.

There are very many among the opponents of the present Government who are perturbed by what they think the ineptitude of Mr. Baldwin's leadership of the Conservative Party. Now the attitude of the more prominent of the critics of the ex-Premier is entirely unscrupulous and certainly not to be trusted; but even those who admired Mr. Baldwin's fight on behalf of Protection are disappointed at the hollowness of his present policy. Mr. Baldwin is not a politician and he is not a leader. He has neither an absence of principle (except in the negative way, as exemplified by his hasty dropping of Protection), nor has he any personal magnetism which might compensate for the pitiable lack of constructive proposals in the Conservative Party's programme.

If the Conservatives do get in at the next election it will certainly not be owing to their positive virtues, but rather because the country is tired of the present Government. If only the Conservatives would think of something else than being in office—of the justification, for instance, of their being there! The Liberals appear to have shot their bolt with the defeat by the Government of the P.R. Bill. Can it be that the Conservatives have no bolt to shoot? Alter Ego.

DRAWINGS OF THE HOLY LAND.

At Walker's Galleries, New Bond Street, Miss Bridget Keir has a large exhibition of water-colour drawings, devoted to the subjects of London, the Holy Land, Egypt, and Italy. She is an industrious artist, and has brought back from Palestine, as being the result of work done there last spring, fifty drawings. One likes her quiet, reticent method; it fits admirably in with her conception of that country—always a Holy Land. But it is more the peace of the half-as-old-as-Time places—"the Peace man cannot mar"—that her pictures give as their most enduring impression than the mystery of Palestine's whole aura. Her imagination is, perhaps, a little too confined to scriptural memories. However, within those limits she does very pleasant work. It is difficult to choose between her many pictures, for her methods and finish seem to be identical in all. One of the most artistic is certainly "A Grey Day on the Sea of Galilee," in which the atmosphere—a thing that at other times she does not always attain successfully—is beautifully suggested. Another little gem (if that word may be excused) is the compact, detailed, and perfectly finished "View from above Haifa."

Almost all Miss Keir's scenes of Egypt are of the Nile, of whose lazy waters and white sails she has made some very delicate sketches. And one is particularly grateful to her for not overdoing her colours. Her exhibition closes on May 24.

Political Suspense.

Since his return to the capital from his country estates, the Prime Minister has said nothing and has scarcely been seen in public. So the expected revival in political activity consequent upon Zaghloul Pasha's coming back has not yet materialised. The text of Mr. Ramsay MacDonald's letter to Zaghloul Pasha has not yet been published, nor, from the Egyptian side, has there been any indication of what the reply to that letter is likely to be, nor of what is the present Ministry's attitude towards negotiations. As is always the case, the absence of definite news has produced innumerable rumours of all sorts and shapes and of every degree of verisimilitude. The latest of these reports is to the effect that Zaghloul Pasha intends to leave Egypt during the next few weeks and to take a month's tour at Vichy before going on to London to negotiate. Other gossip credits the Premier with the intention of returning to his country home, Mesguid Wassef, to spend the time before his departure in working out details of the Egyptian case to be presented in London, and in support of this expectation is cited the fact that the s.s. Dendera, on which Zaghloul Pasha returned the other day from Mesguid Wassef, has been ordered to keep up steam and be prepared to sail again at short notice. It would scarcely be worth while quoting all these rumours did they not illustrate the uncertainty in the public mind regarding the intentions of the Government, and, still more, the manner in which everything at the present time is subordinated to the coming negotiations. The Prime Minister has scarcely had an hour to attend to administrative matters since he took office, and now that he has abandoned the portfolio of the Interior, there is no pretence made of his being, in practice, at the head of the administration, which lacks a head or a directing hand. During the last few weeks, too, Fathallah Pasha Barakat, Minister of Agriculture, and, next to Zaghloul Pasha, the most influential man in the Wafd, has been in bed, recovering from an operation for appendicitis, and his absence has heightened the impression of the lack of a guiding hand at the wheel. Administratively, the country has been drifting ever since the present Government came into office; during the first few weeks the Ministers were exclusively occupied with receiving deputations of congratulation and with political questions, such as securing the release of military court prisoners, reinstating officials who had been dismissed by previous Governments, and, in turn, dismissing officials, such as Hilmy Issa Pasha, Mudir of Gharbia, Rashwan Pasha Mahfouz, Abdel Salam Bey Shazli, Mohammed Mokbel Pasha, Mahmoud Bey Shaheen, and numerous others who, in Zaghloulist eyes, had been over-zealous servants of the administrations of Adly Pasha Yeghen, Sarwat Pasha, and Yehia Pasha Ibrahim. These adjustments had scarcely been completed when the Premier had to retire to the country to rest, while his right-hand man, Barakat Pasha, entered hospital for an operation, and since that time the Government machine has been working mechanically without any policy or direction. From every Ministry comes the same story of decisions deferred, and it is a remarkable tribute to the popular trust and belief in Zaghloul Pasha that, in these circumstances, there has not been heard much more criticism of the Government. Hitherto the only murmurs have come from the Government officials themselves, particularly the lower grades, who are far from appreciating a policy of economy which deprives them of their normal periodical increases in pay, and several deputies representing provincial constituencies have told me that this discontent is, in the country districts, real and growing, especially since the deputies voted themselves salaries of £E.600 a year. But, on the whole, the country seems to have adopted the motto of "Trust Saad," and to be sticking to it with remarkable fidelity.

Khalifate Developments.

To a non-Moslem observer, the various local currents of opinion regarding the Khalifate are very puzzling, but these seem now to be converging into two main streams, the first directed by the Azhar Khalifate Committee, which was first in the field and which took the decision regarding the lapsing of Abdul Mejid's Khalifal mandate, and the second by a rival committee headed by a certain Sheikh Aboul Azaim. This second committee, like the first, is working for the holding of a pan-Islamic congress in Cairo next year, but, unlike the Azhar group, refuses to take any preliminary decisions of its own. That its opinions, though not expressed, regarding the position of Abdul Mejid are not identical with those of the more official committee may be gathered from the fact that the Aboul Azaim group derives its most powerful support from Prince Omar Toussoun, who, as President of the Egyptian Society for Relief of Victims of the

The Azhar Committee is taking active steps to promote the idea of the congress next March, and has just appointed an executive committee, whose sixteen members include most of the best-known religious leaders of Cairo, but, despite the fact that both committees, though opposed in other respects, favour the holding of a congress, it is long odds against the materialising of any such gathering.

The Arab Museum.

The Government has not yet found a successor to the late Aly Bey Bahgat, Director of the Museum of Arab Art, whose recent death was a serious blow to the study of the mediæval history of Egypt. Aly Bey was one of the very few Egyptians who take a sufficient interest in their country's history and past glories to make of them a serious study. He devoted himself heart and soul to the collection of treasures dating back to the early Moslem civilisation of Egypt, and, during the latter part of his life, carried on extensive and fruitful researches on the site of the old city of Fostat, founded by Amr, the Mohammedan conqueror of this country. The greater interest aroused by antiquities dating back to Pharaonic times has overshadowed the work of men like Aly Bey Bahgat, who, though held in high esteem by fellow archæologists of many nationalities, was practically unknown to his own countrymen—a fact upon which Aly Bey was wont, at times, to comment somewhat bitterly. Now that he has gone, the Government, having sought, in vain, an Egyptian to replace him, is considering the appointment of a foreigner as Director of the Arab Museum.

Germany and the Capitulations.

The murder of a wealthy British subject, of Syrian origin, Tewfik Bey Karam by name, in his house at Alexandria one night at the beginning of January, 1923, created a great stir at the time, but has now almost been forgotten. For that reason nobody seems to ask how it is that the alleged murderers who were arrested, one in India and one in Italy, some months afterwards, have not yet been brought to trial. This question will certainly be asked in the near future, for one of the two men, Fritz Dulich by name, arrives at Alexandria to-morrow morning from Trieste, where he had been arrested and kept by the Italian authorities for the past twelve months. The man alleged to have been his accomplice, Karl Lothmann, also a German, was arrested in Bombay, and has been in an Egyptian prison, awaiting trial, since last October. The Egyptian Government claims the right, since the abolition, by the Versailles Treaty, of German Capitulations in Egypt, to try the two men in the native courts, a claim which is hotly contested by the German Government, which insists that the German tribunals alone are competent, and requests the extradition of the two accused men. Now that both are in the country, some sort of settlement of the controversy will presumably be reached in the near future.

Questions in the Chamber.

Among questions asked in the Chamber of Deputies during the last few days two have been of especial interest, the first referring to the privileges—the most important of which is exemption from military service—enjoyed for long past by the Bedouin of Egypt, whose special treatment has been accorded on the theory that they act as frontier guards, ready to give warning of and assist in repelling raids by desert Arabs. In practice, however, it is the Bedouin who do most of the raiding there is to be done, and for some time past there has existed the feeling regarding their privileges to which expression has now been given in the Chamber of Deputies. In this connection it is interesting to note that Hamad Pasha el Bassel, Vice-President of the Wafd, is himself a Bedouin. The other question referred to last year's dispute—still unsettled—between the Egyptian and Hejaz Governments regarding the constitution of the Mahmal escort. It will be remembered that the Mahmal was recalled from Jeddah because King Hussein refused to accept along with it the medical personnel and equipment which the Egyptian Government had sent. There have been one or two attempts to patch up the quarrel, but without success, and though an answer to the question put in the Chamber was deferred, it is believed that the Egyptian Government will refuse to send the Mahmal this year unless King Hussein makes amends for what is considered to be the insult of last year to Egyptian dignity, and agrees to receive, with the Mahmal, the doctors and hospital equipment which the Egyptian Government considers necessary to safeguard the health of the Egyptian pilgrims.

The Case of Ferid Bey.

Since the prorogation of the Assembly public attention has not been allowed to wander from the alleged scandals in the internal administration, all of which have been laid at the door of Ferid Bey, the Minister of the Interior. The various independent or semi-independent Commissions of Inquiry which are investigating the cause célèbre concerning the return to Turkey of the three Armenian millionaires do not appear to have succeeded in bringing to light the whole story of who offered and who took the bribes; but a large crop of innuendoes and brutal accusations has sprung up in the columns of nearly all the newspapers, which are clamouring with significant unanimity for the head of Ferid Bey on a charger. All his "horrid past," painted in the most lurid colours, has been raked up with a muckrake, and the utterly damning fact that when he was a member of Damad Ferid's Cabinet in Constantinople he sent a telegram to Refet Pasha counselling him not to oppose British troops in the Samsoun area, is now being used as a powerful lever in order to detach him from his high office. The only result to date is that Refet Pasha resigned his seat as member for Constantinople as soon as his name was brought into prominence, whereas Ferid still firmly sticks to the seats of the mighty.

The wide publicity given to this incident, and the official or unofficial investigations, ridiculous as some of them are, have a certain value in that it becomes apparent that there is a body of opinion in this country which honestly desires to raise the moral level of the administration, and is prepared to do what must be humiliating to them as Turks —namely, to tell the truth openly to the world about the deplorable state of affairs in the new Turkey. As was to be expected, the Press comments on this affair do not stick very closely to the matter in hand, and they use this incident as a text on which to hang violent diatribes on the inefficiency and corruption of the whole of the internal administration. Whatever the underlying motives of this Press campaign may be—and they are not entirely disinterested—one good mark may be chalked up to the credit of the Republic: only under the new régime is such a thorough-going ventilation of the matter possible, and if any improvement is going to take place it is likely to be hastened rather than retarded by such publicity.

Mosul.

The opening of the Mosul negotiations, which will provide a useful gauge of the course of Turko-British relations in the immediate future, is awaited here with considerable impatience. Whatever the Turkish attitude is going to be, the disputed Mosul frontier appears to be commendably tranquil in contrast with the Syrian frontier zone. Whether this tranquillity is the result of the efficiency of the R.A.F. or of orders from Angora it is impossible to say, but it is noteworthy that the Press has recently given some prominence to the arrival at Adana of three men who call themselves the deputies for Mosul in the G.N.A. They are reported as having made a number of statements concerning the pure-blooded Turkism of the inhabitants of Mosul which do credit to their industry in adapting history to their uses, but do not enhance their reputation for common sense; they are also made responsible for the statement that the British, not content with having invented Irak, are now endeavouring to resuscitate the Assyrian Empire. Shades of Nebuchadnezzar, what new and horrible accusation will be hurled at the head of Mr. Ramsay MacDonald? All this must not be taken too seriously; it is nothing but the opening bars of the overture, but doubtless the same melodies, or variations on them, will recur time after time throughout the symphony which Sir Percy Cox, Fethi Bey, and others will shortly perform to a large audience.

CYPRUS.

Nicosia, April 12.

The Question of Tithes.

The taking of tithes on produce has been from time immemorial considered in the East to be the fairest method of raising revenue, since payment varies with the seasons—with good or bad years. The very light land tax that is levied has never been a subject of complaint; but the collection of tithes has involved manifold evils. The Turk, like many others, farmed out tithes to the highest bidder, a practice which, of course, led to the greatest abuses, to gross exactions, bribery, and corruption. Under British rule these abuses were swept away, as was the tithe on many articles of produce, by which villagers were needlessly harassed. Tithe was taken in money according to rates fixed by District Courts of Administration, on which elected native members sat. Assessment and collection, previously carried out by the same officials, were made distinct. After some years, however, circumstances seemed to show that it would be to the advantage of both Government and people that tithe should be taken in kind, but not according to the old methods. Cereal tithes (wheat, barley, oats, and vetches) were, after estimation by Tithe Superintendents, brought into stores, built or hired at convenient centres, allowance being made to tithe payers for cost of transport. The tithes were in due course sold by Government. Now, once more, the question—a very important one—is being considered whether tithe should not be abolished altogether and replaced by some other mode of taxation. But that the taking of tithes, as carried out under British administration, should be spoken of as "harsh and tyrannical," as it now is, certainly savours of ingratitude after all that has been done to purge the system.

It would seem that an opinion has prevailed that a change would be made this year. But the High Commissioner has recently explained that the only promise given is that the matter should be carefully and sympathetically considered. It is quite realised that a substitute for this source of revenue could only be found in some form of income-tax, which, involving inevitable complexity, would be very difficult to apply in Cyprus. All that advocates of the change can suggest is that Government should take the matter in hand as soon as possible until competent advisers can reach a solution, so that agriculturists may be relieved of what some writers in the Press now describe as a barbarous and intolerable burden.

Mosquitoes and Fever.

Cyprus, before the British occupation, and for some years after, had an unenviable reputation as a fever-sticken spot; and the term "Cyprus fever" came into common use, as though it were a recognised variety, although the complaint does not differ from that experienced in other parts of the Mediterranean. Drainage works and tree-planting did a good deal to mitigate the evil, but it was not until Sir Ronald Ross was invited by Sir Hamilton Goold-Adams to visit the island and advise measures that a systematic campaign against the anopheles was taken in hand. For some years energetic war was waged in accordance with his instructions, with excellent results. Complaints are now made that on the ground of economy efforts have been relaxed, with consequences that threaten a return to the conditions of the past. The winter and spring have brought into being swarms of mosquitoes in parts where they had been mostly wiped out. The Greek Press urges the Government not to spare the cost of enforcing energetic measures to avert a recurrence of pre-Ross conditions.

Agricultural Outlook.

Harvest prospects are unfavourable owing to failure of the later rains. Drought and hot winds have already so affected cereal crops that, even if copious rains should come, they could do little to improve matters. Gloomy views are, therefore, taken of what is practically certain to rank as a

"bad" year, and depression is increased by the lost hopes of an agricultural bank. It is suggested—by no means for the first time—that money from the accumulated surpluses should be applied to relieve the situation. It has been hoped that these might be devoted to the establishment of a bank. The Government reply has always hitherto been that this fund is reserved to draw upon in case of extreme need and distress, such as records show have occurred from time to time. The Government, says the Voice of Cyprus, is like a miser who, suffering from an exhausting complaint, deprives himself of what is needed for recovery, and allows his body to become so enfeebled by hunger and want that he is at last reduced to extremity rather than take a trifle from his hoards.

Locusts have appeared in the Famagusta district, in the north-east of the island, and the usual annual campaign will be needed. This pest, owing to the facilities afforded for deposition of eggs, is hardly likely to be eradicated for a long time, if ever.

General News.

Byron celebrations have been carried out in several places. The Hellenic Consul, M. S. Liates, is transferred temporarily to Beyrout, and has been to Nicosia to bid farewell to the High Commissioner. He will be replaced by M. Sakellarides, who is shortly expected. The Chief Secretary, Mr. Fenn, has taken fifteen days' leave for a flying visit to Constantinople. The High Commissioner has paid a visit to a flax factory—another sign of progress. Loans are being applied for for water supplies and other enterprises. Great interest is being taken in the British Empire Exhibition, and it is confidently hoped that Cyprus interests may profit from it in various ways. The Eastern Telegraph Company will have a station at Wembley in direct communication with a central office in Nicosia.

Jerusalem, May 3.

The Tourist Season.

The end of April marks the conventional close of the Palestinian tourist season. This year the season has most emphatically been the most successful since 1914 (it is not probable that Jerusalem will ever again see the like of the pre-War seasons, with the influx of thousands of Russian pilgrims). The largest numbers have come from America; but Americans almost always come in such tightly organised crowds and are whisked through the country in such terrific haste that none but transport people and hotelkeepers derive any profit from them, and both of these classes must perforce share their gains with the big tourist agency concerned. Last week-end there descended upon us 700 Americans. They landed in Palestine on the Saturday, and before sundown on Monday they were gone, having "done" the whole of Jerusalem (eight hours), Jericho, the Dead Sea, Galilee and all. Some day it will be interesting to meet one of these 700 victims and ask what he thinks of Palestine.

Fortunately, the type of longer-staying, non-conducted, and therefore better-paying tourist is on the increase. One suspects, much of the time, that it is possible to stay longer in Palestine, see more of it and understand it better, and manage everything more economically by a visit untrammelled by the whittled-down, petrified "tourist-big-business" methods; for any educated visitor Palestine is now, as nearly as can be, "fool-proof"; he does not really require to be wet-nursed. Again, one cannot urge too often or too emphatically the fact that it is a mistake to think that Palestine (and particularly Jerusalem) is unvisitable except from December to April. With but the barest precautions the country can be seen and enjoyed equally well in June or August (and the visitor can then also enjoy the advantage of the very much reduced steamship fares).

Danger Times Past.

The danger posts of Passover and "The First of May" have been passed without any semblance of trouble. The truth of the matter is that "seething discontent" is absent; the protagonists of trouble are lapsing into slightly ridiculous figures. Automatically they register protests at every fresh move made by Government, and on every other possible occasion, but it is becoming increasingly plain that they have no longer a nervous, grievance-stricken public on whom they can play at will or at need. The Government is said to have adopted a few safeguards against trouble in Jaffa on the First of May (in memory of the murderous outbreaks three years ago), but they seem to have been of the slightest, and only observable by certain elements in the Arab Press. Somebody in authority among the local police does, however, seem to have "dropped a brick" of the most amazing and incredible stupidity last Saturday on the occasion of the "Holy Fire" ceremony in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. Among the police stationed there as usual to assist in keeping a slight degree (which is the most that is ever hoped for) of order were several Jews! They were promptly observed, but it is a great credit to the orderliness and peacefulmindedness of the Christian Arabs that these unwelcome guests were not severely handled, and that the normally highly excitable crowd kept its head in such a dangerous and unexpected crisis. There was no disorder; the Orthodox Patriarch had not yet arrived; a body of Arabs simply made for the Patriarchate and told the Patriarch that he would not be suffered to leave his quarters until the offending elements were removed. The Jewish police were, of course, replaced as soon as the matter came to the ears of the Governor.

Europeans who have ever been present at this strange ceremony will learn with satisfaction that the sword dancer who used to do his tricks among the crowds within the building was this year kept outside in the courtyard, in consequence of the efforts of certain young Orthodox laymen with a developing sense of what is befitting.

BAHREIN.

To the Editor of THE NEAR EAST.

Sir,—Much has been written, but it is only about what he knows that one should write. I am not one who likes to take part in these discussions, but I write about the present state of affairs in Bahrein to correct the untrue things written about it. I am sorry about the letter sent you by my son Mohamed, for what he wrote was not his own views, but the views of some of his companions, who, by trickery, got him to sign the letter.

As for myself, I have told everybody that I will help my brother Sheikh Hamad to put right the affairs of the Government of Bahrein and to set the country in order.

Those who say that the British Government is going to take Bahrein from us are speaking what is far from the truth and contrary to British honour. The British Government is the greatest protection of the rights of the Bahrein Government, and has had Bahrein under the wing of its protection for nearly 100 years. As to the new arrangements in Bahrein, such administrative arrangements are common in every civilised land, and anyone who views the matter with a just eye must see how quickly the country has gained prosperity, and that justice is the same for rich and poor. In regard to the Mohammedan law courts, they are working as they did before, but are doing even more work. I thoroughly approve of the improvements that are now being made in Bahrein, which very much needed them.

[Sealed by the seal of Abdullah (Sheikh) bin Isa.]

Bahrein, April 4.

[The above letter is a free translation from a letter in Arabic received from Sheikh Abdullah bin Isa al Khalifah of Bahrein. Reference is made to it in Notes of the Week. A postscript in English is appended as follows :]

I shall be obliged if you would write the meaning of the above-mentioned writing in your nice paper, so that people may know the truth and the false ideas may be removed from them, and I am, Dear Sir,—Yours faithfully, (Signed) ABDULLAH (Sheikh).

The son of Isa of Bahrein.

MOROCCO.

To the Editor of THE NEAR EAST.

Sir,—I have read with interest Sir Valentine Chirol's impressions upon the opinions held by the Moors on religious matters. I enjoy everything that comes from Sir Valentine's facile pen, but in the present case I fear that he has been led to put on paper what others have wished he should, and not what he himself has investigated. It is a great temptation to return after lavish entertainment to praise out of all recognition one's host. Upon this temptation is based the really great effort which is made in Morocco to entertain foreign notables, and an effort which is well repaid if the notable in question will rush to print as soon as he gets back to his own country in order to repay the hospitality that he has received.

A "Protectorate" is always defined by the protector, and never by the protected. Marshal Lyautey's definition is the usual one, and is worn threadbare as a fine example of modern cant. Practice differs from the theory to the usual extent, and the "Protectorate" in Morocco came into being in the same old way. Sir Valentine has not yet found perfection in Morocco. Great progress has been made in magnificent Government buildings and costly high roads, but, like all rapid progress, it has required enormous capital expenditure. The capital was found during the War and immediately after. Such reckless expenditure by nations who cannot even pay interest upon the debts they have already contracted should not be encouraged. Instead of standing open-mouthed at the wonders of the French Protectorate, let us put ourselves in the position of the thoroughly disgruntled French taxpayer or the unfortunate Moor, who is obliged to pay heavy taxes for something which he neither understands nor needs. Even the Frenchman who has been enticed out to Morocco in order to colonise is wholeheartedly against the prodigal administration of the Protectorate.

Sir Valentine writes of the "divines of the great Sunni University of Fez"; here he is surely mistaken. He rightly calls them uncompromising; they are so uncompromising that they consider the Sultan of Morocco as a puppet in the hands of a Christian Republic, but never as a Khalif of Islam, or any part of Islam. Yusuf is prayed for, not as Khalif of Islam, but as the temporal ruler (and that with some amusement), just as the subjects or citizens of Christian Powers pray for their temporal rulers. How can a Christian-protected Sultan be a commander of the faithful Mohammedan? It is absurd. Marshal Lyautey may like to think this and to impress it upon his guests, but he cannot realise it. Many municipalities in Morocco are composed entirely of Moors, but the municipalities, if, indeed, this is a correct translation, are controlled by the "Services Municipaux," French Bureaux that employ large numbers of highly paid officials, who impose their will upon the cowed sheep of the municipalities.

Sir Valentine may be forgiven for being enthusiastic over his winter in Morocco, but he must spend many more winters before he can, or should, speak with authority on the mysterious land of the Moors. "The onlooker sees most of the game," but he must, besides watching with uncontrolled admiration the delicate footwork of the brilliant centre-forward, have an eye for the shivering goalie, who dreads the moment when the attack may recoil upon him. Sir Valentine has enjoyed one winter in Morocco; let him spend another, this time not at the feet of the mighty, swallowing the crumbs that they carefully drop into his mouth, but among the workers, the taxpayers, and the Moors themselves.

My letter has grown long, but I trust that you will nevertheless grant it the same publicity as Sir Valentine's article in order that those far removed from the sham diamond in the French tiara may not be misled. We ourselves have many Protectorates, all of which compare very favourably with the French pattern. What of the British Protectorates such as the Sudan, Uganda, Nigeria Protectorate, and North Borneo? Do we not take greater pains to uphold native customs, and do we not interfere less with the native? Do we not progress more surely and less spectacularly than our friends across the Channel? I submit that we do; moreover, we spend our own money in doing so.—I am, etc.,

THE SPELLING OF IRAK.

To the Editor of THE NEAR EAST.

Sir,—I notice that in your journal you are in the habit of spelling 'Iraq as Irak. Might I point out that this is incorrect?

The correct spelling of this word is 'Iraq (which form, as you may be aware, the Permanent Committee of Geographical Names have recognised).

It is true that in many cases wrongful spellings of place names have become "conventionalised," and are therefore best left as they are. I do not think, however, that the spelling "Irak" can be looked upon as one of these.

Trusting that you will not think me pedantic in writing to you on such an unimportant matter.—I am, etc.,

[The system on which THE NEAR EAST has tried to regulate the spelling of foreign words, both of Arabic and other languages, is to convey as near as permissible the sound in the original.

It is true that in Arabic qaf differs from kaf, but the average reader is quite unable to differentiate between a q and a k. The use of q in English without a following u is unknown, and so to avoid Iraqi we adopted Irak and Iraki.

Further, the use of accents and of breathings, for whatever language, seems undesirable to us.—ED.].

THE NEAR WEST.

To the Editor of THE NEAR EAST.

Sir,—Your judgment on questions concerning the Near East is so well balanced that we should like to see it equally so when you deal with the Near West—that is, Ireland.

We now have perfectly definite information that in 1920 Ulster was given by Act of Parliament territories, which the Irish Republican Party desire to take from her.

The "Treaty" with the South was drawn up in 1921 without the consent of Ulster. If its delimitation clauses meant (Lord Birkenhead says they did not mean) taking over large territories from Ulster, given to her by Act of Parliament in 1920, the British Government acted ultra vires. Ulster has six counties. She was entitled to nine; but agreed to take six. If Fermanagh and Tyrone were taken from her because in quantity (we do not say in quality) they have a slight preponderance of Nationalists, she would have to "close down"—not quite a good thing for the Empire, or for the protection of the minority in quantity, but not in quality of Loyalists in the South.—I am, etc.,

BERESFORD POTTER.

THE ROYAL ROUMANIAN VISIT.

The warmth of the official welcome accorded to their Majesties the King and Queen of Roumania will not, it is to be hoped, have hidden from them the spontaneous nature of the enthusiastic welcome which awaited them from the London public. It was an exceptionally large crowd that thronged the approaches of Victoria Station a long time before the Royal visitors arrived on Monday, May 12, from Dover, where the Prince of Wales had gone to meet them, and all along the route to Buckingham Palace a great concourse of people had assembled to cheer or wave a greeting. At Victoria Station King George and Queen Mary, accompanied by the Duke and Duchess of York, Prince Henry, and several other members of the Royal Family, met their Royal guests, among others present being Mr. Ramsay MacDonald and other Ministers and the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs of the City of London.

Two hours after the arrival at Buckingham Palace King Ferdinand and Queen Marie paid a ceremonial visit to the Cenotaph; here the Queen laid a bouquet of white roses on the steps and the King placed a wreath tied with ribbon of the Roumanian colours at the foot of the monolith.

In the evening a State banquet was given at Buckingham Palace in honour of their Majesties. In proposing the toast of their health, King George referred to the fact that it was thirty years since the last Roumanian State visit to England. His Majesty spoke of the sympathy and understanding with which the development and progress of Roumania had been followed in this country, of the new and stronger links forged by common suffering in a common cause, and to the joint efforts now being made by Roumania and Great Britain as members of the League of Nations to preserve, through the League's instrumentality, concord and mutual confidence among the peoples of the world.

On Tuesday King Ferdinand and Queen Marie were the guests of the City of London. An address of welcome was read in the Guildhall Library in the presence of the Prince of Wales, the Duke and Duchess of York, and other members of the Royal Family, the address being presented in a gold casket. On the conclusion of this ceremony luncheon was served in the Great Hall, where over 700 guests were assembled. After the toast of King George and Queen Marie, the Lord Mayor proposed the toast of the King and Queen of Roumania. King Ferdinand replied, and concluded by proposing the toast of the Lord Mayor and Corporation of London.

S. P. G. IN INDIA.

The S.P.G. Delegation to India arrived back in England last week to report to the society, after having visited all the dioceses in the Province of India, Burma, and Ceylon, with the exception of Assam and Travancore, whose bishops it met when present, by invitation, at the Episcopal Synod held in Calcutta in January last. The tour has been a strenuous one, amounting to about 25,000 miles in a little under seven months, in the course of which the four delegates (the Rev. A. H. Dolphin, the Rev. T. Basil Wood, Mr. H. T. Knowlton, and Miss Tickell), either collectively or individually, managed to visit all the important centres assisted by the society's grants, as well as learning from the work of other Anglican and non-Anglican organisations labouring on behalf of the Indian Church and of the Anglo-Indian and Domiciled Communities.

THE INDIAN LABOUR PROBLEM.

The position in regard to Indian Labour shows but little sign of improvement. On the men's side we continue to hear of widespread strikes, usually unjustified by the economic conditions, frequently fomented by political agitators, and sometimes unhappily marked by violence and disorder. Below these manifestations of dissatisfaction with the present, we can detect the rise of no such legitimate aspirations as might encourage hope for the future. Labour in the mass is still slack, casual, and inefficient; if there be any new incentive actually in operation the result is not yet visible; and the hope that Indian work will make India rich appears to be receding rather than approaching. It is, however, with the other side that we are concerned to-day, with the educated classes, who stand committed to a policy of industrial development, and who must do most of the spadework if that policy is to be successful. Hitherto they have contributed words rather than work, and their words, if they are ineffective in practice, at any rate suffice to prove that they have started on the wrong road. Indian brains of to-day are, in fact, repeating the mistake which vitiated so much of the work of the early economists in the West. They overlook the fact that workmen are human beings; they put far too much trust in mere mechanical adjustments, such as tariffs, railway rates, and the like, and they have not yet realised that for a solution of their difficulties they must look closely into hearts rather than schedules. Unfortunate as it is, this attitude does not come as a surprise to students of India's past, for it arises naturally out of what has gone before. Indians of the present day desire a large increase in the national wealth, but, with very few exceptions, they have not yet escaped from the influence of the old system which for so long kept India poor. That system pivoted on the whip. Artisans of all grades were kept down to the bare level of subsistence, and could not hope to rise by their own efforts, but, to provide the necessary incentive, they were beaten into some semblance of efficiency, and, in one form or other, compulsion is still the idea underlying most of what is written in India on the subject.

There is, indeed, a certain change, for the direct appeal is now made to the policeman rather than the lash, but the old inspiration still holds good. If anything is unsatisfactory, a rule must be made to correct it, a rule with penalties enforceable by a magistrate. If drunkenness is suspected, the supply of spirits must be cut off, and the workman driven to the clandestine consumption of hemp drugs or cocaine. Of the more hopeful alternative, leading the workman to a wiser mode of life, there is scarcely a hint; he must be driven, and the field of his individual activities, already far too narrow, must be still further restricted. We read, indeed, of education, compulsory, of course, for the workman's children, and many worthy Indians grasp at this panacea, ignoring the fact that the industrial position of their country will be settled, for good or for evil, long before the schools will have had time to produce any definite result. Of social leadership, on the other hand, of help or guidance, we read scarcely a word. A few educated Indians may occasionally refer to what it is the fashion to call welfare work, but in their view that is purely a matter for specialists, for philanthropic medical women, or for missionaries paid by Europe or America. Foreigners may give a lead, if they care to take the trouble: Indians may be content to devise restrictions and see to their rigorous enforcement. Such, at least, is the impression left on our minds by a perusal of what has lately been published on the subject in numerous Indian journals. There are, of course, fine phrases and generous sentiments, but when we penetrate below these, we come to the fundamental conception that the workman must be driven, by somewhat different methods indeed, but in essence as his ancestors have always been driven in the past.

In our view this conception is both wrong and dangerous. The Indian workman as we know him is a human being, at heart very like his would-be drivers, but the natural instincts making for efficiency and improvement have been dulled and blunted by secular repression. To pursue the traditional policy of repression can only make things worse. From the lowest economic standpoint, that policy must make labour in mines and factories even more unpopular than it now is, and, since the supply is already inadequate, it must make for national poverty rather than for national wealth. From the higher standpoint of nation-building, it must be equally injurious, for nations are built of men and women, while the policy in question can produce nothing better than beasts of burden. The ideals of patriotic Indians require for their realisation first of all the removal of that inhibition of natural instincts which now keeps labour inefficient, and consequently keeps the country poor. What is wanted now is a definite impulse towards a higher standard of living, and Indians in a position to lead will be well advised to leave questions of restriction to the authorities, already predisposed to that line of action, and concentrate their own energies on showing the working classes how to make life better. The corner-stones of the new India they hope to build must be wise spending, working to spend, and saving now to spend later on. A comfortable home life and wider interests outside the home, are, when taken together, the best guarantees of steady and efficient work; the pioneer efforts of devoted missionaries have shown that they may be as effective in India as elsewhere; but India cannot rely indefinitely on foreign charity to operate on the extensive scale which is required, and it is essential to harmonious national development that the bulk of the work should be done by Indians for Indians. In our judgment the central problem of Indian labour must be attacked on these lines, to build up gradually a self-respecting industrial class, eager to improve its economic position, and spending with increasing wisdom the increasing remuneration which it earns. On these lines India can hope to advance steadily in wealth, and, what is far more important, in the social worth for which an increase in wealth is the indispensable preliminary. The course now favoured by the educated classes leads in the opposite direction, to poverty and degradation, not merely for the workers themselves, but for the embryo nation which looks so largely to them for its support.

GREAT BRITAIN AND IRAK.

(From Our Baghdad Correspondent.)

Opening of the Constituent Assembly.

After months of delay and the overcoming of innumerable difficulties, the members of the Constituent Assembly were eventually elected, and met for the first time on March 27, the opening ceremony being performed by H.M. King Faisal, in the presence of H.E. the High Commissioner, the Air Marshal, and most of the senior Government officials, both Arab and English. The King made a striking figure in Arab dress, the added dignity of flowing aba and kafiyah being well worth the murmurs of some Baghdad citizens, who would have preferred to see their sovereign dressed like themselves on State occasions in the more civilised frock coat and check trousers!

The King's Speech.

The King himself delivered the speech from the Throne. After giving thanks to the Almighty for His help in guiding the destinies of the country during the last two and a half years of his reign, and for bringing about the meeting of the first democratic council the country has known, His Majesty emphasised the importance of the present Assembly's share in the work of restoring to Irak its former independence and prosperity—a responsibility which took the form of considering and reaching a decision upon three points, each of great importance for the future of the State. These were :—

(1) The acceptance or repudiation of the Anglo-Irak Treaty as modified by the Protocol.

(2) The drafting of an Organic Law to safeguard personal and public rights.

(3) The drafting of an Electoral Law by which the Parliament of the future would be chosen.

His Majesty continued by pointing out that the Treaty which would be submitted to them for ratification was the result of efforts spread over two years in frequently changing circumstances, and subject to varying political influences. It was only by securing the help of Great Britain that this country could hope to maintain its national existence and survive the dangers which threaten it. Hence he earnestly hoped that the Assembly would ratify the agreement reached between the two Governments as being the most promising way of obtaining the fulfilment of their natural desire to enter the League of Nations and to secure satisfactory boundaries for their country. After a further reference to the Organic and Electoral Laws, the King closed his speech amid loud and prolonged bursts of applause.

The reply to the Royal Address, submitted some days later, while moderate in tone and friendly to Great Britain, laid stress on the fact that the Assembly could agree to nothing which was likely to prejudice their national aspirations. At the same time it betrayed some anxiety regarding the country's northern boundary, and it was evident that the inclusion of the Mosul vilayet within the frontiers of Irak was a question of supreme importance to the Assembly.

The Deputies.

The Constituent Assembly consists of one hundred deputies. Considering the clumsiness of the present electoral machinery, and the little experience Irak has had in selecting representative spokesmen, the Assembly is remarkable in that it comprises all shades of political opinion, from the extreme Nationalist, who sees a deliberate insult to his country's independence in the fact that King George's name precedes that of King Faisal in the Treaty, to the tribal sheikh from the desert, for whom brains and experience count for little against birth. As an illustration of this, it may be mentioned that one of the leading tribal deputies, on the ground that his lineage was longer and nobler than that of any other member, declared that he could suffer no one to be President but himself. As opposition might have aroused the fierce Bedouin pride and led to difficulties, his claim was not disputed. It was, however, intimated to him that the President's first duty was to read out and explain to the Assembly the intricacies of the Organic Law. Affrighted by this ordeal from pressing his claim further, the sheikh was reconciled to holding a less exalted position by the reflection that, as most of the tribal deputies could neither read nor write, the President's chair would almost certainly be filled by a townsman. It was apparently less of an indignity to sit under a man of comparatively ignoble birth than under one whose claims of birth rivalled those of the sheikh himself.

Though the Assembly contains trained and efficient lawyers, financiers, divines, wealthy business men, large landowners, and most of the Ministers of the present Cabinet, there are very few who combine previous political experience with brains and birth, the latter still counting for much in this new democracy. In this minority is included Abdul Muhsin Beg as Sa'adun, the former Prime Minister. By selecting him by a large majority to be their President, the Assembly may be congratulated on the soundness of their first official act.

A surprising feature of the present Assembly is the large proportion of tribal members, these making up more than 40 per cent. of the total number of deputies. Comparing the large tribal with the small urban population, the former are by no means over-represented; but the surprise lies in the fact that, in view of the old enmity existing between the tribal and the urban and effendi class, an electoral law should have been passed which permitted of such strong tribal representation. One can only assume that, in the framing of the Electoral Law for the Constituent Assembly, old prejudices yielded to the desire on the part of the British authorities for a less restricted suffrage, or that the tribesmen, overcoming their customary fear of innovation, registered themselves as electors in unexpectedly large numbers. Whatever the reason, the tribal sheikhs have never before been so strongly represented, and it is to be hoped that they will prove themselves worthy of the distinction.

The Anglo-Irak Treaty.

Though, as mentioned in a preceding paragraph, the Constituent Assembly was called together to deliberate on three important points, the question of the Anglo-Irak Treaty has taken the field to the exclusion of the others. By the terms of the Treaty, Great Britain's exercise of its mandatory powers is limited to four years, or until such time as Irak is admitted to the League of Nations, whichever is the shorter period. The Assembly has to decide between two alternatives—ratification or rejection. An early ratification was expected, especially as, on its opening, a majority of the Assembly were in favour of this. But to those with a knowledge of Oriental psychology, some delay appeared inevitable, even if for no better reason than because it postponed for the deputies the always disagreeable task of making up their minds. A committee was formed, composed of a deputy from each liwa, to examine the Treaty and the Subsidiary Agreements; and as if to prolong its task it arranged to sit only three times weekly. Reasonable criticism that a matter of such urgency and importance required to be dealt with more expeditiously, and sarcastic suggestions that daily and nightly sittings should be held, left the committee unmoved, protected as the members were from making any undue exertion by the fact that it was the month of Ramadan. This dilatoriness may be due to a not unnatural desire to allow time for public opinion on the Treaty to crystallise, and thus afford a basis for the formulation of their final recommendations. In some quarters, however, it is asserted that the delay is encouraged by certain ex-Ministers, who hope, by embarrassing the present Cabinet, to secure its fall and their own subsequent re-elevation; while in others the members of the committee are said to be desirous, by not showing too great a readiness to accept the Treaty, to pose before the nation as protectors of its honour and independence. As things stand at present, it appears probable that the committee will advise neither ratification nor rejection, but will urge amendment. Whether the British Government will approve such a course of action remains to be seen.

The Sheikhs' Ultimatum.

The above-mentioned delay has given to the tribal deputies an opportunity of making a change of front somewhat embarrassing to the Irak Government. Although they were new to political life, it did not take them long to perceive that some of the professional politicians were actuated by purely selfish motives. Hence, though they had already agreed to support the Treaty, they came to the conclusion that it was folly to put their seals to its ratification without some quid pro quo. Accordingly they submitted a madhbata to the King, making their acceptance of the Treaty conditional upon the granting of certain terms. These, though not in themselves unreasonable, would have rendered it difficult for the Government to control the wild and turbulent tribes of this country, while the demand that no tribal lands should be granted to foreign concessionaries would seriously have affected that agricultural development of which Irak stands so much in need. As the development schemes under consideration aim at turning wide stretches of desert into fertile cotton fields, it would appear that the sheikhs could find no objection on this score, but, in point of fact, they fear that their cultivators would at once leave them to serve under the foreign concessionaire. From this one may perhaps infer that the patriarchal rule of the sheikhs is not so fatherly as might be supposed. Whether they propose to persist in their present attitude is still uncertain.

The Lawyers of Baghdad.

From among the ranks of the lawyers of Baghdad come the most determined opponents of the Treaty, and their propaganda has been as intensive as their misrepresentation of the facts. Some of their number arranged a political meeting to which the deputies were to be invited—a meeting which probably would not have come into such prominence had not the Government at the last minute forbidden its being held. As permission was eventually granted, this decision can only be regretted, the more so as it led to a heated discussion among the deputies, with the consequence that Nuri Pasha Sa'id, Minister of Defence, tendered his resignation. As a result of a madhbata to the King, signed by a majority of the deputies, his resignation was not accepted.

When the postponed meeting eventually took place, several anti-Treaty speeches (as had been anticipated) were made. The main objections appear to be as under :—

(1) That under the Military Agreement the command of all troops, whether British or Iraki, is vested in the event of war in the British Commanding Officer, who, in addition, will be able to assume administrative control in areas under martial law.

(2) That financial control is too stringent, and extends over too long a period.

(3) That certain clauses in the Judicial Agreement relating to the appointment of British judges is derogatory to both the dignity and independence of Irak.

(4) That Great Britain gives no written guarantee that it will defend the frontiers of Irak against external aggression.

If, as one of the vernacular papers points out, one assumes that the Treaty is between enemies, it is easy to read into the terms strange misunderstandings, which vanish at once when one remembers that it is a treaty between Allies. The terms concerning British judges then become, not a calculated insult to the Irak nation, but a compromise by which it is hoped to avoid the insistence by foreign Powers on the introduction of those very Capitulations which have been a stranglehold on the development and progress of Egypt. Nor can England give the desired pledge that she will defend the frontiers of Irak against external aggression—frontiers at the present moment meaning those of the Mosul vilayet—for the reason that it has already agreed to abide by the decision of the League of Nations in this matter, in the event of Turkey and England being unable to come to an amicable understanding. As regards the objection to the Military Agreement, a lawyer's training does not perhaps inculcate the elementary canon of military science, that supreme command in the field must be vested in one person; and the clear thinking which one associates with the legal mind must have been lacking when it was imagined that the Iraki officer commanding the newly raised Arab Army would be regarded as a suitable generalissimo of the British and Iraki forces in this country.

Assassination of Deputies.

Political meetings, however deplorable in tone, may be treated with a nonchalance which cannot be assumed when it comes to a question of assassination. The murder in Nasiriyah, shortly before the opening of the Assembly, of Abdul Karim as Sabti, one of the deputies of that distant and lawless liwa, created no great excitement, as it was felt that his unscrupulous life had made for him so many enemies that his death might be due as much to personal enmity as to political influences. A greater stir was made when, in broad daylight in the streets of Baghdad, an attempt was made to assassinate two of the deputies from Hillah. Though severely wounded, they were able to recognise one of their assailants as a lawyer, and, as a result, most of the members of that profession found themselves arrested. The majority were released some little time later, but four, including Ali Mahmoud al Muhami, who is said to have been one of those who fired the actual shots, have been remanded. As the two wounded men were staunch supporters of the Treaty, this act is regarded as part of an organised attempt to terrorise the other deputies into refusing to ratify the Treaty. Political differences so often fan into flame smouldering animosities, and the peculiar sanctity attaching to political offences so frequently encourages the perpetration of hasty actions which would not normally be committed, that it is difficult to agree with this view.

Political Opinion in Baghdad.

Of the two political parties, the Nationalists are the more vociferous, the better organised, and possessed of greater energy. By clamour, promises, and threats, they are gaining adherents at the expense of the other party, which, for want of a better name, may be termed the Moderates. The former can be roughly divided into three main groups, the first two of which are opposed to the Treaty :—

(1) Those whose opinions are influenced by their religious views. These are either imbued with a conservative dislike of all progress, inevitable in the face of the teaching of Islam, or object to the Treaty in that it entails some form of control by a Christian Power.

(2) Those with more liberal tendencies, who, though not resenting a Treaty with a foreign Power, even if Christian, either object for reasons of personal animosity to that power being Great Britain, or, because of former ties, regret that it is not Turkey.

(3) The opinion of the third group may be summed up in the words of Nuri Pasha Sa'id, Minister of Defence, in a recent long statement on the Treaty. "What," he asks, "is the addition of another four years, if we may put it in this way, to the centuries of slavery we have already endured, compared with a refusal of the Treaty, which would kill not only our own future, but that of the whole Arab race, which has placed all its hopes on Irak? . . . Mosul to Irak is as the neck to the body. . . . Which is best for our country—to cede some of its rights for four years, or to yield its neck to the enemy for ever? Let the wise choose the lesser evil."

The Moderates are composed of those who are content with things as they are, those who are prepared to leave the destinies of Irak in the hands of the country which has freed it from its former yoke, and some who regret that a British was ever replaced by an Arab administration.

The sheikhs, though not unaffected by those influences which have created the Nationalist Party, may be said, generally speaking, to be included among the Moderates, for reasons peculiarly their own. They have not forgotten the treatment meted out to them in Turkish times by the townsman and the effendi, nor that they owe to a British Administration their present position of importance in the political life of the country. Most of them in their hearts favour the Treaty.

At the moment of writing (May 1) the political situation is less satisfactory than it was at the opening of the Constituent Assembly. Owing to the propaganda of the Nationalists, a sure majority in favour of the Treaty does not, as it once did, now exist in the Assembly. Of the deputies about one-third are in favour of rejection, one-third in favour of ratification, and one-third undecided, with, perhaps, a leaning towards rejection.

Among the British officials in the service of the Irak Government one notices a feeling of despondency. They believe that the Treaty will be to the benefit of Irak, and is desired by the country at large; hence they see with regret that the deputies, swayed for the moment by a few extremists, are in danger of taking a step which will not only undo all the work of the past years, but, as even those opposed to the Treaty admit, will plunge the country in anarchy. If, however, the British Government takes up a firm attitude, and makes it perfectly clear that rejection will be followed by immediate evacuation, there seems little doubt that the Treaty will be ratified. "It has taken England a long time," said a prominent Arab official to the writer, "to learn the lesson that the Iraki knows no reason except that of the big stick."

REFUGEES IN GREECE.

Under the chairmanship of Lord Burnham, a meeting was held at the Mansion House on May 8 dealing with the problem of the Greek refugees from Asia Minor. It was arranged by the Imperial War Relief Fund, the Save the Children Fund, the League of Nations Union, and the Anglo-Hellenic League. After Lord Burnham had called attention to the magnitude of this question and the way in which the Greeks were grappling with it, Mr. Henry Morgenthau, President of the League of Nations Refugee Settlement Commission in Greece, addressed the gathering. He compared the present movement into Greece with the exodus of the Jews. He said that 350,000 of the 1,000,000 Greeks from Asia Minor were now engaged in productive work, but the rest could only be absorbed if the League were successful in securing a long-term league. Dr. W. A. Kennedy, Chief British Relief Administrator in Greece, said that the British had been responsible for 90 per cent. of the relief work in Greece. Other speakers included Lord Cecil of Chelwood, the Greek Minister, and the Archbishop of Canterbury.

THE BYRON CENTENARY.

Lord Ernle, president of the Byron Centenary Commemoration Committee, on May 6 laid a wreath made of laurels from the Heroon of Missolonghi on Byron's statue in Hyde Park. Those present at the ceremony included Lady Ernle, the Greek Minister, Major Edward Atkin (president of the Byron Society), and M. George Mélas (Secretary of the Greek Legation).

On May 3 there was a short ceremony at the library of Trinity College, Cambridge, in the presence of Dr. Pearce, Vice-Chancellor of the University; Sir Joseph Thomson, Master of Trinity College; Lady Thomson, and many others, when M. George Mélas, seconded by M. Calvocoressi, of the Greek Byron Committee in London, laid a wreath, on behalf of the Greek residents in England, on Thorwaldsen's statue of Byron.

THE DOWNFALL OF THE OTTOMAN KHALIFATE.

A lecture with the above title was delivered by Sir Valentine Chirol to the Central Asian Society, on May 8, at the Royal United Service Institution. Sir Maurice de Bunsen was in the chair.

Sir Valentine began by saying that had the Sultanate and the Khalifate been abolished forty or fifty years ago, public attention would have been concentrated on the Sultanate. He went back to the historical beginnings of the Khalifate, showing that its whole story was full of violent episodes. Tracing its brilliant development in the Arab empires, he came to the Turkish invasion of Egypt in the sixteenth century, when Selim carried off the Khalifate from Cairo to Constantinople. After enjoying the rule of a few mighty Sultans, the Ottoman Empire relapsed—such institutions as the Seraglio and the Janissaries being symptoms of this degeneration—into decay, and it would inevitably have gone into dissolution but for the rivalry of the European Powers. In the nineteenth century, particularly, was the belief strong in Britain that the integrity of the Ottoman Empire was essential to British interests, and that that Empire could be reformed.

The lecturer continued the story of Turkish relations with Europe to the reign of Abdul Hamid, a superstitious man who sought to use his position as Khalif to seek compensation for loss of temporal power in extension of spiritual power. He attempted to make himself the unquestioned ruler of all orthodox Moslems. When, however, the Committee of Union and Progress came into power in 1908, Nationalism was made the first string and pan-Islamism the second, and there was an intensive Turkification of subject races.

In his narrative of events during and since the War, Sir Valentine laid stress on the fact that Turkey would have accepted any peace terms had they but been imposed six or twelve months after the Armistice. But Mr. Lloyd George thought that the East could wait indefinitely, and so was time given for the revolutionary movements in Anatolia and in India to take shape. The conclusion of it all was that at Lausanne had to be surrendered all our war aims.

Concerning Mustapha Kemal Pasha and his various acts (in many of which the lecturer was inclined to perceive Bolshevist inspiration), Sir Valentine confessed himself puzzled, for he had deliberately knocked down the ladder (the Khalifate) which certainly since the War had been very useful to Turkey. But, in any case, there was no need for those European countries who had the keeping of Mohammedans to regret Mustapha Kemal's abolition of the Khalifate, for two years ago Turkey threatened to become the spearhead not only of a Mohammedan but of a general Asian revolt against the West. That particular danger seemed to be over, and those who regarded Turkish rule as having been a blight not only upon every country conquered by the Turks, but upon Islam itself when its leadership passed with the establishment of the Turkish Khalifate away from the more highly gifted Arab race, might even hope that if the Khalifate were revived elsewhere it might regain some of the progressive qualities which it abundantly displayed under the early Khalifates of Damascus, Baghdad, and Cordova.

In the subsequent discussion Sir Thomas Arnold said that any powerful Mohammedan chief might at any time proclaim himself Khalif, that many such, indeed, had at various times so proclaimed themselves. Of the alleged taking away by Selim I. in 1517 of the Khalifate from Cairo, Sir Thomas said that he could find no contemporary authority for it. Mention of it was, indeed, first made, not by a Turkish or Persian or Arabic historian, but by an Armenian writing in French in 1787! The truth was that at any time in Mohammedan history any powerful ruler could and did arrogate to himself the title of Khalif—Ottoman Sultans had done so before the advent of Selim I.

Lord Raglan inquired what was the attitude of the ordinary man-in-the-street Mohammedan towards the abolition of the Khalifate. It might be well enough for Moslems of those countries which had independent rulers (though he hazarded the guess that, with the exception of Angora and a few villages outside it, the Turkish peasant was saying his Friday prayers still in the name of Abdul Mejid), but what of the Moslems of British India? That was the question which most closely concerned Great Britain.

Lord Headley, speaking as a British Moslem, thought that the whole of the Mohammedan world should be assembled to elect a Khalif, and that there was no one he knew who was more suitable a man than Hussein, King of the Hejaz.

Ismet Pasha is now stated to be convalescent after his illness.

It is reported that Prince Aly Fazil, while motoring to Cairo from the Pyramids, came into collision with a tree, and had both his legs broken.

Zaghloul Pasha, the Egyptian Premier, on his way to London will take the cure at Vichy. He is expected in London at the end of June or beginning of July.

By order of the Minister of the Interior, summer time was reintroduced in Turkey as from 2 o'clock on the afternoon of May 13. There was no summer time in Turkey last year.

A White Paper (Cmd. 2120, price 9d.) has been issued by H.M. Stationery Office containing the Irak Protocol of April 30, 1923, and the Agreements subsidiary to the Treaty with King Faisal, signed October 10, 1922.

NOTES AND NEWS.

Cotton Growing in the Sudan.

The general meeting last week of the Kassala Cotton Company, a report of which will be found in another column, was notable for a very interesting account by the chairman, Mr. A. M. Asquith, of the company's position and of the work with which it is confronted. After outlining the terms of the concession and explaining the characteristics of the River Gash, he went on to point out that the problem in irrigation engineering before the company is the economical use of the available waters of the Gash so that the greatest possible acreage may be brought under crop. The limiting factor is water, not land; and the company has yet to learn what is the minimum dose of water necessary for the crop and the minimum gradient required by irrigation channels so that the water may reach the fields without undue loss of silt. The first crop in which the company will be interested is that which will be sown after this summer's flood, and the existing irrigating areas that are taken over and on which cotton was grown last year total about 9,000 acres. The Chairman added that they could not afford to settle down to small-scale experiments over a series of years, but must push ahead with experimental development on a rather large scale.

Initial Difficulties.

Dealing with the preliminary operations, Mr. Asquith emphasised the many hardships that have had to be faced, such as the provision of drinking-water and the lack of local labour suitable for the heavy work of canal digging. To deal with the labour scarcity, indeed, it was found necessary to bring from Egypt 500 Egyptian labourers; who, with the material, have had to be transported by camel for more than 200 miles from the railway. Mr. Asquith proceeded to refer in some detail to the possibility of the Government of Eritrea using part of the waters of the Gash for irrigation in their country. Obviously any such action might be very prejudicial to the future of Kassala province, but the tenor of Mr. Asquith's speech and of that of Mr. Eckstein, who followed him, suggests that the view is taken that the matter will be capable of adjustment without difficulty. "To me," said Mr. Eckstein, "it appears unthinkable that a friendly and neighbouring nation will attempt to deprive the inhabitants of the Province of Kassala of water which they have used hitherto without hindrance, and on which they have lived for many centuries, and therefore I do honestly believe that we need not be very much concerned about the matter."

The Position in Turkey.

From what our Constantinople correspondent says, in quoting the speech of the chairman of the British Chamber of Commerce of Turkey, it would certainly seem that there is a slight improvement in the commercial position in Turkey, and it is at any rate a matter of profound satisfaction to learn that the Chamber has received no serious complaints during the past year. It is evident, however, that business men are still labouring under very considerable difficulties in carrying on their work, owing to the interpretation of the host of regulations that the Government have instituted in their ardent desire to create an entirely new state of things. But this is a phase that will pass, and the sooner the better for Turkey, for it needs no emphasis that the greater the freedom that commerce enjoys the sooner will the country recover from the effects of the war.

Ottoman Public Debt.

The doubts that have arisen as to the good faith of the Turkish Government in regard to the Ottoman Public Debt will be intensified by the news that those receipts from the ceded revenues that the Council for the Administration of the Ottoman Public Debt was still receiving have now been seized. If this act, which, of course, is a flagrant violation of the Treaty of Muharrem, really represents the intentions of Angora, the effect on Turkish credit will be very serious.

The Levant Company.

The report of the Levant Company for the past year, which has just been issued, shows some improvement in the position of the concern. Last year a capital reduction scheme was carried out, and further capital was raised by an issue of ordinary shares. A profit was earned for 1923 of £1,368, and as the fresh capital was not available till August, it is reasonable to assume that this result may be taken as an indication of much improved results in future years. It is interesting to note that the report states that since August the company has made progress in all the markets with which it is concerned.

The Fair.

The White City section of the British Industries Fair ended on Friday, and it is satisfactory to learn that, on the whole, satisfactory business was done, though in one or two sections trade was rather dull. The Birmingham section is now in progress, and the indications point to the probability that this will be a very considerable success.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

TRAFFIC AT BULGARIAN PORTS IN 1923.

In reviewing the year 1923 from the point of view of shipping (says Mr. C. B. P. Peake in his report on Bulgaria, extracts from which are given elsewhere), the most noticeable features are the decrease in cargo discharged and the increase in the number of German ships calling at the ports of Varna and Bourgas. In 1922 a considerable amount of cargo from German to Black Sea ports had been carried in British, French, and Dutch steamers; this trade is now almost entirely dealt with by German lines, which also secured a large quantity of exports from Varna to Hamburg.

There has been a falling off with regard to Greek shipping calling at Varna, and Bulgarian shipping has suffered severely by the loss of Constantinople as a market for Bulgarian grain and flour, due to the prohibitive tariffs imposed on these products by the Turkish Government.

With regard to Bourgas, the growth of the port, to which attention was drawn a year ago, has been fairly well maintained, and the construction of better harbour and rail facilities, if carried out, will make it, at any rate for the present, the principal port in Bulgaria.

TURKEY.

Constantinople, May 6.

The Present Position.

As an interesting commentary on the practical and psychological effect of the present state of the country on foreign business men the speech delivered by the chairman of the Council of the British Chamber of Commerce at the annual meeting of the Chamber on May 1 deserves notice. That speech may be regarded as a distillation of the views of the trading community, due allowance being made for the fact that he was probably putting the best face on things and consciously avoiding anything that might "put up the backs" of the lords of the land. His general statement that no flagrant abuse of power by the Turkish authorities since the abolition of the Capitulations had been brought to the notice of the Chamber is valuable. Legitimate trade had been possible under the laws of the Republic, and what difficulties there had been had been due principally to the mistakes of local officials who had eventually been overruled by their superiors at Angora. The principal complaint, over which the chairman lightly glossed, is one to which reference has been made in these letters on more than one occasion; the most innocent and trivial infraction of one of the hundred and one ridiculous administrative ordinances entail executive action of the most arbitrary and unintelligent kind on the part of the police, and the liquidation of these harmless, unintentional peccadilloes resolves itself in nine cases out of ten to an arbitrary decision by an officious, junior police official after an interminable series of silly procès-verbaux, and without giving the accused the slightest chance of expounding or defending his case. However delicately the abuse may be mentioned in official speeches, the fact remains that it is an abuse which makes a far greater impression upon the foreigner than is warranted by the intrinsic importance of the issues involved. The Turks should remember that the foreigner would cheerfully pay up a fine of a hundred liras if he had had a reasonable chance of putting up a fight against its infliction, whereas the cold-blooded extraction of five liras under the automatic operation of some petty administrative order will infuriate him.

Another hopeful note in the speech was struck when reference was made to the attempt at collaboration between the foreign Chambers of Commerce and the Turkish commercial institutions. The speaker foresaw that the official Constantinople Chamber of Commerce and Industry, which is in course of formation under the auspices of the Government, would render valuable assistance to the foreign trade of the country. One cannot but applaud the initiative of the foreign chambers in approaching the official institution and the good sense of the latter in welcoming such overtures. One cannot help thinking that the first serious advance in the direction of the reconstruction of this country will be achieved by the collaboration on equal terms of foreign and local financial and commercial interests. The present current of opposition to foreign concessionnaires, and the practical repudiation of the State's obligations, however reprehensible and short-sighted they may be, are very real factors in the situation, and a warning to the pioneer who wants to do business here that in the future he will serve his own interests best by evolving a method of doing business which will lead his Turkish partners to undertake the defence of their common interests. Until now the dominant feature in Turkey's relations with the rest of the world has been the hostility and xenophobia of the politicians, but it would appear that the British Chamber of Commerce is coming to the view that the common sense of the business man is overcoming political hostility and paving the way for fruitful co-operation, which cannot but provide enormous advantages for Turkey, and need not be despised by Britain.

While on this subject, it may not be amiss to draw attention to the fact that other nations seeking an outlet for their energies and investments for their capital are very busy exploring the possibilities of this country. It is not necessary to fall into a panic at the thought that we are being outpaced in the competition for these markets, but at the same time it would be foolish to minimise the risk of undue delay. As a nation, we have certain advantages—namely, sound national credit and a good reputation for the quality of our goods and the straightness of our methods; but in present circumstances our nationality may operate also to our disadvantage. In the eyes of the Turks the bogey of political penetration under the guise of economic interests is a real danger, and the tendency of Angora is to do business wherever possible with those States which are so much enfeebled by the War as to render them innocuous Ceteris paribus, the proposals of German, Austrian, and Hungarian groups are likely to find favour for this reason, whereas the loose employment of harmless verbiage by a Mussolini creates a heavy cloud of suspicion in the Turkish mind which not even a Montagna can hope to dissipate in a hurry.

Sir Charles Stewart Addis has been elected a director of the Eastern Extension Australasia and China Telegraph Company in place of the late Sir Albert J. Leppoc Cappel.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

A Quiet Week.

The Manchester cotton trade review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended May 10 states :—

There has been no disturbing feature, but, probably on account of the reasons mentioned in our last report, a very quiet week has been experienced and the amount of business which has transpired must have been small. It will be interesting to see whether spinners will be able to hold the improvement they have won with so much difficulty if the present dull state of affairs continues.

Yarn.—In American yarns there has been a moderate inquiry, but the turnover has been poor and probably not sufficient to clear the reduced output. Under these circumstances a certain amount of irregularity in quotations is not surprising after the marked improvement which spinners have recently secured, although it should be said that there is as yet no sign of any return to the disastrous competition which prevailed some little time ago. The demand for Egyptian yarns has not been so active as recently, but prices are firm.

Cloth.—None of the foreign outlets calls for special mention. For all markets the demand has been on a very small scale, and buyers appear content to look on.

Raw Cotton.—Only minor fluctuations have taken place in American cotton. "Spot" sales have been fairly good, and stocks in Liverpool continue to diminish. Reports from the United States concerning the new crop are not unsatisfactory.

Egyptian cotton continues to be in fairly active demand, and the price has again moved up. It is said that the acreage planted this season will be 10 per cent. in excess of that a year ago. Closing prices yesterday were as follows :—American Fully Middling, 17.87 ; Egyptian Fully Good Fair, 23.95.

POOR BEYROUT OLIVE CROP.

H.M. Consul-General at Beyrout reports that the 1923 olive crop in the Lebanon and Lattakia districts was a poor one, being estimated at from 4,800 to 5,400 kantars. As regards the Lattakia district, a good year's production is 7,000 to 9,000 kantars. Last year's crop was about 55 per cent. of this amount. The outlook for this year is doubtful, and at the best not more than 40 per cent. of a full crop will be produced. The whole crop in a good year is about 16,000 to 18,000 kantars (one kantar equals 560 lb.). That for the present year is considered likely to equal about 55 per cent. of a good year's crop, provided sufficient rain falls. In general, owing to the shortage of rain and its early cessation, the prospects for all crops are not encouraging.

BANKING DEVELOPMENTS IN YUGO-SLAVIA.

The Minister of Commerce and Industry of Yugoslavia has approved the statutes of the following new banks :—The Kolubarska Banka, at Mionica, in Serbia, with a capital of of 1,000,000 dinars. The bank will grant credits for the founding of agricultural societies, and to agriculturists and craftsmen ; it will finance the sale of agricultural products and those of the handicraft trades ; it will receive savings deposits and undertake general banking business. The Vlasotinacka Banka at Vlasotinci in Serbia, with a capital of 1,000,000 dinars.

The Minister has also sanctioned the amalgamation of the Hrvatska Centralna Banka za Bosnu i Hercegovinu and the Muslimanska Centralna Banka za Bosnu i Hercegovinu, and has assigned to the establishment so formed the name of Ujedinenje Centralnih Banaka (Union of Central Banks), Sarejevo. It is reported that a branch of the State Mortgage Bank (formerly Uprava Fondova) will shortly be opened at Zagreb, the Minister of Commerce and Industry having already signed the decision. Preliminary negotiations are reported to have taken place between local authorities and business men and the representatives of the National Bank of S.C.S. concerning the question of the establishment of a branch of the National Bank at Susak. It was agreed that the need for such a branch exists.

British Consular Reports.

II.—BULGARIA.

The following extracts are taken from the report on the commerce and industry of Bulgaria in 1923 by Mr. C. B. P. Peake, Secretary-in-Charge of Commercial Affairs, British Legation, Sofia :—

The close of the year 1922 found Bulgaria, at least from the economic point of view, in a very satisfactory position. The Budget balanced, the exchange compared most favourably with that of other countries in a similar position, and commercial prospects were by no means unpromising. Various factors, however, have prevented these prospects from being completely realised. The virtual settlement of the Reparations question in March last, and the overthrow of the Agrarian Government in June had each a marked reaction upon both trade and industry. The fluctuations in the exchange, which in February reached 860 leva to the £, and in June had risen to 350, sinking in December to 650, caused heavy loss to business houses. Exportation, for a time at least, was virtually impossible. Further, the general scarcity of money, and the political uncertainty which has been felt in Bulgaria since the overthrow of the Agrarian Government, have both militated against the progress which Bulgaria's position a year ago seemed to forecast.

The rise in value of the lev during the summer, however, assisted British houses in their trade with Bulgaria, and the increased demand for British goods, which has caused Great Britain to rise from third to second place in the list of importing countries, may be regarded with satisfaction.

It is not possible, however, to close this introduction on a note of optimism. The commercial outlook for 1924, largely owing to the introduction during January of this year of a tariff containing some 150 categories of goods which it is forbidden to import, introduced to prevent a further decline in the value of the lev, has hit countries whence imports are obtained very hard, and although it is still possible to import textiles, an article of great interest to British merchants, the restrictions imposed form, at the same time, a very serious handicap to importers of British goods.

Furthermore, owing to the obligations which Bulgaria has engaged herself to fulfil not only as regards the question of Reparations, but also to her neighbours, in settlement of claims for expropriation, there is likely to be a deficit in the Budget for the current year, and the factors which have hindered the development of trade during the past two years must, it is to be feared, prejudice any marked development of commercial relations with Great Britain.

It should, however, be stated that in comparison with other Balkan States the position of Bulgaria is quite promising, and if politically she can remain stable, there is no reason why the progress which was shown in 1922 should not be resumed. The change over from an Agrarian régime, operating almost entirely in the interests of the peasants, to a Government composed of a "bloc" of the bourgeois parties has not brought with it any violent changes from the commercial point of view, but the encouragement which was so strongly given in 1922 to the policy of co-operation has, to a certain extent, been withdrawn, and the National Bank has granted certain loans for the rehabilitation of industry within the country—a very definite advance in policy. The large natural resources of the country, the exploitation of which has not, owing chiefly to lack of capital, received any great consideration since the war, should, if political conditions remain stable, be of interest to British investors in the near future.

Finance.

On April 1, 1923, the first day of the Bulgarian financial year, no Budget had been voted, and although a Bill had been prepared, the resignation of the Minister of Finance, followed by the coup d'état of June 9, prevented any serious discussion of the measure in the Sobranje. The new Government therefore retained the 1922-23 Budget in force, first for one quarter only, and then finally for the whole year. It is thus extremely difficult to forecast what the financial position of the country is likely to be when the new Budget for 1924-25 comes before the Sobranje.

The rise in the value of the lev has brought about an appreciable reduction of expenditure by all services which have payments to make abroad, and chiefly by the Direction of the Public Debt. On the other hand, the special Budget for expenses incurred under the Treaty of Neuilly has been augmented by over 100 million leva, and at the lowest estimate the State will be required to find 5,454 million leva as against 4,983 million leva in 1923-4. In spite of the economies which it is proposed to effect, it seems unlikely that the deficit on the Budget will be less than 450 millions; the Government, however, hope to balance the Budget by economies on credits which were granted in 1923, but which have not yet been exhausted.

Trade.

Again no statistics (beyond those for the first three months) are available for the year under review. As was foreshadowed in the previous report, the 1922 figures show an excess of exports over imports, the first occasion since 1907 (with the exception of the abnormal war years 1915-1917) on which a favourable trade balance has been attained. This favourable balance of 292,056,000 leva is, therefore, a rather remarkable achievement. It is satisfactory to observe that Great Britain rose from third to second place in the list of countries of origin, and achieved an increase of 35 per cent. in value on the previous year. Italian products show a marked drop, while the United States and France also register a decline. The rise of Germany to first place is striking.

Exports were mostly cereals and live stock as regards Turkey, while Germany and Italy both took large quantities of tobacco, with the addition of raw silk as regards the latter country. Exports to Great Britain have of recent years dwindled almost to insignificance, even though those of 1923 are double the 1922 ones.

Owing to price and exchange fluctuations, it is desirable, when comparing the 1922 import and export figures with those for 1921, to take quantities as well as values into consideration. Imports rose from 2,921,000,000 leva in 1921 to 4,038,000,000 in 1922, and from 180,000 to 280,000 tons. Textiles, metals and machinery, hides and leather goods, and dyes, paints and oils were the most important classes. . . . Exports increased proportionately from 2,217,000,000 leva to 4,330,000,000 leva, and from 286,657 tons to 384,663. This almost doubled exportation (as regards value) is to a great extent attributable to an increase in prices in the principal articles and to a drop in the exchange. Cereals accounted for 1,457,000,000 leva and tobacco for 1,169,000,000.

As regards 1923, the year started favourably, but this satisfactory beginning was not wholly maintained. Though the settlement of the Reparations question in the spring was succeeded by a sudden and marked improvement in the exchange, no proportionate reaction on prices followed, thus discouraging foreign purchasers. The coup d'état in June and the Communist outbreak in September (which necessitated a three weeks' moratorium) were events tending to cause temporary interruption in the normal flow of business. Against this must be set the fact that the events of June resulted in the access to power of a bourgeois coalition, who have remained in office for the rest of the year, and who take a broader view of commercial and economic questions than their agrarian predecessors. Money has continued tight and credits restricted throughout the year, and banks have been charging high rates of interest. A certain slackness has characterised exports, especially cereals. Imports generally will also probably prove to have been smaller. The vacillating exchange—a sharp appreciation in the spring and summer followed by a less marked and less continuous drop in the latter months of the year—has been an element of instability and uncertainty. The prohibition of certain imports mentioned in the section on currency and exchange also affected the situation.

Business in textiles with Great Britain is understood to have been active. On the whole, though, it may be expected that both imports and exports, but more especially the latter, will prove to have been smaller in 1923 than in the preceding year. More attention might profitably be given to the Bulgarian market by British exporters, many of whom appear to be unaware of the good reputation of the Bulgarian merchant. It should be remembered that the country is not a rich one, and goods should be as cheap as is consistent with good quality.

Trade Prospects.

The new tariff forbidding the import into Bulgaria of some 150 articles not of first necessity, to which reference has been made elsewhere, will prove a severe blow to merchants desiring to open up business connections here. During the past year the most hopeful sign for British trade has been the increased interest shown by Bulgaria in textiles, but a small business was also done in farm tractors and stationary engines for agricultural work, and it would repay British exporters to investigate carefully the market in Bulgaria for motors and lorries and for agricultural implements of modern design. In any case, the chief buyer of such goods is the Bulgarian peasant or peasant's co-operative society. Long credit is almost invariably demanded, and custom generally goes to those firms which are most accommodating in this respect, but the buyer has a sound reputation for honesty, and when he has once purchased he will usually continue dealing with the same firm.

British exporters up to the present, owing to the small volume of business done in this country, usually appoint local agents for their goods, and too seldom send their own representatives to examine personally the local market. It is an advantage to appoint a British representative here, and it is very important that he should be adequately supplied with attractive samples of the goods he has to sell, and that he should be empowered to offer at least as favourable terms as are given by his Continental competitors. "Cash against documents" is a proposition which is seldom likely to meet with any success in Bulgaria, the least favourable terms offered by European exporters being generally one-third of the price against documents, and the balance on delivery. Some accommodation in this respect by British exporters might make a great difference to business, and the risk is said to be very slight.

Crops.

A rich harvest is always the main requirement for such an essentially agricultural country as Bulgaria. That for 1923 has been a good one, and has reached the pre-war standard of production.

There seems no doubt but that the 1923 export figure of 200,000 tons will be exceeded. Indeed, an amount of 600,000 to 800,000 tons is spoken of, but this seems unduly sanguine, as conditions in the European market are not altogether favourable. Exports during 1923 were principally to Turkey, Greece, Russia, Austria, and Italy.

Production figures for the year under review are made up mainly as follows:—Wheat, 1,000,000 tons; maize, 682,000; barley, 241,000; rye, 174,000; oats, 133,000; rice, 5,100. The most notable increase is in maize, the growth of which was fostered by the heavy summer rains, followed, as they were, by a dry harvesting season.

The annual local consumption of tobacco averages 4,000 tons. Germany and Italy took the bulk of the exports in 1923, while large quantities purchased by the Austrian Régie are now being sent to their destination. Owing to the size of this year's crop and the fact that considerable quantities of last year's tobacco still remain in the country, and that the Near Eastern crop altogether has been abundant, the outlook is not entirely satisfactory, and a fall in prices seems probable. Ten million kilograms of the 1922 crop still remain unsold, and so far only a third of last year's crop has been disposed of, the greater part to Czecho-Slovakia. Last year's crop, according to reports now received, is superior in quality to that of the preceding year.

The beet production this year is 35,000 truckloads, and it is estimated that 38,000 tons of sugar will be manufactured therefrom in the five local factories. This is a considerable increase on the amount produced last year, and should fully suffice for internal requirements. As in the case of tobacco, the area planted with beet has largely increased within the last decade.

Telegraphic advice has been received by the Phœnix Oil and Transport Company from the management in Roumania that Participation Well No. 3, in the Runcu district, came into production on May 6, at the rate of 350 tons per day. No further information will be issued regarding any change in the production of this well except its inclusion in the monthly output.

Company Meeting.

KASSALA COTTON COMPANY.

Outlook for Undertaking.

The first ordinary general meeting of the Kassala Cotton Company, Limited, was held on May 7 at Winchester House, Old Broad Street, E.C. Mr. A. M. Asquith (the Chairman of the Company) presided.

The Secretary having read the notice convening the meeting and the report of the auditors,

The Chairman said: Gentlemen,—I take it that you will agree to take the report and accounts as read. The accounts call for little comment. When the railway is opened for traffic the £300,000 represented in these accounts by Kassala Railway shares will presumably figure in our balance-sheet under some such heading as "Cost of Concession."

During the current and succeeding years we must anticipate considerable expenditure in the Sudan for development, canalisation, building, etc., including the erection in the Gash Delta of large ginning factories. To meet this further calls will be made in respect of our Preference shares as and when the money is required.

There is an item—"Loss on realisation of investments, £2,790 15s. 1d." This was due to the fall in the value of short-dated British Government securities which we have had to realise from time to time as calls on the railway company's shares were made under the terms of our concession agreement. It is some consolation to think that, when earnings in interest are considered, we have done better by investing in these securities than we should have done by leaving our money on deposit at the bank.

Terms of Concession.

Turning to the report, as this is the first annual general meeting of the company, I think it will be convenient to remind you of the terms of our concession, and to survey in general outline the nature of our task. Broadly and briefly, the terms of our concession are as follows:—

We on our side provide the Sudan Government with £300,000, this sum, together with a loan under the Trade Facilities Act, enabling them to build a railway about 217 miles long to connect Kassala with their main line to Port Sudan. We have provided this £300,000 by subscribing for 300,000 £1 shares of the Kassala Railway Company, Limited, these shares becoming the property of the Sudan Government upon the opening of the railway line for traffic

We also undertake to apply to, or make available for, capital expenditure for irrigation and development work at Kassala, a further sum of £350,000 within five years of 1 July, 1924, and to make good one-half of any deficit on the operation of the railway, the possible irrecoverable cost to us under this last head being limited to £50,000. The Sudan Government on their side guarantee that the expenses of operating the Kassala Railway shall not exceed 70 per cent. of the gross receipts.

In return for the obligations which I have described, we receive from the Sudan Government a concession for 40 years from 1 July, 1924, under which we are to arrange for and to supervise cultivation of so much of the lands in Kassala Province as can be brought within the operation of a scheme of irrigation by means of the control of the Gash Flood and its tributaries, and we are to receive a share of the proceeds of the crops grown on these lands. Such, broadly and briefly, are the terms of our concession. There are certain qualifying clauses of a detailed nature with which I need not deal at the moment.

The Gash Delta.

Now to turn to the nature of our task. The River Gash, rising in the Italian colony of Eritrea and crossing the Sudan border about 16 miles south of Kassala town, flows from south to north for an average of about 75 days every year. It comes down in irregular spates, laden with silt, flooding parts of the plain; and its channel, from being several hundred yards wide at and south of Kassala town, becomes narrower and deeper north of Kassala, so that about 20 miles north of Kassala its width is only 20 to 30 yards. Finally, by dint of overflow, evaporation, and absorption in the soil, the river peters out in the desert 60 miles or more north of Kassala town. By its annual overflows the river has deposited a sort of delta, mainly north of Kassala town, about 60 miles long from south to north and 10 to 20 miles wide from west to east.

For nine months of the year the river channel is dry, but, owing to the extreme fertility of the soil of the delta and its moisture-retaining properties, excellent cotton of a highly satisfactory Sakellaridis type, which takes six months or more to mature from sowing to picking, can be grown on the delta land with a single flooding and such additional moisture as is provided by the dews and a rainfall averaging about 13½ in. This has been proved over a number of years on comparatively small areas. In the past there has been little incentive to enlarge these areas, as all cotton grown had to be carried by camel through hilly country some 300 miles to the port.

The annual flow of the Gash takes place approximately in the months of July to October, and the time of the annual rainfall synchronises with the flood. The cotton is sown in August-September; picking takes places in February, March, and April. The delta is densely wooded at its southern end, which has been subject to the heaviest annual flooding, and the trees thin out as one travels north until, 20 miles north of Kassala town, one is in open country with sparse scrub; and 20 miles farther north again, except for a wooded belt close to the river channel, the delta in the dry season is as bare as a billiard table.

An Experienced Staff.

The problem in irrigation engineering with which the company is faced is the economical use of the available waters of the Gash so that the greatest possible acreage may be brought under crop. Our limiting factor is water, not suitable land; and we have yet to learn what is the minimum dose of water necessary for the crop, and the minimum gradient required by irrigation channels so that the water may reach the fields without undue loss of silt. To guide us in the solution of these and other problems we are, I think, exceptionally fortunate in our personnel. We have secured the services as managing director and consulting engineer of Mr. Alexander MacIntyre, of the Sudan Plantations Syndicate, who has unrivalled experience of irrigation for cotton-growing and of the development of new areas in the Sudan. Mr. M. W. Gray, who is our head official in charge of works on the spot, has considerable previous experience of growing cotton by irrigation both in Kassala and in Egypt; and Mr. Fleming, our second in command on the spot, with four years' agricultural experience in Kassala, succeeded last year in bringing some 4,500 acres under cotton by means of experimental channels executed by him on behalf of the Sudan Government in preparation for our present enterprise.

We have also had the advantage of consulting with and receiving reports from Mr. McGregor (at present chief adviser on irrigation questions to the Sudan Government), who spent some months in the Gash delta last summer.

We know, from the experience of the Sudan Government in 1906, that it is dangerous to obstruct the flow of the Gash by works on its southern reaches. Our policy, therefore, at present is to feel our way from north to south, attempting to lead water on to the land by regulated canals taking off from the northern reaches of the river, where it flows more steadily in a comparatively deep and well-defined channel; and at the same time to enlarge and improve, within the limits of available labour, the cotton areas which are fed by existing channels.

The first crop in which, under our concession, we shall be interested is that for which sowing will take place after this summer's flood. The existing irrigated areas which we take over and upon which cotton was grown last year total about 9,000 acres, and are distributed as follows:—

South of Kassala town, about	1,000 acres.
North of Kassala town and south of new channel which we are digging at Magauda, about	4,000 acres.
North of Magauda, about	4,000 acres.

At this stage of our undertaking, and in the peculiar circumstances of the case, we are bound to proceed to some extent by trial and error, and we cannot afford to settle down to small-scale experiments over a series of years, but must rely on the technical judgment of our experts, and, recognising our risks, we must push ahead with experimental development on a rather large scale. Our first move in this experimental development, and our chief task since August last year, has been the digging of a canal, 18 kilometres long, taking off the bed of the Gash at Magauda, 25 miles north of Kassala town, and the construction at its offtake of a masonry regulator. This canal is designed to irrigate 10,000 acres of virgin land; whether it will actually succeed in so doing I will not prophesy.

Preliminary Operations.

The work this first season has been subject to many handicaps; drinking water for all the labour on canal digging has had to be carried on camels for increasing distances as the season advanced. Local labour suitable for the heavy work of canal digging is scarce, so it has been necessary to bring up from Egypt 500 Egyptian labourers, and they, as well as all cement, tools, etc., have had to be transported by camel for more than 200 miles from the railway. Our staff are still living in grass huts; the climate is somewhat trying, and unusually hard soil has been encountered in some sections of the excavation. If Mr. Gray and Mr. Telford, our engineer, succeed, as I believe they will, in overcoming all these difficulties and in finishing these works by June 1 this year, the greatest credit will be due to them.

The next problems with which our local staff will have to deal are the establishment on the new areas of suitable tenant cultivators and the provision of a constant supply of drinking water in these areas. A large proportion of the inhabitants are pastoral and unused to tilling the soil, and the local cultivators naturally prefer the neighbourhood of Kassala, where, in addition to other amenities of town life, the wells give good water throughout the year, to the delta northwards, where the wells run dry. We hope to find water by boring deep for it, and that the new railway, which has just reached Kassala, will both bring in fresh cultivators and labourers and enable the local cultivators to move more readily backwards and forwards between Kassala town and the northern half of the delta. Meanwhile there are hopeful indications that some of the pastoral tribes will try their hands at cultivating on our areas.

Relations with Eritrea.

Now, turning to paragraph 5 of the report, you will wish to have further information about the possibility of the Government of Eritrea's using part of the waters of the Gash for irrigation in their country, upstream of us, and about the manner in which this would be likely to affect our interests.

First, I must explain that, in the negotiations which resulted in the company's concession, we did, in fact, ask the question as to whether there was any risk of diversion or interference with these waters in Eritrea, and the opinion was expressed by the Sudan Government representatives that the conditions were such that irrigation works there could not usefully be undertaken. Neither those who represented the Sudan Government nor those who were negotiating on our side had any knowledge that the Government of Eritrea had ever seriously contemplated the use of, or claimed any rights in, the Gash upstream of Kassala.

It has since come to our knowledge that in 1906, at a time when the Sudan Government were projecting certain irrigation works at Kassala, the Government of Eritrea asserted a claim to rights in the head-waters of the Gash, and prepared a scheme for their utilisation. Whether this scheme is not, or was not at that time, economically sound, or for whatever other reasons, from 1906 until 1923 no action was taken by the Government of Eritrea to put it into execution.

This winter, however, we were informed that the Eritrean Government had reasserted their claim and had resumed their study of the possibility of irrigating from the river at a point about 25 miles south-east of Kassala, where the river bed narrows between outcrops of rock, and from which it may or may not be practicable to command by irrigation works an adjacent plain of considerable extent and of no particular agricultural merit—a plain not comparable in any way with the rich alluvial area where we are working

A representative of this company and a representative of the Sudan Government have visited the site, but we do not know yet, nor, very possibly, do the Government of Eritrea know yet, whether any economically sound irrigation scheme is practicable there. It is, of course, conceivable that the advent of the Kassala Railway, improved communications in their own country, and enhanced cotton prices may have made worth while now a scheme which previously was not worth while.

So far as we know the Eritrean Government have not yet undertaken any serious works, but they have quarried a certain amount of stone for the building of houses at this site, and they speak of an impending visit by a technical expert to advise them.

Obviously any great reduction which an Eritrean scheme might cause in the volume of the flood reaching Kassala would not be without effect upon the area which would be cultivated there, and to this extent the inhabitants of Kassala, our company, and possibly the British Government as guarantors of the Kassala Railway Debentures, would suffer.

We know that, owing to the violence and irregularity of its spates and to its very high content of silt, the Gash is a difficult river to handle from the point of view of the irrigation engineer. The small and unsuccessful works undertaken by the Sudan Government in 1906 had unexpected consequences, for a dam and bank constructed near Kassala resulted in the diversion of the whole river from its western into its eastern branch and in the drying up of the cultivable areas, grazing grounds, wells, and trees served by the western branch.

It is impossible to say definitely whether there is any danger of a similar accident occurring as a result of any works which may be undertaken in Eritrea, but your directors naturally cannot be without concern at the possibilities of this situation, and I have, therefore, thought it right to deal with it at some length, but at the same time I do not think that there is any reason to assume that the Government of Eritrea will not act in a manner consonant with the friendly and neighbourly relations which they have undertaken to maintain, and which, so far as I know, they have always maintained in the past, in their dealings with the Sudan.

Favourable Factors.

Finally, gentlemen, if in the remarks which I have made I may have seemed to you to stress the difficulties and anxieties of our undertaking, I have done so because I think it preferable that, in so far as the seas which we have to navigate together are charted, we should all understand the chart. Our voyage is not a short one, and it is only at its beginning. On the other hand, I think I may say that we have many, at least, of the elements necessary for success—suitable climate, soil of unusual fertility, an experienced and loyal staff, the good will of the inhabitants of Kassala, the co-operation of the Sudan Government, and sufficient funds. The completion of the railway will add facilities of transport. With all these factors to help us I do not entertain any serious misgivings as to our ultimate success.

As to the immediate future, I shall indulge in no prophecies about the new acreage which we shall be able to bring under crop after this summer's flood, and will only say that we are attempting to make a good step forward this season, and hope to make substantial additions to the acreage under crop from year to year. Gentlemen, I beg to move:—"That the report of the directors and statement of accounts to December 31, 1923, now laid before the meeting, be and the same are hereby received and adopted."

Mr. F. Eckstein, in seconding the motion, mentioned that he paid his first visit to Kassala in 1921, and inspected the Gash Delta, when he was very much impressed with everything he saw, and a year later he accepted an invitation from the Sudan Government to open up negotiations with them for the further development of that province. These negotiations resulted, first, in the formation of the Kassala Railway Company, and, secondly, in the formation of the Kassala Cotton Company.

"In January this year," he continued, "I paid a third visit to Kassala in company with Mr. MacIntyre. During this visit we were absolutely staggered by seeing the cotton crops grown in the Gash Delta on the two new experimental stations which the Sudan Government had started, and which we had arranged for on my previous visit. In all my life I had never seen healthier, finer, or better-looking cotton plants, and I hope this augurs well for the future.

"The chairman has told you frankly about a certain trouble which weighs on our minds, and with which we considered it our duty to make you fully acquainted. To me it appears unthinkable that a friendly and neighbouring nation will attempt to deprive the inhabitants of the Province of Kassala of water which they have used without hindrance, and on which they have lived for many centuries, and therefore I do honestly believe that we need not be very much concerned about the matter. Anyhow, the British Government are fully aware of all the circumstances, and I think we can safely leave the matter in their hands. Personally, I look forward with the greatest confidence to a prosperous future for our undertaking—the more so as I know that we can grow cotton there of a quality and of a strength which will please the Lancashire trade."

The resolution was carried unanimously.

The retiring directors were re-elected, the auditors were reappointed, and a cordial vote of thanks to the chairman and his colleagues on the board concluded the proceedings.

Cotton and Cotton Goods.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Futures Firm.

The Alexandria Commercial Company in their report for the week ended May 1 state :—

Since our last report the futures market has been rather firm. New York has shown a quieter tone, and the demand from abroad has slightly slackened; our market, nevertheless, has kept very strong and active. Stocks are daily decreasing, and the cotton still remaining for sale is very firmly held, and in view of this narrowness very little speculative support is sufficient to push up prices. At the first May tender no dockets were issued, and this has further strengthened this position, pushing May to $1 over July. Should this premium be maintained, it is but natural to expect heavy tenders on the remaining two May tender days. Ashmounis, old crop, have not lost any of their strength; as a matter of fact, on the spot market higher prices have in many instances been paid than for the corresponding Sakel qualities, which rather indicates that people who sold Ashmouni "short" have not yet covered their commitments. In Liverpool the Egyptian market has again been active; the selection is, however, becoming poor, and desirable cotton is commanding very good prices. Reports show that Manchester is doing a regular and remunerative business. In America the textile industry is not too active: on the other hand, most countries on the Continent are working well, and, in view of the improved outlook on the Reparations question, there is every likelihood that conditions will further improve. New crop options have kept active, with little change in quotations; spinners' interest in them has been small. The latest date for ginning cotton has, by Royal Decree, been extended to 31st inst. The week's receipts amount to 42,991 crs., against exports 70,719 crs; the stock stands at 1,211,688 crs.

Spot.—We have had a fairly active week at Minet el Bassal, and sales for the five business days amount to about B/s 10,050, of which we estimate B/s 6,900 Sakellarides, B/s 3,000 Uppers, B/s 50 Brown and Pilion, and B/s 100 White.

Sakellarides.—The bulk of the business has been in cotton between Good Fair and About Good, but there has also been a better inquiry for Good and better and for Fully Fair and Fully Fair to Good Fair.

Prices of spot against contracts are without much change, excepting Fully Fair and below, which are somewhat easier, and Good and Fully Good, which are rather dearer.

Uppers.—Business has been done in all grades, and more attention has been paid to the lower qualities than for some time past.

Prices of spot against contracts are generally unchanged, with the exception of Fully Good, which is appreciably dearer.

Brown and Pilion.—A retail business has been done at about last week's differences.

White.—A fair businesss has been done. Prices of spot against contracts are without much change.

Crop 1924.—Reports on the new crop are favourable. The plants almost everywhere show a healthy appearance. Germination is good, and failures are less than last year. In the extreme Northern districts of the Delta only Sakel variety has been sown; this, however, does not make us alter our previous estimate giving as 30 to 40 per cent. the proportion of acreage in the Delta planted under varieties other than Sakellarides.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Business on Satisfactory Scale.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended May 7 :—

Egyptian Spot.—After the heavy purchases which took place last week, spinners generally have shown a disposition to await further events. This does not mean to say that the inquiry has fallen away to any great extent—it has not. Spinners continue to keep themselves well posted, and the daily sales have averaged over 700 bales, a figure which, although well below last week's total, can only be regarded as very satisfactory. Last week's forwardings were again on a very large scale, and the Liverpool stock has now shrunk to 54,000 bales Egyptian and 12,000 bales Sudan. The bulk of the inquiry has tended towards the Good Sakel market, the basis for which has again hardened slightly. Sakel 275 to 350 on has been largely in request. Next in popularity has come fully good fair cotton from 225 to 250 on, of which a very indifferent selection now remains. The poor character of this year's crop, as exemplified in the grades below fully good fair, still keeps spinners away from the lower priced cotton, although, as we have mentioned in a previous circular, it would seem almost inevitable that before the season is over this class of cotton will come into its own.

Uppers continue to attract attention, but the cotton is lacking. There are certainly a few lots offering in the neighbourhood of 80 to 120 points on, but in almost every case some important defect is found in colour, grade, or staple, and spinners whose hopes have been buoyed up by rumours of wonderful cotton at "knock-out" prices have been grievously disappointed. The Sudan market has been very quiet following on the last few weeks' substantial turnover. The basis, both for White and Sakel varieties, remains about the same. Growths such as Abassi, Brown, and Pilion have been neglected, but several inquiries for Sea Island cotton have been noted. C.i.f. business also has become much quieter: in fact, there is every appearance that we have just completed another of those intermittent bursts of buying after which, in the absence of any fresh and very powerful incentive, a lull invariably sets in. In the meantime we do not look for any break in the ruling basis—the position of Egyptian cotton is too strong. Forwardings to spinners for the week ending May 2 are returned as 16,041 bales. Estimated sales, 4,200 Egyptian and 200 bales Sudan. Quotations of Brown and Upper show an advance of from 60 to 95 points, those of Sakellaridis from 50 to 70 points. Fully good fair Sakellaridis to-day 23.85d.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The Little Entente.

The Little Entente is coming in for an unusual amount of attention these days, as a result of the activities of Czecho-Slovakia and the treaty between Yugoslavia and Italy. In their original intention, the pacts that brought Czecho-Slovakia, Yugoslavia, and Roumania together were designed to prevent any modification of the Treaty of Trianon and to coerce Hungary into good behaviour. From the community of interests in regard to Hungary arose the natural desire to bring the foreign policy of the three States into line. The friendly relations established between the countries of the Little Entente were recognised as a useful factor in the general cause of peace, although the attempt to invest the Treaty of Trianon with sacrosanctity was not understood in the rest of Europe, owing to the fact that the need of modifying all the other Peace Treaties in one particular or another had been generally accepted. The very narrow basis on which the Little Entente had been brought into existence proved an element of weakness, and no success appears to have attended the efforts to extend its scope. Consequently, now that Hungary has received a testimonial of good behaviour from the League of Nations, much of the Little Entente's thunder has been stolen, and the eagerness with which Czecho-Slovakia has made a treaty with France and Yugoslavia with Italy suggests a partial realisation by two of the three countries of the possible inability of the Little Entente in future to justify its existence.

Treaty Fever.

Dr. Benesh, Foreign Minister of Czecho-Slovakia, has publicly declared that fear was the guiding principle of his country at the moment of its establishment as a separate State, and with a view to gaining security Czecho-Slovakia sought to promote understandings first with the countries immediately adjacent, and then, as in the case of France, with those on the outer circle. Other nations are displaying considerable nervousness at being internationally isolated at the present moment, in spite of the fact that there never was a time when the launching of real hostilities was more difficult, owing to the general feeling of war-weariness. It might be unwise to rely indefinitely on the exhaustion of Europe; but there would seem at least to be time for the smaller States to take more careful stock of world factors than they have shown any disposition hitherto to do. One and all are consumed by what may be called treaty fever, of which the now apparently superfluous Little Entente provides a good example. In its place we are bidden to look for a triangular undertaking between Czecho-Slovakia, Yugoslavia, and Italy, which will certainly share the same fate if it attempts to go far beyond the commercial sphere. As far as the States of South-Eastern Europe are concerned, there can be no grouping of countries that offers the advantages held out by a federation among themselves or the same likelihood of permanency. In spite of present differences and a generation or two of extreme animosity, each week sees a clearer understanding of common interests, and it needs only a master mind to bring the four countries—Roumania, Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, and Greece—together again. Here would be the one treaty worth the sacrifice of a few present benefits, for the sake of the certain advantages that would accrue to each individual State. With the League of Nations in existence, a Balkan Federation would have nothing to fear from any European Power or combination of Powers; moreover, it would be at peace within itself, and able to devote its whole attention to material progress.

The 1922 "Declaration" to Egypt.

In reply to a request in the Chamber of Deputies for "the definite rejection of the Declaration of February, 1922, as the basis for negotiations," Zaghloul Pasha is reported to have said: "As head of the Wafd, I declared that I rejected the Declaration, and to-day, as head of the Egyptian Government, I again say that I reject the Declaration." For reasons that are stated elsewhere in this issue there is probably no need to take very seriously the discussions on this subject in the Egyptian Parliament, as they are clearly directed to the embarrassment of Zaghloul Pasha by his political opponents. It may, however, be of interest to reproduce here the Declaration in question, for Egyptian misgivings appear to find no support in the text itself. In February, 1922, the British Government decided to recognise Egypt as an independent sovereign State, but, owing to the special circumstances, was obliged to reserve certain subjects for subsequent discussion. Egypt became independent, and the time has now come for the discussion with the Egyptian Government of those subjects. Whether or not the Egyptians admitted Great Britain's right to reserve the subjects would seem to have little practical value to-day, two years after the exercise of independence and the actual reservation of the subjects. The Declaration leaves Zaghloul Pasha "free of all engagements" in entering upon the negotiations, with the single exception of the engagement to enter upon the negotiations. No responsible Egyptian will seriously contend that the reserved questions can be ignored as between Great Britain and Egypt, or that his Government is not morally and physically bound to listen to what Great Britain has to say on these subjects before he decides that they are no concern of his. On the other hand, the wiser Egyptians will welcome the discussion on equal terms as offering the first real opportunity of winning over the British Government and the British public to the soundness of the Egyptian point of view.

Text of the Declaration.

Whereas His Majesty's Government, in accordance with their declared intentions, desire forthwith to recognise Egypt as an independent sovereign State; and

Whereas the relations between His Majesty's Government and Egypt are of vital interest to the British Empire:

The following principles are hereby declared:—

1. The British Protectorate over Egypt is terminated, and Egypt is declared to be an independent sovereign State.

2. So soon as the Government of His Highness shall pass an Act of Indemnity with application to all inhabitants of Egypt martial law as proclaimed on November 2, 1914, shall be withdrawn.

3. The following matters are absolutely reserved to the discretion of His Majesty's Government until such time as it may be possible by free discussion and friendly accommodation on both sides to conclude agreements in regard thereto between His Majesty's Government and the Government of Egypt:—

(a) The security of the communications of the British Empire in Egypt;

(b) The defence of Egypt against all foreign aggression or interference, direct or indirect.

(c) The protection of foreign interests in Egypt and the protection of minorities.

(d) The Sudan.

Pending the conclusion of such agreements, the status quo in all these matters shall remain intact.

Macedonia.

The information telegraphed to The Times by its Sofia correspondent that the supreme committee of the Macedonian Revolutionary Organisation has decided in favour of discarding for the time being revolutionary methods for an intensive publicity campaign abroad is of particular interest. This decision, it is stated, was reached after a meeting held in Vienna, where the Macedonian leaders were in touch with M. Raditch, the head of the Croatian Party in Yugoslavia, who has included in his indictment of M. Pashitch's Government its handling of the Macedonian question. It goes without saying that the Macedonian Organisation could count on very limited, if any, support abroad so long as it continued to be identified with a policy of murder and raids. Interest in the Macedonian question turned mainly on its bearing on the relations between Yugoslavia and Bulgaria, and until the Macedonian leaders were prepared to substitute constitutional methods of drawing attention to their grievances for the cruder revolutionary tactics hitherto pursued, it was difficult for those who are anxious to see the Balkan Peninsula at peace to believe in the possibility of a practical solution of the Macedonian problem. It would be of interest to know the extent to which the strong attitude adopted by the Bulgarian Government against Macedonian activities in Bulgaria has contributed to the Vienna decision. Certainly the change of tactics will be appreciated nowhere more thoroughly than in Bulgaria, where the Macedonian Organisation has proved a grave embarrassment. The rank and file, it is to be hoped, will loyally accept their leaders' ruling, and it would be a tactful act on Yugoslavia's part if a complete amnesty for all Macedonian offenders could be proclaimed as an earnest of the Government's willingness to discuss a reasonable settlement.

The Mosul Negotiations.

Negotiations between Great Britain and Turkey on the status of the Mosul Vilayet, as provided for by the Treaty of Lausanne, have been opened this week in Constantinople, the chief delegates being Sir Percy Cox and Fethi Bey. In this connection special interest attaches to the assurances given to Irak by the British Government which are mentioned in the letter published this week from our Baghdad correspondent. Great Britain has undertaken not to surrender any of Irak's just claims as regards Mosul, and if the Turks refuse to recognise these claims, the subject is to be referred to the League of Nations, in accordance with Article 3 of the Treaty of Lausanne. This assurance serves to emphasise the fact that British insistence in regard to Mosul is based on our debt of honour to Irak, which we have brought into existence and must provide with a reasonable chance of being able to make good.

Indian Labour Conditions.

The Indian debate in the Commons last week produced nothing in the way of a sensation, but it was interesting as marking another stage in the changing relations between British Labour and Indian politicians. Not many months ago Labour members in the mass seemed to be dominated by the idea that the politicians were India. Now we have them calling for an extension of the franchise to enable Indian workers to protect themselves against their countrymen, and, whatever view may be formed regarding the immediate efficacy of such a measure, the fact of its being urged indicates a definite approach towards reality. The Government reply was based mainly on the legislation recently passed, or contemplated in the near future, to give industrial workers the protection they require, and Mr. Richards seems inclined to treat the franchise as a separate question, which must shortly come up for examination, rather than as an expedient to further the interests of a particular class. In this attitude he is doubtless correct, for the education of India in democracy must be general if it is to be a success; but we fancy that when he has had time to look into the question, he will find that a similar claim can be put forward for each of the oppressed classes—that is to say, for the great majority of Indians—and it would be well to get on with the foundations as quickly as possible, unpopular as such a measure would be with the small class in possession of power at the moment.

The Immediate Danger.

In our view the immediate danger to the workers in mines and factories arises from the fact that the administration of labour laws is a "transferred subject," in the hands of a Minister responsible to the provincial Council. Geneva may urge new legislation, Whitehall may press it, and Delhi may pass it, but its enforcement may rest with a Minister whose sympathies are with the old-fashioned employers, and who depends largely on them for contributions to the party funds. We may then get back to the position, familiar in the old India, of stern laws nullified by slack administration, for, as Mr. Richards was careful to remind the House, neither the India Office nor the Central Government can intervene; there may be Acts to satisfy foreign philanthropists, but no action to satisfy Indian workmen. If such a position should unfortunately come about, we can discern no remedy other than an industrial electorate sufficiently numerous, and sufficiently organised, to press its claims with effect; and to say this is merely to indicate the distance which India has still to travel on the road on which we have set her feet.

Protection for Indian Steel.

At the moment, however, India is thinking of machinery more than men, and in a few days' time the Central Legislature will be discussing the official proposals for protective duties high enough to put the steel industry firmly on its feet. The measure is popular among Indian politicians, and so far there is no hint of any serious opposition, for steel-users are in the main little people, whose voices as yet scarcely count, and Burma, which is apparently inclined to protest, does not carry much weight among Indians. It is, of course, possible that the extremists may intervene with another unexpected gesture, but they are not a very happy family just now, and, as things stand at present, the prospects of definite protection are bright. The measure is strictly temporary, as the first steps to Protection almost always are, and it will necessarily come up for revision after a little experience has been gained. Indians are not very fond of learning from other parts of the world, but, all the same, we may advise them to file for reference the records of our present controversies over the McKenna duties, which show at least that it is a far more complex business to stop Protection than to start it.

The Egyptian Mixed Courts celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of their institution on May 14.

An exhibition of native arts and crafts is being held in Algiers. The exhibits will form the nucleus of those for next year's Paris Exhibition, in which Algeria, Morocco, and Tunisia have decided to take part.

Sir Herbert Samuel has sent a German sword for exhibition in the Palestine section of the British Empire Exhibition at Wembley. Afterwards it is to be presented to the Imperial War Museum for the purpose of being turned into a sickle.

The Times Simla correspondent states that the situation in the Khost district of Afghanistan appears to be much improved, and it is hoped that the Afghan Government will shortly be able to bring to heel those sections of the population which have been inclined to give trouble.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Tuesday Morning.

The Fall of M. Poincaré.

The result of the French elections was greeted with unfeigned jubilation by the majority of English papers, which were in the habit of adopting the superficial view that most of Europe's ills sprang from the foreign policy of M. Poincaré. In particular, the Labour Party were overflowing with good spirits, because they in their modest way connected the defeat of M. Poincaré with the speeches and the letters of our own Prime Minister. But it is extremely doubtful whether it was the Ruhr policy of the French Government that turned the peasants against M. Poincaré—and more doubtful still whether they paid any heed to the warnings of Mr. MacDonald. As far as one can gather, it was the high cost of living and, in general, the domestic policy of M. Poincaré's Administration that pulled him down.

Europe will, therefore, have in all probability to wait some considerable time before French foreign policy changes in any fundamental. Certainly the French people were very bitter on home matters, but they are too intelligent to make that bitterness a reason for upsetting their foreign policy. There is in France—and this is a fact that many Englishmen cannot get themselves to believe—no willingness to "forgive" the Germans, although there are many Frenchmen who think that it is impossible ever to get any considerable reparations from Germany, and who would, therefore, come out of the Ruhr, and, incidentally, forgo the colonial schemes in places like Morocco and Syria.

A Revival of Liberalism?

"The time has come," said Mr. Lloyd George last week, "for a vigorous restatement of the Liberal faith in contrast to all the creeds that assail it." And, indeed, what is called a great party push is not only threatened, but actually in process of organisation. Mr. Lloyd George evoked the names of Hampden, Cromwell, and Gladstone, and it is in the name of "Liberty" as these three men conceived it (was their conception identical?) that the Liberals throughout the country are endeavouring to draw up a programme which shall attract Englishmen from the "tired" beliefs of Toryism and the "earthquaking" policy of Labour. A feature of this mighty chorus will, according to Mr. Lloyd George, be the inevitable

"Song of the Land." It is curious how this ex-Premier, like a bridge player when in doubt leading trumps, turns in moments of perplexity to the land. One would have thought that he is too well aware of what farmers think of him, and that there is certainly, wherever else there may be hope, little hope for Liberalism with the present agricultural population.

But one will be able to say more of the chances of a revival of Liberalism when the heads of that once august party have succeeded in drawing up a programme. At the moment one feels, despite the undoubted presence of intellect in support of it, that it is too much out of touch with contemporary sentiment for there to be a prospect of any considerable revival.

The Debate on the McKenna Duties.

The debating honours of the discussion in the House upon the McKenna duties remained with the Government, but they were rather disreputable honours. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in defence, was infinitely more clever than Mr. Baldwin had been in attack, and scored all sorts of inessential points—he must surely have known exactly how the members of his own party and also how the Liberals were going to vote.

But it is impossible to discover any real answer to Mr. Baldwin's contention that the repeal of the duties would throw men out of work. There is much theoretical justification for the repeal of the duties, admittedly; but it is a matter of common wonder why the present moment, of all times, should be chosen to adjust to certain beautiful economic theories our financial system.

For some absurd reason the issue had been generally narrowed down to the motor-car industry, and particularly to the works of Morris Motors, Limited. In the House Mr. Snowden was able to make great play with some figures that had been supplied by this firm, but how this verbal play will be appreciated by the people most concerned will be seen at the forthcoming by-election at Oxford (where the Morris motors are made). This picturesque election—there are three Blues standing—is due to the unseating of Mr. Frank Gray, owing to the malpractices of one of his agents, and it will be watched with much more than usual interest.

The Position of the Government.

There seems to be a general agreement that the Government in recent days has done a good deal to weaken its position, and this, curiously enough, rather over matters of form than over any concrete actions. Speeches of members of the Labour Party, both inside and out of the House, have been marked by a certain gratuitous attribution of wickedness of intention to the other side. The most notable was that of the Prime Minister at the Albert Hall last week, which even The Times was moved to reprove. This speech contained all the old suspicion against the evil capitalist who was ready at a minute's notice to discharge men, order lock-outs, and so on—all for the simple purpose of discrediting a Labour Government.

Again, in the House, the Chancellor of the Exchequer alleged that he had irrefutable evidence of "terrorism" of British workmen in regard to the McKenna duties. To talk of "duress," "intimidation," and the rest of the very old-fashioned slogans is not the surest way to retain either the support of the Liberal Party in the House or the respect of the Conservatives. It seems that the Government only indulges in these senseless sallies against its invisible opponents when it is particularly sure of its ground; for when the issue of a certain matter cannot be easily foreseen, it is as full of common sense as any other Government, and forgets its early upbringing.

A Golfing Star.

It was very heartening to read of C. A. Whitcombe's wonderful achievement at Deal in doing seventy-two holes in 289 strokes, and, indeed, the golfing world has talked of nothing else since. To finish nine strokes ahead of anybody else suggests that this young professional from the West Country is, in fact, a "star," and one's only hope is that he may be persuaded to remain in England, and not to go, as so many of our most proficient sportsmen go, to the United States.

In no other sport in England has anything like this record been set up in recent times; neither in cricket nor in boxing nor in rowing is anybody so far ahead of his competitors as the winner of the £1,000 professional competition has proved himself to be.

Baghdad, May 5.

Cabinet Rumours.

Rumour, not the idle, distorted tittle-tattle of the coffee shops, but a more reliable variety emanating from the well-informed "news agencies" to be found in the diwans of most of the ashraf of Baghdad, has been busy about the Cabinet. Individual resignations (unaccepted) seem to indicate that the members themselves perceive the imminence of the Cabinet's fall. It is an open secret that certain ex-Ministers have been working for some time past to bring about this end, and at one time it appeared that their hopes had been realised, for the news flew round from mouth to mouth that Yassin Pasha had been offered the Premiership. Baghdad was amazed, bewildered, sceptical, or exultant, according to the political views of its inhabitants; for Yassin Pasha, President of the Committee detailed by the Constituent Assembly to examine the Anglo-Irak Treaty, was known to be one of the foremost opponents of its ratification. It was hinted that the Government, in panic-stricken fear that the extremists had gained such a hold over the Deputies as to make the rejection of the Treaty a grave possibility, made their offer to Yassin Pasha on condition that he withdrew his opposition. Though the Cabinet is said to have tendered its resignation, which was not accepted, the fact that Jaafer Pasha's Cabinet still remains in office is put down to the unwillingness of even a man of Yassin's calibre to face public opinion after such a volte face. The truth of the above is open to doubt, but, none the less, the wiseacres nod their heads knowingly, prophesying that the Treaty will be ratified within a few days, and that a place will be found in the reconstructed Cabinet for Yassin Pasha.

A New Party.

The new party is nameless, leaderless, and almost inarticulate. Its awakening and its silence—a silence broken only by furtive confidences and whisperings at street corners—are both attributable to the fear engendered by the recent attempted assassinations and orgy of political intrigue. This party is neither pro- nor anti- Treaty. It is not the latter, because it welcomes an alliance with Britain; it is not the former, because it deprecates a continuance of the present dual control. Its members dislike political murder and violence as much as administrative inefficiency and procrastination; hence their objection to purely Arab rule; and their wish for the untrammelled control of a strong Government. This alone, they think, will give them that security which will enable them to slip back into the pleasant languor of a life devoid of public responsibility, occupied only by sale and barter, work in the fields, or with the flocks, gossip, and home. Thus do they sigh for that for which they have not the energy to strive. This party will never assert itself to obtain its desires, but the sighing of so great a multitude may, perhaps, suffice to ensure that alliance with Great Britain is not finally rejected.

The Asfar Concession.

Last week's overland convoy from Baghdad to Beyrout carried the largest number of passengers since its inauguration. Among them were Sir Thomas Ward and Dr. Asfar. Both have been visiting this country in connection with an agricultural development concession, the latter as concessionaire, the former as technical adviser on irrigation questions. Sir John Norton-Griffiths, who is interested in the financing of the proposed company, returned to England some days earlier.

The first project examined was one propounded by Sir William Willcocks—namely, the construction of a barrage at Fallujah, on the Euphrates, together with an escape to the Habbaniyah Lake, which scheme would make possible an extensive canal system between the Euphrates and the Tigris. The probable income, however, from the large expenditure which would be involved (estimated at £10,000,000) was not sufficiently great to make the scheme an attractive one, especially in view of further disadvantages. These were the difficulty of gauging the economic effect of such an upheaval in the agricultural life of the country, and the uncertainty as to the water supply of the Euphrates itself, owing to French schemes for utilising the water in the upper reaches of the river for the development of cotton cultivation in Syria.

Attention was, therefore, diverted to another project on the Diyala, a river flowing south-west from the Persian Hills to join the Tigris a few miles below Baghdad. This scheme contemplates the construction of a huge reservoir, which would cover some four hundred square miles, submerge the town of Kizil Robat to a depth of 150 ft., and contain about 350 milliard cubic metres of water—a capacity some four or five times larger than that of Assouan. By this undertaking about one and a half million acres of desert lying between the Tigris and the Persian frontier could be put under wheat and cotton cultivation.

At present, however, the promoters, subject, of course, to their concession being ratified, propose confining themselves to a small experimental project in each of the areas mentioned above, with a view to testing for themselves the suitability of the localities for cotton growing. The one on the Diyala entails the construction of a small weir, and cultivation will be by flow, while that on the Euphrates will rely on pumps for irrigation.

of the world, has been fully justified. Within a few days of Squadron-Leader Maclaren's leaving Baghdad on his attempt to fly round the world, two other aeroplanes, both on long-distance flights, have arrived. One is a French machine, the other a Portuguese, the first being bound for Japan, and the second for Macao, the Portuguese settlement on the coast of China.

A remarkable feature of the French flight is that only two and a half days—twenty-three hours actual flying—were taken to reach Baghdad from Paris. The route taken was across Germany (Strassburg and Munich), and, following the Danube, over Vienna, Budapest, and Belgrade to Bucharest, where the first night was spent. The next day Lieut. Pelchet d'Oisy, the pilot, made Aleppo by way of Constantinople and Anatolia; leaving there the following morning, he reached Baghdad shortly after noon, after a journey as rapid as it was free from trouble. Good fortune continued to attend this small Breguet scout, for, leaving Baghdad on a Sunday, it reached Karachi on the following Tuesday afternoon.

Return of the Ulema.

Most of the Ulema who went into voluntary exile in Persia as a protest against the deportation of their leader, Shaikh Mahdi al Khalisi, have returned to Irak, passing through Baghdad last week. There were no demonstrations of welcome, and the fact that they have been allowed to return at a time when the fate of the Treaty is still in the balance seems to indicate that the Government considers their influence destroyed.

May 7.

Anglo-Irak Treaty.

During the last few days the position as regards the Treaty has undergone a complete change. The fear, noticeable in the early part of the week, that the Treaty would be rejected was by the end of it replaced by a general confidence in its final ratification.

The publication in the local Press of two letters from Sir Henry Dobbs to H.M. King Faisal largely accounts for this reversal of opinion. In the first place, the High Commissioner pointed out that, as it was contrary to long-established international practice to make any alteration in treaties between their signature and ratification, the British Government was unable to consent to any modification of the present terms; it therefore remained for the Constituent Assembly either to accept or reject the Treaty as a whole, as they might consider best in the interests of Irak.

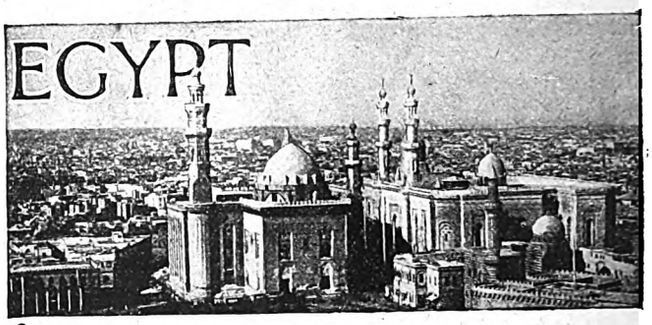
At the same time he was able to give certain assurances.

(1) His Majesty's Government would not, at the coming conference at Constantinople, surrender any of Irak's just claims as regards Mosul, and if the Turks refused to recognise these claims, it would refer them to the League of Nations, in accordance with Article 3 of the Treaty of Lausanne.

(2) It would ask the League of Nations to accept the Treaty in substitution for the Mandate.

(3) It would not, so far as this lay in its own power, continue to hold the Mandate for Irak after the termination of the present Treaty, whether Irak had gained admission to the League of Nations or not.

(4) It would be prepared in accordance with Article XVIII. to review the terms of the Treaty once it had been ratified, with a view to agreeing upon revision.



Cairo, May 11.

The Government and the Negotiations.

Yesterday evening's session of the Chamber of Deputies was one of the most important as well as being one of the most animated that the Egyptian Lower Chamber has yet known. Following on the cessation of Parliamentary activity during the Bairam holidays, there was a considerable accumulation of work, especially of questions, which were so numerous that the necessity had arisen for establishing a priority list, choosing the fifteen most important interrogations for immediate replies, and leaving the others until some later date or until, as will more likely be their fate, they are relegated to the limbo of forgotten things. Much the most interesting question on the list was that of Sayed Bey Foda, who had given notice of his intention to ask the Premier why it was, since Turkish suzerainty over Egypt had been ended, and the country declared independent, that there were still British troops here; and, secondly, whether the Prime Minister would give an undertaking that the Egyptian Delegation to go to London would not negotiate with any other object in view than securing the unconditional independence of Egypt. As had been expected, the Prime Minister took this opportunity of making a statement of his Government's policy and of replying to the open criticisms of the Opposition Press, which have found an echo, though a faint one, in the ranks of some of the more lukewarm of his supporters. Such a statement had become the more necessary, from the Zaghloulist Party point of view, as a result of Mr. Ramsay MacDonald's references in the House of Commons on Thursday last to the British Government's adherence to the point of view set out in the Declaration to Egypt of February 28, 1922. This Declaration, on which the Egyptian Constitution and the whole of the structure of representative government in this country have been built, remains the bête noire of the Wafd as much to-day as when Zaghloul Pasha was in opposition. The Premier yesterday night evidently felt that the time had come to speak more clearly than, since he came into office, he has done, and he did not mince his words regarding the hated Declaration. "I rejected it when I was leader of the Wafd, and I reject it again now that I am leader of the Egyptian Government" was a sentence which evoked tremendous applause. Zaghloul Pasha was equally explicit as to the conditions upon which he will consent to begin negotiations and the only settlement which he will accept. As to the first, he will accept no agreements concluded by preceding Ministries, while the only kind of settlement with Great Britain which he will recommend the Egyptian Parliament to accept will be complete independence for Egypt and the Sudan. Although he did not say it in so many words, the Premier certainly led the Chamber to believe that his definition of "complete independence" means no British troops anywhere, either on the Canal or at Khartoum, or anywhere else in the Nile Valley.

Clouds on the Horizon.

The Premier's speech is applauded by this morning's Arabic newspapers, although they do not attempt to disguise the fact that this kind of declaration is not calculated to make the task of the negotiators in London any the more easy. But for some days past the Arabic Press, echoing the sentiment in Egyptian political circles, has been tempering its enthusiasm for negotiations and its certainty of the possibility of a satisfactory settlement. There is little doubt that Zaghloul Pasha, as his hesitation in replying to Mr. MacDonald's invitation has shown, has been debating the advisability of negotiating at all unless there is a more than fair chance of his being able to return to Egypt with a proposition which he can recommend the country to accept. Another failure would further the plans of nobody excepting the section of Egyptian politicians who have gained prominence through agitation, and for whom a treaty with Great Britain would mean an unwelcome return to obscurity. The Prime Minister, as he said himself last night, has no intention of going to London at all, unless he feels that there is hope of a triumphant return to Cairo. And recent declarations by Mr. Ramsay MacDonald have given rise to doubts whether even a Labour Government is prepared to abandon Egypt, the Sudan, and the Suez Canal with no better guarantees for British interests than an alliance with a Power whose fighting forces consist of 17,000 reluctant conscripts. It would be a mistake to attach undue importance to the present wave of pessimism in Egypt, but it would be equally an error to imagine that settling the Egyptian question is going to be simply a matter of a few friendly chats between the two Premiers.

The Visit of Ras Tafari.

Seldom has Cairo entertained so picturesque a visitor as the Ras Tafari, who left on Thursday, after a very full ten days of sight-seeing and entertainment. His Imperial Highness and his suite stayed at Shepheard's Hotel, where they were very accessible to visitors of all kinds, to whom they expressed their delight and surprise with the luxury of life in Cairo. The kaleidoscope of Egyptian life to be seen from Shepheard's terrace was a never-failing source of entertainment to the Abyssinians, who took an intense interest in every detail, down to the Boy Scouts and their bands and the doormats—apparently unknown in Abyssinia—at the top of the terrace steps. Ras Tafari and his suite brought with them an enormous quantity of baggage, including some magnificent presents, some of which were given to King Fuad before the party left Cairo. For King George there is a superb assortment of ivory, while the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier is to have placed on it a wreath, also of ivory, and exquisitely worked.

The Future of the English School.

The difficulties being met by the English school in Cairo were dealt with in this correspondence last November, and since that time things have been steadily getting worse. It is impossible for the school, if it is to maintain the high standard which alone makes it worth while, to support itself from the very moderate fees which are all that the parents of most of the children can afford to pay. The withdrawal by the British Government last year of its annual subsidy was a serious blow, made all the harder to bear by the steady departure from Egypt of many of the British officials who in the past have worked for and subscribed to the school. Things were getting into a desperate state when it became known that the English Church authorities in Egypt had taken over the school, for which, in future, the Diocese will be responsible.

The Opposition in Parliament.

Yesterday evening's excitement in the Chamber of Deputies was not confined to the Prime Minister's speech, referred to at the beginning of this letter. The first "scene" which the Chamber has yet known was another feature of the proceedings. It arose out of the proposal, carried by an enormous majority, to exclude from the Chamber the reporters of the Siassa newspaper, the organ of the Liberal Constitutionals, which has been very critical of the deputies' doings, especially of their voting themselves salaries of £E600 a year. Since that time the majority party have been, for the Siassa, the "Hisb el Sitta Mia" (Party of the Six Hundred). The Chamber yesterday evening retaliated as stated above. Some time after the division a keen-eyed deputy noticed a member of the Siassa staff, not, it is true, in the Press Gallery, but calmly surveying the House from the Visitors' Gallery, and rose to move that the horrid journalist be ejected, and that the deputy who had given the ticket of admission which had enabled the enemy to entrench himself up aloft should be censured. A heated discussion arose, in which the journalist in question himself joined, shouting down an explanation of his presence to the scandalised heads of the deputies below, and, in the end, not the journalist alone, but the deputy who had given the ticket, and another deputy who expressed views contrary to those of the majority, were all, by vote of the Chamber, requested to leave the Chamber, the reporter for good and the two deputies until the end of the session.

May-Day Disturbances.

The First of May did not unfortunately pass without bloodshed in Athens. A party of about 300 noisy Communists, disregarding police orders, concentrated outside the Municipal Theatre with the object of marching up Stadium Street. As no notice was taken of the repeated requests of the police to disperse, fire-pumps were used. It appears, however, that the cold water acted as a stimulant to the energy of the Communists, who, far from dispersing, attacked the policemen with chairs to which they helped themselves from a near-by café. Some of them even attempted to cut the hose-pipes which were turned on them. The officer in charge of the police force, realising the danger, ordered the men under him to fire in the air, after which they charged the crowds with the butt-end of their rifles. An indescribable panic followed, during which many were crushed. The total number of casualties reported by the police was twelve civilians and five policemen wounded. No one was killed, but one of the injured Communists subsequently died in hospital.

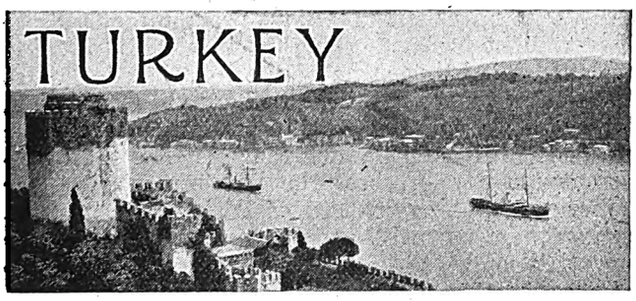
On the following day a deputation representing the trade unions called on the Prime Minister and demanded the immediate release of all the Communists (about fifty) who had been arrested in connection with the disturbances of the previous morning. The trade unionists added that if the Government did not comply with their request a general strike would be proclaimed throughout the country. A man like Colonel Plastiras would have no doubt sent the insolent delegates about their business, but M. Papanastasiou, being a Socialist himself, saw the whole thing in a different light. and ordered the release.

The Oath to the Republic.

The ceremony of the oath of allegiance to the new régime of the State functionaries took place on May Day at the Athens Cathedral in the presence of the temporary Governor, Admiral Koundouriotis, and the entire Council of Ministers. The ceremony was performed by the Metropolitan of Athens, Monseigneur Chrysostomos, who was assisted by the members of the Holy Synod.

The Army took the oath in the afternoon in the spacious Champs de Mars. After the ceremony the troops were reviewed by the Minister of War, General Kondylis, and then marched through the main thoroughfares of the city on their way back to the barracks.



Constantinople, May 13.

The Public Debt.

The principal events since the Executive has had all its own way owing to the prorogation of the Assembly have not been very spectacular, but they are none the less significant, in that they demonstrate the intention of the Government to uproot, coûte que coûte, any and every relic of the past which may be considered to be tainted with non-Turkish spirit or influence.

The apparently modest administrative order, which enacted that the direction of the Public Debt should be concentrated at Angora, and that the few receipts which had been until the present time under the control of the recognised administration at Constantinople should be diverted to the unrecognised administration at Angora, is an event of the first importance for Turkey, and it is refreshing to find that Turkish journals are strongly opposing the gigantic cut of the Debt's budget on the good ground that by allotting the Debt less than half its estimate it is condemning a model institution to share the fate of the Ministry of Finance and other Government offices—namely, of becoming a slough of inefficiency and corruption. The papers point out that in previous years the Debt, thanks to its efficient administration was able to hand over to the Government a substantial cheque after settling all its liabilities, and thus keeping Turkish credit abroad in a flourishing condition. Now nobody will get anything—certainly not the foreign creditor. Official protests are said to be in process of concoction, but to judge by the effect of most of the official protests which have been made since last autumn, no amount of protesting is likely to do any good until these enthusiastic amateurs of the art of running a State have had a little more experience of the difficulty of replacing damaged machinery.

The Patriarchate and the Rabbinate.

Another development which merits attention is the recrudescence of the question of the position of the Œcumenical Patriarchate and the Grand Rabbinate. Apart from interminable and futile litigation over the various scandals, which have been engineered by the orthodox partisans of Papa Eftim, little progress has been overtly made with the cherished plan of getting rid of the Patriarchate. Recently, however, Mustapha Kemal is reported to have made statements in an interview with the correspondent of the New York Herald which show that he personally approves the abolition of both Armenian and Greek Patriarchates and also of the Grand Rabbinate. This useful hint was at once acted upon by the leaders of the anti-patriarch party in the Orthodox community in Constantinople, who sent an ultimatum in the form of a telegram to the Phanar. They demanded the immediate abdication of the new Patriarch Gregory, and the dissolution and reformation of the Holy Synod. In case of refusal to comply with these demands, they are reported as intending to set up a new patriarchate of their own with materials from Anatolia, i.e., three archbishops and ten priests, who are awaiting at Ismid the word "Go."

Turkey and Russia.

The foreign relations of Turkey have also come in for their share of attention during the past few days, thanks to the incident between Tahsin Bey, the first secretary of the Russian Legation in Moscow, and the Russian authorities, on his entry into Russia. He was arrested and, it is said, subjected to very harsh treatment on the charge of attempting to import twenty bales of merchandise in virtue of his diplomatic passport. The incident is causing much emotion in Turkish circles in this city, for, since the last shreds of the seemingly official veil of friendliness between the two countries have been torn away, the Turk has realised, and seen it notified to the world, that he is so lonely that no one has any compunction in insulting him. This latest incident has revived memories of the Erivan insult to the Turkish flag some months ago, and people are beginning to ask Ismet Pasha impatiently in print what he is going to do about it.

Matters have already reached the stage when the ascending scale of reciprocal punitive measures is being composed. The Turko-Russian honeymoon of 1921 and 1922 is completely finished; it was one of the emptiest blagues that the political history of the twentieth century has to show, but perhaps the Turks consider that it served its turn.

The Diplomatic Service.

One of the provisions of the Organic Statute is likely to cause a certain amount of shuffling in the personnel of the Turkish diplomatic service. It enacts that a diplomat must choose between his diplomatic career and his parliamentary career, for he cannot be at the same time a member of the Assembly and hold a diplomatic appointment. Dr. Adnan Bey, who has so long presided over the delegation of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs at Constantinople, and lent daily an ear to the complaints of the foreign diplomatic representatives, has apparently decided that the Deputy's life at Angora is less exhausting, and has opted for that alternative. The present representative in London, Yussuf Kemal Bey, is said also to have opted for Angora, while Husrev Bey, at Budapest, is reported to prefer the charms of the Hungarian capital. The decision is an important one both for the individual and for the State. As things are at present, the Deputy has a settled job and a fixed, if modest, income for a period of four years, whereas the diplomat never knows when he may be superseded. The State, also, should benefit from the new regulation, for it tends to help in the creation of a body of professional diplomatists, of whose special qualities the Turkish State stands in need

PERSIA.

Teheran, April 20.

The Political Situation.

No sooner had the Prime Minister's proclamation urging the people to give up all idea of a Republic and to refrain from discussing the matter further been published than the situation underwent yet another of those frequently occurring kaleidoscopic changes to which one has become accustomed in Persia. The fact that he had lost the support of the Parliament over the question of the Republic appeared to be a great disappointment to Sardar Sepah, and for some days after public opinion (as evidenced by the large crowd which expressed its disapproval of a change in the régime outside the Mejliss on March 22—a crowd estimated at many thousands) seemed to have turned against him, the Premier appeared to have lost interest in his work, and it was noticed that he did not attend the discussions and meetings of the Cabinet. On Monday afternoon, April 7, great consternation was caused by the news that Sardar Sepah had left the town for one of his properties near Demavend, some twenty miles from the capital. He addressed a letter to the Mejliss stating that overstrain of work had caused him fatigue and the recent events a certain amount of disappointment, and he had, therefore, decided to retire for a while and take a rest from his public duties, and he appointed the Chief of the Staff and the next senior officer to take charge of all matters connected with the Ministry of War and the Army, this practically amounting to a resignation of his high offices. The following evening a private session was held in the Mejliss, and the position created by Sardar Sepah's departure from the capital was fully discussed, and after a vote of confidence had been passed by a large majority it was decided to send a deputation to wait on the Prime Minister at the village of Rudhend, where he was staying, and advise him of the Parliament's confidence in him, requesting him at the same time to return to Teheran and resume the Premiership by forming and presenting a fresh Cabinet to the Mejliss. To this Sardar Sepah consented, and that same evening he arrived at his up-country residence outside the town, where he stayed a couple of days, returning to the capital on Saturday, the 12th inst. On his arrival the Crown Prince sent one of the Royal Princes to inquire after the Prime Minister's health, and the latter thereupon went in person to the Valiahd and was received in audience. The Shah, also, who had been advised by the Mejliss of their confidence in Sardar Sepah, in reply to His Majesty's telegram from Europe asking them to recommend a Prime Minister, telegraphed his approval of the Parliament's action, and Sardar Sepah thus again took up the reins of government, and on Sunday presented his new Cabinet. This was practically the same as the previous one, with the exception of the Ministries of Public Works and Public Instruction, these portfolios changing hands in consequence of the former Ministers electing to sit as Deputies in Parliament, for, according to Persian constitutional law, a member of the Ministry must resign his post if he wishes to take his seat in the Mejliss. Amir Eghtedar became Minister of Posts and Telegraphs in place of General Khodayar Khan, and Zoka ul Mulk and Mudir ul Mulk retain the portfolios of Foreign Affairs and Finance. The former, after the presentation of the Cabinet, proceeded to read out the Government's programme. This began with the stereotyped formulæ of the maintenance of friendly relations with foreign Powers, financial and other reforms in the various Government departments, and the upkeep of an army adequate for the defence of the country and for ensuring internal order and security, and hinting at compulsory military service in the near future. The Government would ask the present Parliament to ratify the Northern Oil Concession, which was granted to the Sinclair Company by the fourth Mejliss, and would submit Bills for the construction of railways and other new roads for the development of trade. In addition to these, the Government intended to improve and spread education and extend the existing lines of postal and telegraphic communication to places which did not at present have these facilities, as well as initiating an air force for military and postal purposes and inaugurating wireless telegraphy. Another object the Government had in view was the introduction of a uniform system of weights and measures, which at present vary in different parts of the country.

This forms a most ambitious programme, and the Government has not been slow in already drawing up and submitting some of the mentioned Bills to the Mejliss, especially the Northern Oil Concession, which the Government is most anxious to have ratified with as little delay as possible. In this connection Mr. Forbes, the representative of the American banking concern of Blair and Company, arrived here recently, and has already entered into negotiations with the Government with regard to the loan of ten million dollars in connection with the above concession.

Ramadan.

We are now in Ramadan, the month during which the average Persian turns night into day and most of the day into night. When the fast falls in the cool weather the enforced abstention is naturally much less exacting than at the beginning of the summer, as at present, and it is, therefore, not astonishing that the average person who has been up most of the night eating, drinking, and making merry after the long day's fast, sleeps the greater part of the morning. It is for this reason that all Government offices are closed during the forenoon and are only open from 1 p.m. till the evening. Guns in different parts of the town announce the hour of commencing the fast and the hour of happy relaxation, and it is rather alarming, if one forgets the occasion, to be rudely awakened at about 4 in the morning by the boom of the guns, which, in the deep stillness of the Eastern night (broken only at times by the singing of the merrymakers), sound like the crack of doom!

According to the Izvestia of April 22, an outbreak of bubonic and pneumonic plague has occurred in the Syr-Darya district (Central Asia), and in the Khvaresm (the former Khanate of Khiva) Republic, the extent of which is not ascertained. The Commissariat for Health is assigning special funds and sending medical units to combat the epidemic.

WINGED WORDS IN EGYPT.

It is a matter for regret that the appeal so eloquently made on a recent occasion by the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs and by the Egyptian Minister in London that there should be no attempt to prejudice the negotiations shortly to be opened between the British and Egyptian Governments has not been endorsed by Zaghloul Pasha himself. The statements attributed to the Egyptian Prime Minister in the Chamber of Deputies on May 10, and again on May 14, at a meeting of senators of the Zaghloulist Party are of such a provocative character that there is some excuse for the belief apparently held in Egypt that Zaghloul Pasha would welcome a way of escape from the negotiations. In any other country than Great Britain it is conceivable that such strong exception would be taken to his remarks that the invitation issued to him to come to London would have to be cancelled; but the British Government is not likely to adopt this course, and it may be of interest to examine the reasons why we should not take Zaghloul Pasha's utterances too tragically. In the first place, his position is not an easy one; during the period of fierce agitation he had to emphasise his attitude with some exaggeration, and in particular he had to denounce in unmeasured terms the political opponents who were prepared to come to an understanding with Great Britain. For the "moderates" of those days it is now a simple thing to taunt Zaghloul Pasha in office with being positively pro-British in comparison with their own statesmanlike attitude, and we must infer that for the first time his great forensic gifts have failed him, and, feeling unequal to the task of turning the laugh against his opponents, he has fallen back on reiteration of his inflexible intransigence in all dealings with Great Britain. In this country we understand the game of politics, and we can afford to look good-humouredly on the Egyptian Parliament's present craze for Britain-baiting. If there is room for any regret, it would be because Zaghloul Pasha has stepped down from the pedestal on which the British nation is always ready to place an opponent who has scored against it. Having pitted himself with conspicuous success against Great Britain, he ought to have been able to hold his own against a handful of his own countrymen who are trying to embarrass him. Nothing is easier than to capitulate to extremism; statesmanship is made of sterner stuff, and does not yield to uninformed clamour.

Care should be taken in this country not to fall into the errors that the Egyptians seem to be making in their inability to understand the British attitude and the British character. Reference has been made to the difficulties of Zaghloul Pasha's position, and he must be allowed to be the best judge of the most effective way of extricating himself. He has stipulated that he is "not bound by Mr. MacDonald's statements in the House of Commons," and presumably he wishes to imply that Mr. MacDonald need not take any notice of his statements in the Egyptian Parliament. There may, therefore, be something very subtle and suitable, in reference to the character and mentality of his followers, in his endless repetition of the quite meaningless phrase, "the complete independence of Egypt and the Sudan," and in the stress laid on his "rejection" of the Declaration of February, 1922. In regard to Egypt and the Sudan the position is that Great Britain has held in Egypt the rôle that Great Britain and Egypt have jointly held in the Sudan. As the independence of Egypt has been secured by the withdrawal of Britain and by leaving the Egyptians to manage their own affairs, it is obvious that the independence of the Sudan cannot be secured by the elimination of only one of the occupying Powers and by leaving Sudanese affairs to be managed not by Sudanese, but by Egyptians. Again, the Declaration of February, 1922, was, as its title implies, a unilateral communication from Great Britain, calling for neither acceptance nor rejection; it actually started Egypt on the path of independence, while leaving certain matters to be arranged subsequently. No harm is done, therefore, when Zaghloul Pasha reminds his followers with such emphasis that he has never accepted the Declaration, and has no intention of doing so. He and they have been living under and acting upon the Declaration for two years, and now the time has come, in the words of the Declaration, to "conclude agreements" on the reserved matters. With the conclusion of a treaty between Egypt and Great Britain, the Declaration becomes an interesting historical document and nothing more.

The cold fact is that Zaghloul Pasha and his followers may inveigh against the phlegmatic and tolerant British without causing us sleepless nights; the main danger lies in rash utterances in regard to Egypt's internal politics. Thus Zaghloul Pasha has threatened to resign if there is "no hope" of his attaining his object, "the full independence of Egypt and the Sudan." In view of Egypt's independence, which is already an accomplished matter for all practical purposes of administration, the resignation of an Egyptian Prime Minister leaves Great Britain quite unaffected. It is not the British Government, but the King of Egypt, who will have to find a successor; and when an Opposition makes government impossible under the present Constitution, it will still not be Great Britain's affair if other methods regarded as more suited to the Egyptian political genius are adopted for the smooth running of the administrative machinery. Self-interest, as well as discretion, therefore, seems to point to the advisability of the Egyptian Prime Minister's avoiding all hasty promises at this juncture. He will not be the first person to discover that there are more things in heaven and earth—possibly even in Egypt and the Sudan—than his political philosophy has envisaged. Of one thing he may be quite sure, that the British are far more likely to regard his ability, patriotism, and enthusiasm as valuable assets to Egypt than his opponents are, and they would be sorry, for Egypt's sake, to see him lose his balance through tilting over-energetically at a non-existent windmill because it is thought to be British.

THE INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON OLIVET.

BY BASIL MATHEWS.

Sitting in continuous sessions for five days at Jerusalem with eighty picked men and women from Morocco, Algeria and Tunisia, the Nile Valley, the Sudan and Abyssinia, Syria, Palestine and Turkey, and the Balkans, Arabia, Mesopotamia and Persia, Central Turkestan, and North India, I have tried to recall any parallel to this grouping of intimate first-hand experience with and knowledge of the peoples of North Africa and Western Asia. No such parallel comes to the mind.

The Conference, which sat and lived in buildings on the Mount of Olives generously lent by the Greek Patriarch of Jerusalem, was called—under the chairmanship of Dr. John R. Mott—by the International Missionary Council, which now represents directly the National Missionary Councils of North America, South America, Britain, Scandinavia, France and Germany, India, China, Japan, South Africa, and Australasia.

Some years of preparation had been made for this Conference, and a group of regional international conferences in North-West Africa, the Nile Valley, and Syria and Palestine, which led up to that at Jerusalem held in the first week in April. In the Conference there were men and women guiding the colleges and universities, such as the American University at Beyrout, with its thousand students from all over these areas, the newer American University at Cairo, and similar institutions from Athens, Constantinople, and Smyrna to Assiout up the Nile, and on a smaller scale in Mesopotamia and Persia. They included the Bishops of Persia, Jerusalem, and Egypt and the Sudan. Some of these men and women were born in the country, born of parents who had given decades of service to the Near East, and who themselves have given their lives. There were doctors from these areas whose knowledge, of course, is in some ways the most intimate of all, from the Atlas Mountains to Cairo and Teheran. There were missionaries whose life is concentrated on daily, hourly, talking with the peoples of the Near East and the peoples of all classes and creeds from Mufti to fellahin.

All, of course, knew the language and even the dialects of their areas intimately.

Dr. Margoliouth, Professor of Arabic in Oxford University, had come out from England specially for this Conference, as had its chairman, Dr. John R. Mott. Under Dr. Mott's guiding the Conference worked from 8.30 in the morning till 10 at night on getting a realistic and true view of the new post-War mentality of those areas and in shaping afresh (in the light of that knowledge) the attitude of Christian folk toward the peoples of the non-European Mediterranean world and its hinterlands. To read carefully the following paragraph, with its summary of the changed conditions, is to visualise the main outline of this transformed world. The paragraph comes from the Conference itself :—

> The shattering impact of the War itself, the rise of clamant nationalisms and race movements cutting across Pan-Islamic policy, the Bolshevist ferment, the Caliphate agitation, the increased government of Islamic peoples by European Powers, the critical debate on the civilisation of Christendom, the eastward spread of European scepticism, the rebellion against traditionalism and external authority, the hunger for knowledge of new scientific thought and invention, the canvassing of the status of Oriental womanhood, the growing spirit of fraternity in and with the Oriental Churches, and some strong reactionary movements are all factors in producing a profound and widespread change that can be described soberly and with precision as epoch-making.

One clear indication of this widespread change in outlook was dramatically staged upon the arena of the Near East, even while the delegates were beginning to move toward Jerusalem in the abolition of the Khalifate by Turkey. The result of the explosion of that nationalistic bomb, dropped with such shattering effect in the heart of the Moslem world, will take decades to work out. Christian people, the Conference felt, must think through and carry out in practice a Christlike policy towards all the peoples who, amid these manifold and profound changes, are, for the first time in fourteen centuries, looking afresh for a secure foundation for a progressive national and international life.

For some four hours each day the Conference broke up into ten expert groups on subjects on which they were instructed to bring in "findings" —forward-looking, fresh, and calling for executive action. They worked to some purpose, for the resultant resolutions, overhauled line by line by the whole Conference in a fourteen hour final day, may well inaugurate a fresh era in the educational, literary, medical, and evangelistic work in those areas.

The subjects grappled with by those groups were the Christian occupation of the different regions and the accessibility of their peoples; the best way of presenting Christian truth so that it may appeal to the hearts of men in all the depths of its creative reality; the growth of the Church in these lands; the education of their young life; the development of a strong native leadership; the provision of an adequate literature; the medical and social needs of the people; the changing status and outlook of their womanhood; the spiritual dynamic that is the driving energy of a truly Christian enterprise; and lines of practical and effective co-operation between the forces.

The Conference itself had, of course, no actual executive authority to decide that these views shall take effect; but as they represent the very thoroughly considered mind of representative men and women called together at the will of the boards of the Missionary Societies of North America, Britain, and Europe, and now go back to those boards with all the weight of such judgment, their influence on policy is bound to be great.

Among the dominating trends in that policy is the fuller development of co-operation and comity in all fields of work, not only to avoid overlapping, but to secure higher educational, medical, and other forms of efficiency. An intensely practical outcome here was the recommendation (which will probably take early effect) of the establishment of a Central Literature Bureau to help to co-ordinate the work of the existing Christian Presses and their editorial staffs, and the grouping of the workers over this wide area in an International Council with an all-time secretariat.

The personal and official visits of the Greek Patriarch, with his obviously whole-hearted interest in the work of the Conference, opened up also in a wider way the interesting lines of fellowship already initiated between the Western forces and the ancient Oriental Churches, which are revealing fresh possibilities of active expanding life.

Most important of all, perhaps, is the strong trend of judgment towards a new alignment of thought in the Western world toward the peoples of these areas to try to replace the old bloody feuds of race and creed that scar their history for centuries with reconciliation; to move away from revenge toward constructive co-operation.

NEAR EAST BOOKSHELF.

CAUCASIA.

"THE NATIONS OF TO-DAY. A NEW HISTORY OF THE WORLD." Edited by John Buchan. The Baltic and Caucasian States. (London: Hodder and Stoughton, Ltd. 15s. net.)

With the new States, Finland, Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania, whose story fills the first and second thirds of this volume, readers of The Near East are only indirectly concerned as bearing on the obscure future of Soviet Russia; but the mighty Caucasus forms a six hundred and fifty mile northern barrier of the Hither East, and Transcaucasia, or Ciscaucasia, as the Romans or Egyptians might have called it, comprises polities of great antiquity, which lie within the ambit of the Near and Middle East.

Only two of these so-called Caucasian States, Georgia and Caucasian Azerbaijan, earn separate sections in the 100-page final third of this book, but the mere designation of State does not make them States even in name. At the best of times, if ever there were such, Transcaucasia presents us with a hive of petty territories inhabited by wasps, of various face and language — τρόπους καὶ διαίταν σφηξὶν ἐμφερέστατοι, occasionally submitting to some nominal keeper, Aryan, Semitic, or Turanian. The final conquest by Tsarist Russia in the middle of last century had rather a shorter permanence than some previous overlordships; it has vanished in Bolshevism; not, however, until the rule of the Tsars had done what Bolshevism will never do, introduced security and law, railways, roads and telegraphs, and other amenities and impedimenta of Western custom. To-day the present and future of what were yesterday Russian Georgia, Russian Armenia, and Russian Azerbaijan defy the vision of the astutest seer. The reader therefore will not expect much guidance in this section of "The Nations of To-day." Indeed, considering the high and the low of things, the broad and the long, one wonders why the title of the series is not "The Nations of Yesterday," for, from the timorous final forecasts of the editor, Mr. James Buchan, it is obvious that he would not venture on the title "Nations of To-morrow."

If Asia Minor, Syria, and Mesopotamia ought to rank among the world's gardens, then Transcaucasia should know no jealousy. But what is wealth? Ruskin says wealth is life, not money, and admits that he is only echoing Xenophon, as against those sterile materialists, Smith, Ricardo, and Mill. No doubt Ruskin was right, and foresaw Bolshevism long before the Baku Oilfields, the Chiaturi manganese mines, and the Chorokh copper mines diverted the millions of Transcaucasian wasps from vendetta to wage-earning. To divert them from wage-earning, with its ill-recompensed sweat of brow, to sheer wrack, sting, plunder, and slave-owning appears to be the Leninite ideal, until nothing remain of nationhood, statehood, or to-morrow. It is a wretched picture, but the editor endeavours to illuminate it by assuring us that "the future of the Transcaucasian peoples must lie in intimate union with Russia." He sapiently adds, "The actual form of association between Russia and the Transcaucasians, as also the other border races (Turks, Persians, Kurds, Arabs, presumably), still remains to be evolved. But it is to be hoped that a liberal autonomy will allow to Georgians, "Tatars, Armenians, and Mountaineers alike the opportunity for prosperous economic development and for the preservation of their individual characteristics, . . ." because, "in an age of standardisation (whatever that may mean) the distinctive cultures of ancient races are at once a source of advantage to civilisation (whatever this may mean) and of delight to the individual." Upon which assurance we may but remark that the-Christians-to-the-lions delighted 80,000 individuals, but not the Christians.

However, this very volume of "The Nations of To-day" forms a handy intelligencer for the problem of British recognition of Soviet Russia. If the Government should be disposed to an excessive urbanity towards the Bolshevist vampire, the public has not the same access to Foreign Office files. It has this book instead. In it it may read how the vampire has his beak in the entrails of six so-called States bordering on Muscovy. Each and all remind us of that island of Laputa, some of whose professors were engaged in building houses by beginning with the roof. It is a difficult problem; Swift did not attempt to solve it; but it is assuredly less difficult than to recognise, or not to recognise, or under what conditions to recognise, the baptismal sponsors of Leningrad.

Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton are to be congratulated on the good print and mapping of their series and on its general appeal to the student and the merchant who desire an index to international affairs.

We should think that it will certainly fulfil this purpose, as General Wardrop has been careful to note all points of interest in his own adventures, and he writes graphically and with authority. The reader who is not a hunter of big game can share in some thrilling moments and find refreshment in this excursion into the wilder parts of the earth. The appearance of the book is most attractive.

EBULLIENT VERSE.

"TO THE OCEAN—TO GREECE." By Clifford King. (London: Drane's. 1s. 6d. net.)

To making this little book a success the author has relied on many more things than his amazing flow of words. Not content with verbal fecundity, he produces the whole family of exclamation marks, italic type, capitals, dashes, and so on; and, too, he reproduces doubtfully worded laudation from obscure journals. But as a trump card he gives us the opinion on his ability by a phrenological expert, so that in case we had not been adequately impressed by such lines as—

Oh, ISLES—dear ISLES—my spousal ISLES OF GREECE!
YE ISLES that soar like minarets over time!
Oh, ISLES OF GREECE—ye eagle's wings which pierce
The farthest crag in azure space sublime!

he still can assert that the circumference of his head is 22½ in., its length 7 7-10 in., and so on, and prove to us that he has a brain weight four ounces more than that of the average male.

However, Greece is slowly but surely recovering from her long series of misfortunes, and doubtless she will be able to survive many another minor shock.

Sir,—You publish a long letter from Mr. L. L. Downes, of Torquay, reprobating an article which I wrote for THE NEAR EAST (March 27) after my visit last winter to Morocco. I shall not reply to his criticisms until he explains clearly what he means by the "lavish entertainment," which, he insinuates, I am now repaying by writing as desired in praise of the French Protectorate. As I am informed on the best authority that such is not the case, and that the Society has more than it can do to alleviate even in a small measure the sufferings and privations of the many British-born subjects who are in difficulties here, largely owing to the abnormal conditions since the War, I shall be glad if you will give the necessary publicity to this letter, which is intended to remove a false impression, unwittingly created, but capable in the opinion of the keen and disinterested supporters of the work of the Society of alienating a certain measure of the support which they hope to be able to secure for their good work.—I am, etc.,

THE ROUMANIAN ROYAL VISIT.

The State visit of the King and Queen of Roumania was brought to a conclusion on Thursday, May 15, when King Ferdinand left on his return to Bucharest. Queen Marie is remaining for a fortnight in England, and will be joined by Princess Ileana. The first part of the time will be spent at Esher with the Infante Alfonso and the Infanta Beatrice of Spain. Her Majesty will subsequently stay with Viscount and Viscountess Astor.

On the concluding day of the State visit the King and Queen of Roumania, accompanied by King George and Queen Mary, went to the British Empire Exhibition at Wembley, where they lunched. Returning to town, their Majesties honoured Monsieur and Madame Titulescu with their presence at the Roumanian Legation, where a numerously attended reception was held. In the hall of the Legation a Roumanian string band played selections of music. In the evening a State Ball was given at Buckingham Palace in honour of the Royal guests. Although Mr. Ramsay MacDonald informed the House of Commons that no formal political conversations were held with the Roumanian Foreign Minister during the visit of the King and Queen, and that such informal discussions as had taken place were of a general and not special character, it is recognised that the visit has had the effect of encouraging British financial and industrial interests to adopt a sympathetic attitude towards Roumanian requirements at this time.

HONOURS, PROMOTIONS, ETC.

King Ferdinand of Roumania has conferred upon the Prince of Wales the collar of the Order of Carol.

Mr. G. F. Hubbard, late of the British Legation in Peking, has been appointed to succeed the late Mr. E. G. Hillier as representative of the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation in the Chinese capital.

The following honours have been bestowed in connection with the visit of the Roumanian King and Queen:—On the Mayor of Dover (Alderman R. T. Barwick), Officier de l'Etoile, and on the Town Clerk (Mr. R. Knocker), Chevalier de la Couronne.

Among other Orders, King George has conferred the Grand Cross of St. Michael and St. George on M. Duca, the Roumanian Foreign Minister, the Grand Cross of the Victorian Order on M. Mishu, Minister of the Court, on General of Division Anghelescu, Chief of the Military Household, and on M. Titulesco, Minister in London.

OBITUARY.

The death occurred on May 14 at Kranidi of the journalist and politician, M. Emmanuel Repoulis. He was a strong friend of M. Venizelos, and was Vice-Premier in the Venizelist Government.

Sir Bernard Hunter, late Secretary and Treasurer of the Bank of Madras and Managing Governor of the Imperial Bank of India, died in a nursing home at Hampstead last Tuesday. He was fifty-six years of age.

Captain George Johnstone Baugh, D.S.O., late of the Royal Indian Marine, died at his residence, Warrenhurst Park, Fleetwood, on May 3, at the age of sixty-two. He entered the Royal Indian Marine in 1882, reaching the rank of commander twelve years later. In 1891 he received the Royal Humane Society's medal for jumping overboard and rescuing a lascar in Bombay Harbour. He officiated as Assistant Director of the R.I.M., and spent the last few years in India as Conservator of the Port of Madras and Presidency Port Officer.

The death occurred on May 18 in Paris of Major-General Sir Charles Townshend, whose defence of Kut is one of the best remembered things of the War. Before 1914 Sir Charles had served, among other places, on the North-West Frontier and in Egypt and the Sudan. It was in 1915 that he assumed command of the 6th Division in Mesopotamia, and it was at the end of that year that he and his very gallant force were besieged at Kut. Not until April 29 did his starved force have to surrender. His actions since the Armistice in endeavouring to create a friendly feeling in this country towards Turkey are perhaps too well known to need recapitulation here. He was sixty-three years old at the time of his death.

Sir Percy Cox and the other members of the Mosul Mission arrived in Constantinople last Friday.

A severe earthquake is reported from the Erzerum district. The deaths are said to number 126.

A fatal aeroplane accident occurred at Quetta on May 16, in which Flying Officer Edmund C. Usher-Somers, R.A.F., and Lieut. E. R. (?) Mackenzie, R.F.A., were killed.

To celebrate the connection of India with the City of London a service will be held at 12.45 p.m. on Monday, May 26, at St. Mary-le-Bow, Cheapside. The sermon will be preached by the Bishop of Winchester, and the Lord Mayor and Secretary of State for India will attend. It is hoped that the service will afford an illustration of the way in which some particular City church may become identified with one or other of the great Dominions and Dependencies of the Empire.

NOTES AND NEWS.

167, Strand, London, W.C.2,
Tuesday Morning.

Sir Adam Block's Report.

Elsewhere in this issue will be found extracts from the special report of Sir Adam Block on the Ottoman Public Debt. The statistics given in the report are for the year ended February 28, 1923, and for that period £T3,444,554 was available for the service of the Debt, as against £T7,641,313 for the previous year. During the past year the position has, of course, become much worse, for the Council has by degrees been deprived of the revenues that it was still receiving. Sir Adam emphasises the grave effect that these infringements of the Treaty of Muharrem must have on Turkish credit. Obviously, when the time comes, as it soon must, for Turkey to borrow, it will be found a very difficult, if not an impossible, matter if the existing obligations are not fully honoured. It would be unwise, however, to take an unduly pessimistic view of the present position, for despite the series of extremely unwise actions taken by the Turk, it is impossible not to feel that they will speedily come to realise the extreme inadvisability of pursuing a course of action which can only affect the credit of the country and the confidence felt in it abroad.

Great Britain and Turkey.

A suggestion made by the chairman of the British Chamber of Commerce of Turkey and the Balkan States in his speech at the recent general meeting (extended reference to which was made in these columns last week) which seems to me deserving of particular notice is the advisability of emphasising the Turkish point of view of questions. He made the point that all Turkish questions suffer because the Turkish case is never adequately presented to the British public, with the result that Turkey's credit suffers. "The suggestion is," he added, "that all of us who are interested in British trade in Turkey should take pains to understand and advertise the Turkish point of view in all questions bearing on the trade and credit of this country. In this respect in helping the Turks where they most need assistance we shall be helping ourselves."

The Turkish Market.

In the annual report of the Chamber stress is laid on the point that with the removal of the obstacle to trade between Great Britain and Turkey our business men must not expect business to come to them without having to face severe competition. It is impossible to emphasise too strongly the importance of this matter. In Turkey, as in all the Near East markets, trade will only be obtained by enterprise, and it is essential that traders should not delay entering the market because they believe that shortly conditions will be more propitious. "Business at the present moment may be difficult," it is stated in the report; "nevertheless business is being done on safe terms, and it is just when a market is difficult that it requires most care. A 'wait and see' policy . . . will only be playing into the hands of our commercial rivals."

The Levant Company.

A distinct note of confidence marked the speeches at the meeting of the Levant Company of the chairman, Sir Maurice de Bunsen, and the managing director, Mr. H. J. Lloyd. The chairman recalled that the capital reorganisation of the company only became effective in August, and said that the figures of the balance-sheet could not tell the story, but merely indicated that the company had been operating without loss. The position of the company might well give rise to satisfaction. "Not only," he added, "has the volume of business increased, but there has been notable improvement in the rapidity of turnover. The character of the business has gradually been altered, and to-day the major portion of the company's trading is confined to commodities of the most general consumption and capable of quick turnover." Mr. Lloyd dealt in detail with the company's position in the Balkans. The branches have now been reduced to four, and the sales in these branches increased in 1923 by over 86 per cent. The company has formed a new subsidiary, the Levant Company (Central Europe), Limited, and in the latter connection Mr. Lloyd pointed out that, in his view, no company with serious interests at stake in the Balkans can afford to ignore Vienna.

The Zagreb Fair.

I have commented on several occasions on the opportunity afforded by the various fairs in the Near East of entering the markets there. Our Liubliana correspondent gives this week an account of the Zagreb Samples Fair, which opened at the end of April, and, as will be seen from what is said, was strongly supported by foreign exhibitors. British industry was fairly well represented, the Levant Company and the Associated British Manufacturers being among the exhibitors, and it is to be hoped that at succeeding fairs the British section will gradually be developed. One evident obstacle to British participation on a considerable scale is undoubtedly the great number of exhibitions of various kinds that are now being held in Great Britain and elsewhere. It is too much to expect firms to be represented at them all, but the importance of the Balkan market is such that manufacturers would find it advisable to give Near Eastern fairs the preference if possible.

GREECE.

Athens, May 10.

High Cost of Living.

Although there has been a slight fall in the index number of the cost of living during April prices continue to remain extremely high, and if the recent improvement of the drachma continues Greece will soon become one of the most expensive countries in Europe.

With the exception of a few imported edible commodities, such as butter, cheese, and tinned foodstuffs, the price of which varies according to the fluctuations of the exchange, everything in Greece is to-day as dear as, and in most cases dearer than, fourteen months ago, when the pound sterling was worth 420 drachmae. The heavy taxes imposed last year by the former Minister of Finance, M. Kofinas, are, of course, responsible to a great measure for this abnormal state of affairs. The main cause of the trouble, however, is said to be the widespread profiteering which is openly carried on by the wholesale and retail merchants under the eyes of the authorities. I am told that matters are not so bad in the provinces (at Missolonghi, for instance, I ascertained that the cost of living was fully 30 per cent. cheaper than in the capital); but in Athens people are simply robbed by the shopkeepers, the majority of whom put their prices up on the slightest pretext. If, for instance, the drachma loses a few points, up go the prices, but they never come down when the drachma improves; on the contrary, they are raised still more if the drachma suffers another depreciation. Strange to say, both the Government and the police have proved themselves quite incapable of putting a stop to this. An attempt last year to fix the price of meat resulted in a strike, and Athenians were left without meat for nearly a fortnight.

General Pangalos, the Minister for Public Safety, has promised to take the matter up and deal severely with all profiteers. Thus far, however, nothing has been done. The distinguished Englishman who a year ago, whilst on a short visit to Athens, remarked that the Greeks were the most tolerant people in the world, was undoubtedly right.

The following statistics showing the index number of the cost of living in Athens was compiled by the National Bank of Greece. The year 1914 is taken as a basis:—1914, 100; 1922, (first half), 542.3; 1922 (second half), 1,014.3; 1923 (first half), 1,234.1; 1923 (second half), 1,192.1; 1924, January, 1,325.0; February, 1,313.6; March, 1,359.2; April, 1,343.0.

Shipping at the Piraeus.

The total number of steamers which entered the port of Piræus during April was 560. Of these 444 were Greek, 39 British, 27 Italian, 11 French, 10 Dutch, 9 German, 7 American, 4 Roumanian, 3 Bulgarian, 2 Swedish, 2 Persian, 1 Soviet, 1 Norwegian, 1 Belgian. The number of sailing-vessels which entered the port during the same month was 484.

The total receipts of the Piræus Customs during April amounted to 50,769,241.00 drs., as against 34,313,737.00 drs. during the equivalent period last year.

The Zagreb Samples Fair.

The Zagreb Samples Fair, which was held from April 27 to May 5, was again larger than its predecessor. There were 700 exhibitors, and a number of applicants had to be refused for lack of space. The grounds are now as crowded as is compatible with safety, and will certainly have to be enlarged. The Fair was, above all, a national Fair this year, and bore witness to further improvement in the quality of native manufactured goods of all types. Among foreign exhibitors German and Austrian representatives seemed a trifle less to the fore. The number of French exhibitors increased to 110, and a second French pavilion had to be constructed. The French goods were rather of the showy variety—millinery, perfumery, haberdashery, etc. The number of Czecho-Slovak exhibitors showed a decrease, probably because Czecho-Slovak goods are so well established in this country as to need no special advertisement. Czech tweeds and dress materials generally are the only things that can be compared to British goods in the same line, and might even be mistaken for them in some instances. There was the usual display of machinery of all kinds, and it was in the machine section that by far the most business was transacted. A new and entertaining feature was provided by five listening-in apparatuses, which attracted crowds of visitors. British industry was again represented mainly by the pavilion of the Associated British Manufacturers, where there was an opportunity of inspecting the Indian Rubber Company's Radiophone. The Levant Company showed English textiles, and the North British Rubber Company, Edinburgh, was represented by an agent. Noticeable among the new pavilions was that of Messrs. Ericsson, the well-known Swedish firm. American goods were practically limited to motor-cars; Italian motor-cars were also in evidence. About the native paper industry nothing new can be said. It showed the same improvement that could be observed in the cabinet-making, upholstery, and boot and shoe industries, which have always been wonderfully well represented by native makers.

The statistics about business transacted are not yet available, but I was told that the general trade stagnation in Yugoslavia had affected sales adversely, and that only the machine section had done well, especially in the matter of electric machinery, which is greatly in demand for Serbia and Montenegro, where steps are being taken to exploit the wealth of water-power available. In one way, however, the Fair has been a complete success. Never before have there been so many visitors from other parts of Yugoslavia, and the consolidating influence of this informal concourse is sure to be far-reaching and beneficial. The number of visitors to the Fair averaged 15,000 per day, even in the heavy rain that spoilt the last two days of it.

Decidedly, the Zagreb Fair is one of those that have come to stay. Of those that have so far been held in Yugoslavia, only the Liubliana Fair besides can claim international as well as national importance. As a matter of fact, Liubliana is even more accessible than Zagreb, and is well provided with good hotels. This year's Liubliana Samples Fair is fixed for August 15 to 25, during the best season of the year, when visitors will have a chance of seeing something of the beautiful surroundings of the Slovene capital, which make it at all times of the year a pleasant place to live in.

OTTOMAN PUBLIC DEBT.

Sir Adam Block's Report.

Special interest attaches to the report on the Ottoman Public Debt for the forty-first financial year to February 28, 1923, of Sir Adam Block, K.C.M.G., representative of the British and Dutch bondholders, which has just been issued. Sir Adam says :—

I regret to state that in 1922-23 the Council of the Debt continued to be deprived of all the revenues in Anatolia, and, in the last six months of that year, the agencies of the Debt Council at Adrianople, Broussa, and Smyrna were attached to the Government of Angora, the receipts being taken by the Government. The net receipts of these districts were consequently reduced to £T102,914, as against £T716,122 in 1921. In Mesopotamia and Arabia the revenues assigned to the service of the Debt have been appropriated by the local authorities, with the exception of a small sum of £T240.43, representing the settlement of an old account. In Palestine these revenues have been paid into the Anglo-Egyptian Bank, and are therefore deducted from the net receipts immediately applicable to the service of the Debt. In Syria they have been placed to a reserve account pending the final decision with regard to the contributive part to be borne by Syria in the General Foreign Debt of Turkey.

The general gross receipts and fixed assignments from all sources amounted, in 1922-23, to £T11,846,073, as against £T12,182,140 in 1921-22. Hence a decrease of £T336,067, equivalent to 2.76 per cent. The net amount available for the service of the Debt was £T3,444,554, which is less by 54.92 per cent. than the sum available in the preceding year—viz., £T7,641,313. Of this amount £T1,932,723 has been set aside for the service of the Unified Debt and the Lottery Bonds; and the balance, £T1,511,831, placed to the special reserve account created by the Council with the object of covering the loss of exchange entailed by the payment of arrears of interest in Europe. At the end of February, 1922, the amount to the credit of this reserve account was £T15,382,899. To this was added (a) the sum above-mentioned of £T1,511,831; (b) funds appertaining to the ordinary amortisation, £T1,518,926; (c) funds appertaining to extraordinary amortisation, £T1,349,796; and (d) the balance remaining from funds appertaining to repurchase of Lottery Bonds, £971,654, making in all a total amount of £T20,735,107. After deduction of £T18,989,746, representing exchange losses on transfers to Europe, the special reserve account at the end of February, 1923, shows a credit balance of £T1,745,361.

No sums were applied in 1922-23 to sinking fund purposes, owing to the insufficiency of funds required to pay in sterling the coupons of September, 1922, and March, 1923, of the Unified Debt, or in francs the Lottery Bonds drawn and amortised in that period. During the year 1922-23 a sum of £651,097 sterling was applied to payment on account of Unified Coupons due March, 1915, to March, 1920, which had not been previously presented, at the rate of 2s. per coupon, and of £2,248,382 sterling, to payment of the coupons due September, 1920, to September, 1922, inclusive, at the rate of 6s. sterling per coupon of 8s. For drawn and amortised Lottery Bonds a sum amounting to Frs. 1,005,637, being 25 per cent. of the sum due since December, 1914, up to February, 1920, inclusive, was paid in the course of the year. The nominal capital of the Unified Debt on February 28, 1923, was £Tgold36,428,546. The nominal capital of Lottery Bonds in circulation on February 28, 1923, was £Tgold10,018,046. These two sums constitute the Debt of Turkey covered by the Decree of Muharrem. The total Foreign Debt of the Government of Turkey outstanding on March 1, 1922, including the loans specially secured on the Egyptian Tribute (£Tgold16,353,216) was £Tgold176,305,370.

From my last report, as well as from the recently published report of the Council of the Corporation of Foreign Bondholders for the year 1923, the Unified bondholders will have realised the unsatisfactory situation existing in Turkey at the present moment. Until the Treaty of Lausanne is ratified, until the contributive parts of the detached States are settled, and until an agreement is arrived at between the Turkish Government and the bondholders with regard to the contention raised by the former that it is unable to pay the service of its Foreign Debt in the currency defined in the contracts and bonds, I do not anticipate any improvement in the relations between the Turkish Government and the Council of the Debt. During the past year the Council of the Debt has made numerous representations to the Turkish Government, protesting against repeated infractions of the Decree of Muharrem. The three Allied Governments have also called the attention of the Turkish Government to the serious consequences that may ensue if it continues to ignore its obligations under the Decree of Muharrem, but hitherto little or no progress has been made. It is to be hoped that in the current year a settlement will be come to. Such a settlement is not only necessary in the interest of the bondholders, who at present are deprived of any income from their investment, but it is also of the highest importance for the Turkish Government if it wishes to maintain its credit abroad.

The result of these various infractions of the Decree of Muharrem is that the net amount available for the service of the Debt during the year 1923-24 will not probably exceed £T1,810,000 (paper), which is about one-tenth of the amount necessary for the payment of the annuity of the Unified Debt and the Turkish Lottery Bonds. As to any payment of the coupons or distribution on account thereof, the Turkish Government has notified to the Debt Council that no payment is to be made until a settlement with regard to the currency of the Debt is arrived at.

All this has naturally had an adverse effect on the credit of Turkey. In February, 1923, the Unified Debt was quoted in London at 21, and in Paris at 58. On April 1, 1924, the Unified Debt was quoted at 17 in London, whereas in 1912-13 the purchases for amortisation were effected at 88 per cent. It is of the highest importance therefore that the Council should be re-established as soon as possible in its rights and attributions devolving from the Decree of Muharrem. The result would be an immediate improvement in the credit abroad of the Turkish Government. In the common interest of the bondholders and of the Government of Turkey there can be no advantage in delaying a return to normal conditions.

Turkey requires the aid of foreign capital for restoration and development. In spite of the goodwill of the Allied Governments, the money markets of those countries which are in a position to render financial aid will fight shy of investments in Turkey unless the investor is convinced that the Turkish Government has inaugurated a sound financial policy at home and has shown its clear intention of giving complete satisfaction to its old bondholders. Credit once lost requires years to restore. The new Government at Angora is credited with the sincere desire of making Turkey a prosperous and progressive country, but were the money markets of the West to be closed against her, the realisation of well-meaning intentions of the new rulers of Turkey will encounter serious difficulties.

Since the above was written the Turkish Government has appropriated the remaining revenues left to the bondholders in the region of Constantinople and its immediate dependencies, and all the agencies of the Debt Council have been detached from the control and direction of the Council. The Government has further informed the Council that the expenditure of the Central Administration at Constantinople, as provided for in the Budget prepared by the Council for the current year, is to be reduced by about 50 per cent., and that reductions in the staff and salaries are to be made accordingly. The Council of the Debt is thus deprived of its last revenues and of the independence it has enjoyed for more than forty years under the Decree of Muharrem in respect of its staff and the collection of the revenues ceded to the bondholders in 1881.

YUGOSLAV INTEREST IN THE EXHIBITION.

Dr. Douchan Michitch, managing director of the "Revue Economique et Financière de Belgrade" and general secretary of the Association of Belgrade Banks, has arrived in London as delegate of the Yugoslav Ministry of Finance, for an official visit to the British Empire Exhibition.

THE LATE MR. ROBERT CAMPBELL.

We regret to announce the death of Mr. Robert Campbell, chairman of the National Bank of India, which took place on May 19, at the age of 87 years. Mr. Campbell began his career with the Royal Bank of Scotland, and in 1860 joined the staff of the Chartered Mercantile Bank of India and China, and was sent out to the East. He resigned his position fifteen years later and entered the Manchester and Salford Bank, and after two years' service with that bank, was appointed joint general manager of the National Bank of India. In 1880 he became general manager; he was appointed a director in 1898, and in 1903 was elected chairman.

Company Meetings.

NATIONAL BANK OF GREECE.

Increase of Bank's Operations.

The ordinary general meeting of the shareholders of the National Bank of Greece was held on March 3 at the head office of the bank, Athens, Greece.

The Governor, M. A. N. Diomède, read the report for 1923. He said:—

The year just drawn to a conclusion was, like its predecessors, full of events. Our trials have not come to an end, and notwithstanding that the signature of the Treaty of Lausanne signalised our entrance into a period of definite peace, the uncertainty of the future, together with unforeseen events at home and abroad, produced a reaction which had a direct influence upon the currency situation. Our monetary standard, the point of least resistance, was affected according to what were often uncritical impressions. For, unfortunately, people who lack sufficient coolness are affected by changing influences and fall from the extreme of optimism to unjustifiable pessimism without carefully weighing the real facts, which alone can restrain them within the limits laid down by reason.

He proceeded to deal with the note circulation, and pointed out that there had been an increase during the year of 1,707,895,110 drachmæ, but that out of the whole increase the issue of only 750,000,000 drachmæ was for the Treasury, whereas in 1922 the increase of circulation of 1,150,000,000 drachmæ was exclusively due to the needs of the Treasury. He continued:—

The balance of the issues during 1923, or approximately 1,000,000,000, was demanded by the needs of the market. That is to say, this issue has behind it either short-dated credits, representing productive work of the community, or sound foreign exchange derived from the market, in order to serve as a strong protection for the national currency. This substantial change in the conditions of issue is reflected on the quality of the whole circulation, and may with reason be considered as a commencement of a more healthy period.

I think that, as Greece has been restrained in time from following the downward path of successive issues, to which countries which have suffered economically and politically so easily betake themselves, she is able without fear to stand comparison with most other States.

Notwithstanding the fact that it is barely six months since a period of war, entailing enormous expense to the country, has come to an end, and within a very short space of time her population has been increased by so much as one-fifth; and that for years lamentable internal disturbances, which have impeded her economic restoration, have troubled her, nevertheless the note circulation in Greece amounts to an equivalent of £2 12s. 8d. per head of population.

The circulation of most other countries is less favourable, although they have for five years past re-entered into conditions of peace, and have been able in the meantime both to restrict their military expenses considerably and to devote their energies unhindered to the work of rendering their currency sound.

It must be admitted after an unprejudiced examination that the means of increasing the money supplies of the State through increasing the circulation was resorted to during the past year with sparingness. But this was not easy, because both the need was urgent and the temptation to find funds by the issue of more notes was strong. But the consciousness was also strong of the disaster which would overtake the whole national economy unless every possible effort were made to put an obstacle in the way of easy financing. For nothing would then be able to check the fall of the drachma, and the soaring of foreign exchange and the cost of living to fresh unapproachable heights from which I know not what favourable circumstances could ever bring them down.

The Government had also to meet enormous expenditure due to the continuance of the state of war and to the necessity of strengthening the defences of the country in order to avert immediate danger, for the maintenance and settlement of a million refugees, and further to meet daily increasing ordinary expenditure, especially on account of the growing increase in the cost of living. This expenditure was met:—(1) By temporary advances by the National Bank out of its own disposable funds, according to the precedent set in past years; (2) By the sale of National Defence Treasury Bills; (3) The Treasury has had considerable assistance also from the advance of £1,000,000 indirectly made to it through the convention between the Bank of England and the National Bank. Owing to this advance the heavy expense of settling the refugees in town and country had ceased to be drawn from the Budget of the State revenues. This satisfactory result has been achieved, thanks to the powerful intervention of the League of Nations in the question of the protection of the refugees and to the ready support accorded to us by the Bank of England. It is my duty here to express my thanks to the Governor of that Bank for the ready manner in which he overcame the difficulties which the question encountered owing to the then prevailing conditions. Of course, an advance of £1,000,000 does not settle the problem, and the decision of the League of Nations provides for a loan of £6,000,000 for fully carrying out the programme. We have, however, reason to hope that we shall obtain this assistance from abroad, even if at first in instalments. (4) All these means, however, would have proved inadequate from both a financial and an economic point of view, to permit the Government to meet the emergencies of the situation, unless taxation had not been increased as well.

Remittances from emigrants are rightly considered as a reliable thermometer of opinion of the world outside Greece as regards the value of the local currency. In 1922 these remittances reached a lower figure than had been observed for years, and amounted to only £2,095,000 (for the National Bank). The year 1923 gave us the first sign of an upward tendency, with £2,809,000 reaching the country through the National Bank alone, i.e., an increase of £714,000. From the data provided by the chief banks we are able to calculate that funds imported from emigrants during 1923 exceed a total of £5,000,000, whereas during the previous year they barely reached £4,000,000.

Another encouraging proof of favourable estimation is the figure to which Greek securities dealt with in England rose in comparison with 1922. Five per Cents. rose from £40 to £45 in 1922 to £50 to £55 in 1923, i.e., they approach in value foreign securities, the capitalisation of which takes place at 8½ per cent. or 9 per cent. This tendency on the part of the London market to take a favourable view of Greek securities is a most valuable asset for our country.

The movement of the bank's business presents entirely satisfactory results for the past year. An important improvement is to be noticed in all branches of productive business as compared with the previous year. In spite of the continued care exercised by the bank to assist the Government directly, as well as by undertaking the supply of foodstuffs for the nation, its purely banking action was in no way prejudiced thereby. As a matter of fact, in comparison with 1922, owing to the greater easiness of the Treasury the amount of the bank's disposable funds absorbed by it was considerably less. For whilst in 1922 the bank paid over to the Government as definite or temporary loans a sum of drachmæ 693,000,000 and 50,000,000f. and it immobilised a high percentage of its disposable funds in exchange abroad, in 1923 no definite loan was issued, and the temporary advances amounted to drachmæ 343,000,000, to be restricted by December 31 to drachmæ 176,000,000, and its disposable funds in exchange not only were not touched, but the circumstances of exchange even permitted it to recover whatever it had advanced in the past and entirely to free its deposit in actual gold with the Bank of England and to create a strong reserve in exchange.

In this way, with greater freedom of movement, it was enabled to come to the assistance of various undertakings in the country which required a plentiful supply of capital, in view of the prevailing upward tendency, in order to increase their production in both commerce and industry and agriculture. The bank assisted all these branches and disposed of a total capital exceeding by drachmæ 528,000,000 that of the former year.

During the year under review the profits continued to be absolutely satisfactory, and they arise exclusively from a strict estimation of the returns from the business of the year. The gross profits amounted to drachmæ 278,870,749, as compared with drachmæ 279,595,250 for the year 1922.

The net profits of the year amounted to drachmæ 104,115,232. This figure enabled the management to propose this year again an increase of the dividend, which was raised from drachmæ 800 for 1922 to drachmæ 1,200. The policy of strengthening the bank by reinforcing its reserves was followed faithfully by the management also during the past year. Nobody is unaware of the importance of this policy for the future of the bank. During this period, when the profits, owing both to the exceptional conditions and to the fall in value of the drachma, show a substantial increase, it would be madness not to carry a portion of the profits realised to increase the reserve funds in order to render the position of the bank unassailably strong.

Induced by these reasons, the management has decided that 28.50 per cent. of the net profits—i.e., drachmæ 30,000,000—shall be carried to reserves, which are thus increased to a total of drachmæ 250,000,000.

LEVANT COMPANY.

An Improving Position.

The ordinary general meeting of the Levant Company, Ltd., was held on May 16 at the Institute of Chartered Accountants, Moorgate Place, E.C. Sir Maurice de Bunsen, Bart. (chairman of the company) presided.

The Secretary (Mr. G. de B. Brownlie) having read the notice convening the meeting and the report of the auditors,

The Chairman said: The directors' report and accounts have been circulated, and I presume that you will take them as read. As the directors have pointed out in their report, the capital reorganisation of the company only became effective in August last. Prior to that date, reorganisation was proceeding, but in the year under review the effect of such reorganisation could not be fully demonstrated. The figures of the balance-sheet before us cannot tell the story. They can merely indicate that the company has been operating without further loss. This may seem a meagre result, but to those with knowledge of the problems which the management has had to face this outcome may well give rise to satisfaction. Not only has the volume of business increased, but there has been notable improvement in the rapidity of turnover. The character of the business has gradually been altered, and to-day the major portion of the company's trading is confined to commodities of the most general consumption and capable of quick turnover.

Turning to the items of the balance-sheet, on the assets side small increases are shown in the items freehold and leasehold land and buildings and equipment, etc., which are accounted for by further small commitments in the nature of capital expenditure. Investments are slightly lower, and what I said last year about this item is even truer to-day—namely, that it is represented almost wholly by the company's holding of preference shares of J. W. Whittall and Co., Ltd. The profit and loss account sets forth the dividends received from these investments.

The items stock, sundry debtors, and suspense account should, to an extent, be considered together. You will recall that last year the accounts for the Balkan branches were included up to September 30 only; whereas this year, owing to improvements in branch book-keeping, we are able to include the accounts of these branches up to December 31, and only in the case of West Africa are accounts closed as on September 30. This naturally decreases the figure for items in transit and results in an increase to that extent in the items of stocks and sundry debtors, as the case may be. You will note, then, that suspense account (which consists largely of shipments in transit) is some £64,000 lower than last year. On the other hand, stocks are some £57,000 higher, and sundry debtors and bills for collection £78,000 higher. There is a net increase of the three items taken together of £71,000, indicating increased business. In passing, it is gratifying to report that collections have been very satisfactory and bad debts very small.

On the other side of the balance-sheet, capital account now stands at £200,000 only, representing the new money which was paid into the company last summer.

The item sundry creditors and credit balances, including reserves, stands at £417,168 18s. 5d. In this figure is included the £9,000 shown in this year's profit and loss account as being allocated to general reserve account. The company's liabilities under acceptance credits and under bills payable stand at lower figures than in the balance-sheet of the preceding year.

I am asking the managing director, Mr. Lloyd, on this occasion, to address you briefly, and in doing so I am happy to express our appreciation of the valuable services which he has rendered to the company and of the efficient methods of control over our widely spread organisation which have been brought about under his management. At the conclusion of his remarks I shall move the adoption of the directors' report and statement of accounts.

Mr. H. J. Lloyd, in the course of his speech, said: It is a matter of regret to me that this meeting is not proposing a substantial dividend; but that time has hardly arrived as yet. The passage from breakdown to complete health is a slow one for the individual, and just as slow for a company, more especially a company whose policy in the early stages has been laid down for it by the fact that it possesses stocks in certain territories which have to be dealt with. Any new company started under war or post-war conditions needs time to lay its foundations well and truly, and this applies particularly to a merchant trading company like our own.

You may ask what are the guiding principles which must govern an enterprise like ours, with particular reference to its operations in the Balkan territories. These are territories where successful trading without speculation is not easy for British traders. These principles may be summarised as follows:—(a) An experienced management staff; (b) an efficient accountancy control; (c) a reduction of exchange risk; (d) a safe debtor position; (e) a stock position representing commodities in continuous demand. The accountancy system we have installed is giving head office adequate and prompt returns and direct control. The position of the company in regard to exchange risk is duly and regularly recorded for the consideration of the management.

Now as to our debtors. We are perpetually in search of the safest class of debtors, and our reserves are such as to enable me to assure you there should be no surprises of a disagreeable nature, short of international catastrophe, which we cannot organise against. The Chairman has already referred to the class of trade we are doing. All our efforts are directed towards commodities in day-to-day demand; and however alluring the profits on seasonal goods may be, we have set our faces against them as a stock-carrying proposition, as our great effort is to keep our stocks moving regularly and quickly.

You will doubtless expect from me some statement regarding the old stock position. We believe that by the end of this year there will be not one item of old stock left at our Balkan branches, and our reserves are adequate as regards the prices of these goods. We have reduced the number of our Balkan branches to four—Zagreb, Belgrade, Bucharest, and Sofia. Our sales in these branches have increased in 1923, as compared with 1922, by over 86 per cent. I think the situation on the whole is satisfactory, but we are striving always for better things. We want to improve the class of debtor and to increase our exports of Near Eastern produce. This is difficult work, but we are proceeding slowly and cautiously, and believe that this year we shall record even more progress.

I need hardly assure our shareholders that the company's activities in Balkan territories will always need careful supervision and control, so that the business can be made to respond quickly to any change of policy which may be dictated by political developments. A word, if I may, as to our new subsidiary, the Levant Company (Central Europe), Ltd. This company is young as yet, but has already justified its existence and made profits. No company, in my view, which has serious interests at stake in the Balkans can afford to ignore Vienna.

The Chairman then moved the adoption of the report and accounts.

The resolution was carried unanimously.

EGYPTIAN MARKETS.

The annual general meeting of the Egyptian Markets, Ltd., was held on May 13 at Winchester House, Old Broad Street, E.C., Lieut.-Col. A. St. John Cooke (chairman of the company) presiding.

The Secretary (Mr. F. R. Parker) having read the notice convening the meeting and the auditors' report,

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, said: I am gratified to be able to report that our gross receipts from the 120 markets held under the Government concession amounted to £104,591, or £8,143 in excess of the previous year's figure. In fact, with the exception of the year 1921, these returns are a record. There is no doubt that if we had had more market days on which to collect revenue we should really have had a bumper year. The receipts from cattle markets, including abattoirs, aggregated £66,612, an increase of £5,624, and from general markets £37,979, an increase of £2,519 as compared with the year 1922.

The three markets owned by us, which are in addition to and outside those held under the concession, show a gross return for the year of £1,029, as compared with £1,090 last year, a small decrease of £61. Under the very adverse conditions encountered, we feel that the results from this side of our business are satisfactory and reflect considerable credit on our staff. Your managing director has paid another visit to Egypt this year, and, resulting from his recommendations, further changes in the organisation of our sales branch are under consideration.

As you will see by reference to the debit side of the trading account, the item "Rent and salaries, wages and expenses" amounted to £43,404, a small reduction of £189 as compared with 1922; and the cost of "Maintenance and repairs to markets" was £2,759, which is £942 in excess of the amount expended in 1922. It is unnecessary, I think, for me to say anything in explanation of this increase beyond that you will, I am sure, appreciate the great importance of keeping our property in good repair.

The closest watch is being kept on all items of expenditure, and economies have been effected in many directions where such were possible without interfering with the efficient working of the business. The results of these economies have not been fully reflected in the figures for the past year.

With regard to the current year, I am pleased to be able to say that the business of the company continues to maintain a steady improvement. Conditions in Egypt are quiet and peaceful, and our returns for the period ended May 1 show a satisfactory increase of £2,788 as compared with the corresponding period in 1923.

Turning now to the revenue account, no explanation is, I think, required of the items on either the debit or the credit side.

After providing for the Government share of profits (the very considerable sum of £23,723 9s. 3d.), paying our debenture interest, share capital, and debenture capital sinking fund premia, and carrying £2,500 to general reserve (which reserve now amounts to £22,000), your directors recommend the payment of a final dividend of 5 per cent. and a bonus of 2 per cent. (making, with the interim dividend of 5 per cent. paid in November last, a total of 12 per cent. for the year) on the ordinary shares, which will absorb in all £20,964, and the payment of a dividend of £11 15s. 3.287-300d. per share on the deferred shares, which will absorb £3,529 18s. 11d. This leaves £11,667 17s. 1d. to be carried forward, as compared with £11,595 19s. 2d. brought into the year's accounts.

Before putting any resolutions, I think you would like to hear Mr. Horne, who has again been in Egypt on your business this year.

Mr. F. J. Horne (managing director), in the course of his speech, said:

An important factor to which I referred last year is that of the improvement in public roads and the rapidly increasing use of motor passenger vehicles. There are a great many more of these now plying for hire than there were twelve months ago. Fares are low and the service is fairly reliable, and this enables villagers living at a distance from our markets to reach them who otherwise would not be able to do so.

You will have gathered from our chairman's remarks that the receipts from our markets have shown a very satisfactory improvement for the current year, and, assuming that no unforeseen troubles arise, I feel you may confidently look for a good report for 1924.

The Chairman then moved the resolution, which was seconded by Mr. W. Horne, and was carried unanimously.

The proposed dividends and bonus were adopted, the retiring directors were re-elected, and the auditors were reappointed, and after a cordial vote of thanks to the chairman, which was briefly acknowledged, the proceedings terminated.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Futures Very Firm.

The Alexandria Commercial Company, in their report for the week ended May 8, state :—

Since our last report the futures market has been very firm, especially for Sakel old crop. This week's advance for Sakel old crop must be principally attributed to speculative manipulation. Stocks are very low, especially tenderable cotton, and whatever exists is, to a great extent, already hedged, and the position has thus become very vulnerable to speculative manœuvres. The leading export houses do not appear to be interested in the futures market, as the demand from abroad has lately been very limited, and, furthermore, in view of the paucity of the existing supplies, hedging with futures is no longer a real cover. Orders booked must be immediately fulfilled with spot cotton, otherwise the cotton required may not be found later on. Ashmouni options have this week been very little dealt in, and the difference with Sakel has again widened; nevertheless, the position remains very firm, whilst the market is so narrow as to be easily subject to wide fluctuations. The New York and Liverpool markets have been firm, but have not fully followed our advance. In America the strength of the statistical position is counterbalanced by the favourable news of the new crop and the slight depression existing in the cotton industry. In England the conditions in the textile industry have much improved the last few weeks, but the heavy discounts of the new crop months make buyers very cautious. There is not much change in new crop options; spinners' interest in them is still rather limited. Taking into account the world's depleted cotton supplies, of raw material as well as of manufactured goods, we consider the present level of prices of new crop fairly reasonable, and in view of the fact that over four months will elapse before the crop is assured, we would certainly advise conservative purchases on any easing of prices. The week's receipts amount to krs. 28,652, against exports krs. 70,902; the stock stands at krs. 1,169,438.

Spot.—Owing to holidays, Minet-el-Bassal has only been open three days this week. A moderate business has been done, and sales amount to about B/s 4,900, of which we estimate B/s 4,100 Sakellarides, B/s 700 Uppers, and B/s 100 other growths, mostly white cotton. Demand from abroad has rather fallen away.

Sakellarides.—All styles have been dealt in from fully fair upwards, and there has been more inquiry in the higher grades. Prices of spot against contracts are without change, except Fair, which is rather easier.

Uppers.—Business has been done in all grades from Fully Fair upwards. Prices of spot against contracts are unchanged for Good Fair, Fully Good Fair and Good; for the grades below Good Fair and above Good they are rather dearer.

Brown and Pilion.—Are neglected, and only a few bales have been done. Prices of spot against contracts are without much change.

White.—A small business has been done, mainly in Fully Fair. Prices of spot against contracts are inclined to ease, except for Good Fair and below, which are steady.

Crop 1924.—Conditions continue about normal.

The report of the Alexandria General Produce Association for April reads :—

Lower Egypt.—Favoured by good weather at the beginning of the season, sowing took place ten days earlier than is usually the case and is now entirely finished. Resowing has been, in general, of slight importance. Germination has proceeded under good conditions; the young plants are in good shape and more advanced than last year, despite the slightly lower temperature during the last fortnight of April and some rain which fell in certain districts, and which slightly retarded normal development. The area sown is superior to that of last year, the generally estimated increase being about 10 per cent. Sakellaridis variety is less, and the difference is made up of Zagora and Pilion types principally. Water for irrigation purposes has been, on the whole, sufficient. Some cases of cut worm have been reported, but are of slight importance.

Upper Egypt and Fayoum.—Sowing has been carried out under favourable conditions. The condition of the young plants is satisfactory and in advance of that of last year. As in Lower Egypt, the area sown is superior to that of last year by at least 10 per cent. As usual, the principal varieties sown are Zagora and Ashmouni. Water for irrigation has been, generally speaking, sufficient.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Business Quieter.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended May 14 :—

Egyptian Spot.—Business has been much quieter during the past week, a distinct slackening in the inquiry has been noticeable, and the daily sales have shown a corresponding reduction. With the falling off in the demand, a slight weakening in the basis has resulted, and rumours that the Egyptian Government were marketing their holding (purchased earlier in the season, with the object of supporting prices) has caused weakness in the futures markets, and this naturally has reacted on the spot cotton. Barring complications arising from bad crop reports in America, we do not now look for any spectacular rise above the present level of prices before the end of the season. On the other hand, we see no reason to expect any serious set-back owing to the strength of the supply position, and it is more than likely that the basis will speedily harden again, and continue to harden steadily during the next few months. In Sakellaridis, cotton about 75 to 125 points on has been in fair request, but the most popular range has undoubtedly been from 250 to 350 points on, and a fair business has resulted in the latter quality.

An improved inquiry has been witnessed for the extra fine cotton, with somewhat more tangible results; up to 27.00d. has been paid. At the other extreme, evidence has not been wanting that spinners were beginning at last to take a more serious interest in the "off" cotton, but so far business has been slow in maturing. Uppers have been pressed for sale. Numerous offers of cotton for immediate shipment have been made by Boston and the Continent of Europe, and there is no doubt that several of these have been placed. This has caused a certain amount of perturbation amongst those who have been "hoarding" small lots of spot Uppers here, and resulted in a further weakening in the basis for the somewhat unattractive lots which still remain in our market. It seems probable that Liverpool will continue to attract shipments of Upper from both the above-mentioned sources, to a limited extent, and until the situation again crystallises, the basis is bound to remain uneasy. At the present moment, there is nothing very tempting in the selection offered. A small inquiry has continued for inferior cotton, but the result has been negligible.

In Sudan, interest has been well maintained, but spinners are not paying gladly the prices asked, particularly in the case of Tokar Sakel, for which nearly 27.00d. has been obtained on several occasions. White Sudan continues to find buyers at about 200 to 250 on American. C.i.f. business has ruled much quieter. Forwardings to spinners for the week ending 9th inst. were returned as 9,468 bales. Sales 2,800 bales Egyptian and 710 bales Sudan. Quotations are all reduced 40 points. Fully Good Fair Sakellaridis to-day 23.45d.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

Business on Small Scale.

The Manchester Cotton Trade Review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended May 17 states :—

Business has not improved during the past week, and operations have again been on a small scale. The raw cotton position is not such as to encourage buying other than of a hand-to-mouth nature, the discount on new crop months being still a deterrent. On the other hand, it does not appear to be doubted that stocks of manufactured goods abroad are low, and that it is only uncertainty as to whether present prices can be maintained that prevents them from being considerably increased.

Yarn.—Spinners have had a poor week, and the scarcity of certain counts which existed recently has now virtually ceased. Spinners of American cotton have lost ground, but those using Egyptian have been able, by virtue of their order lists, to maintain prices. Shipments of yarn during April were 16,082,100 lb., against 13,172,000 lb. in March and 10,895,400 lb. in April of last year.

Cloth.—A very quiet time has been experienced. Shippers appear to be buying only to satisfy immediate requirements. Demand from Egypt and the Near East continues to be disappointing, and such offers as come through are mostly impracticable. Shipments of cloth during April amounted to 377,718,400 square yards, against 353,983,100 sq. yds. in March and 316,278,700 sq. yds. in April last year.

Raw Cotton. —Only minor fluctuations have taken place, but the tendency in American has been towards higher prices, owing to unfavourable reports from the United States regarding the weather. Egyptian, on the other hand, has not been in such active demand as recently, and the quotation has fallen. Closing prices yesterday were as follows :— American Fully Middling, 18.39; Egyptian Fully Good Fair, 23.65.

The production of the Dacia Romano Petroleum Syndicate for April amounted to 339½ tons.

BRITISH-ROUMANIAN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

The King of Roumania received a delegation at Buckingham Palace on May 13 from the British-Roumanian Chamber of Commerce, headed by Lord Oranmore and Browne, who, on behalf of the Chamber, presented to His Majesty the following address :—

"The Council of the British-Roumanian Chamber of Commerce which, for the past seven years has been established for the purpose of promoting commercial relations between Great Britain and Roumania, desire to offer to Your Majesty, and also to Her Majesty the Queen, whom they had the honour of addressing in 1919, their respectful greetings on your first visit to this country. They wish to express their deep sense of the great task of reconstruction which, since the War, has taxed the energies of your subjects to the utmost, faced as they have been, not only by the necessity of finding solutions to complicated national and international economic problems, but by the added responsibilities which have accompanied territorial expansion and an increased population. The Council of the British-Roumanian Chamber of Commerce have followed with the keenest sympathy the efforts which the Roumanian people have made to surmount those difficulties, and to establish their country in the important position amongst the nations, which, by virtue of her great resources, potential wealth and powerful influence, she is entitled to occupy. They would like to assure Your Majesty of their desire to act in cordial co-operation with the Roumanian people and their institutions at all times in order that the commercial and friendly relations between our two countries may be still further cemented and developed to their mutual prosperity and advancement."

His Majesty made the following reply :—"We accept with great pleasure the greetings of the British-Roumanian Chamber of Commerce, and we are thankful to hear that you duly appreciate the difficulties of the task of reconstruction resting upon Roumania after the Great War. Owing to the potentialities of our country and the vitality of our people, these difficulties are daily diminishing. It is our wish and strong will to develop as closely as possible our commercial and friendly relations, which happily already exist between Roumania and Great Britain, and we trust that in our sincere efforts in this direction helpful support from the commercial and financial circles in Great Britain will not fail us. The part the British-Roumanian Chamber of Commerce could play in conciliating the interests of both countries is very great, and I am sure you are wholeheartedly collaborating with our people in Roumania in order to reach this important goal, which will be only for the good and welfare of both countries."

The directors of the Anglo-Egyptian Oilfields recommend a dividend on the "B" shares for the year 1923 of 12½ per cent., less tax.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The Mosul Conference.

The negotiations in Constantinople over the future of the Mosul Vilayet have been confronted with serious obstacles at a very early stage. Fethi Bey, the Turkish delegate, led off in the stereotyped way, as though the subject had never been discussed before, with a statement purporting to show the essentially Turkish character of the territory in dispute and the importance of its restoration to Turkey. Sir Percy Cox refused to be drawn into a discussion covering identically the same ground as had been covered at the Lausanne Conference, and an adjournment had to be made to allow Fethi Bey to reconsider the question in the light of this refusal. Subsequent meetings have revealed the Turkish Government as being quite unprepared for a definite stand on this point on the part of Great Britain. At Lausanne the Turkish case had been completely refuted by Lord Curzon, and in order not to delay the Conference over a subject which did not concern our Allies, it was agreed that Turkey and Great Britain should continue the discussion separately. It ought to have been clear to the Turks that nothing was to be gained by repeating the arguments put forward by Ismet Pasha and answered by Lord Curzon; but it took three or four meetings in Constantinople before the Turkish delegate realised that in regard to Mosul Great Britain was standing on different ground from that occupied by the Allied Powers in their attempt to liquidate the situation created by the Greek defeat in Asia Minor. In the event of the failure of the Constantinople Conference, the question of Mosul is to be submitted to the League of Nations. There is still room for hope, however, that the Turkish Government will yet appreciate the advantage of coming to an agreement with Great Britain, and, having reached that point, will begin to explore the various ways in which an understanding covering not only Mosul but other matters also can be reached.

The Ottoman Debt.

It is unfortunate that the occasion offered by the Lausanne Treaty was not used to confirm the provisions of the Decree of Muharrem. Some of the financial clauses of the Treaty take the continued existence of the Council of the Debt for granted, but the failure to re-enact the Decree is noticeable. Turkish diplomacy has endeavoured to take advantage of the omission by treating the Decree as a dead letter, and for the moment the action of the authorities has seriously inconvenienced the service of the Debt. As a result, the Turkish Government damages itself still more in the eyes of Europe, and renders more difficult the financial assistance of which it stands in urgent need. The reason for the confiscation of the revenues allocated to the service of the Debt are not far to seek. Every day sees the Turkish Government more hardly pressed for funds. Much of the hasty legislation passed at Angora has been inspired by the necessity of obtaining ready money, and the available means are rapidly diminishing. It was hoped that during the adjournment of the National Assembly Mustapha Kemal Pasha and the Ministry would have leisure to realise that Turkey had embarked on a financial policy that could lead only to disaster, and would take practical steps to save the Republic in time. The Mosul negotiations offered an invaluable opportunity for making a fresh start, and for obtaining the help needed; but it is not a recommendation either to the British Government or to British capitalists to find that the eve of the Conference has been chosen for repudiating a still valid agreement on which such credit as Turkey has enjoyed had been largely built up.

Roumanian Politics.

After three years of more or less quiescence there is a very marked stirring of the waters in the Roumanian Opposition. Hence the repeated assurances that the fall of M. Bratianu's Government is imminent. M. Bratianu himself denies the allegation, and is ready to show that with the completion of the first part of his programme, including the balancing of the Budget, he is able to turn to the second part—steps directed to increasing production and reorganising the country with a view to greater development. What would seem to be happening is that the Opposition parties are making some headway towards practical collaboration. The National Democrats and the followers of M. Argetoianu have come together; and there is some talk of a fusion between the Peasants' Party.

and the Popular Party. Among the former are some extremists, who may succeed in frightening away the followers of General Averescu. In the event of a real coalition, in which the Transylvanian Nationalists played a prominent part, the position of the present Government might become precarious.

Albania.

Nothing in the history of the Balkans since the War has been more striking than the way in which Albania settled down to ordered government. In view of the reputation previously enjoyed by the Albanians as a result not only of their traditional blood feuds, but also of their attitude towards established authority, whether of the Turkish type or the milder form under the Mpret William, there seemed to be little in the present half-monarchical, half-republican system that could hold out inducements to the factions into which the country is divided to bury the hatchet and to live at peace with one another. But the unexpected happened, and even one or two regrettable outbreaks of brigandage merely served to throw into bolder relief the general peacefulness that prevailed. Suddenly, however, such restraining influences as were at work appear to have been thrown aside, and there is some danger of a form of civil war between the North and the South. Attempts to settle differences in Parliament do not appear to have been successful, and, dissatisfied with the Tirana atmosphere, the warring factions are credited with a desire to take to their tents, by rallying on Scutari in the north and Valona in the south. A Tirana letter in this issue records the events leading up to the present situation, which, it is to be feared, has become more serious since the date of its despatch.

Jubaland.

An agreement in regard to Jubaland was the best possible precursor to the State visit of the King and Queen of Italy. The subject was not one on which public opinion in Great Britain could be roused to any enthusiasm. The justice of a grant of territory in East Africa to Italy had been conceded; Lord Milner had proposed certain boundaries; a much larger extent of Kenya Colony had been asked for by Italy. There were technical difficulties in the way of granting the whole of the Italian claim in view of the necessity of regulating water supplies for the tribes, and at one time the British Government expressed a wish to make the Jubaland agreement part of the general European settlement. This latter idea has been abandoned, and a statement issued by the Foreign Office announces that a Jubaland convention will be concluded on the lines laid down by Lord Milner and Senator Scialoja, which constituted a workable compromise between what the Italians had previously claimed and Great Britain was prepared to surrender.

India's Various Voices.

Now that scarcely anyone has a good word for the Indian transitional Constitution, it is only fair to point out that during the four years of constitutional endeavour many sections of the people have been finding their voices, and some who were accustomed to stand and beg are now claiming a definite position as a right. We have referred recently to the new spirit manifested by some of the untouchable, or depressed, classes at the bottom of the scale, but even more important at the moment is the steady spread of the non-Brahmin movement, which represents the protest of the middle against the ascendancy of the top. Five years ago the non-Brahmins in Madras were so hopeless that they were inclined to stand aside from the new Constitution. Fortunately for themselves, they plucked up courage, and now they dominate the politics of the province. More recently the movement has gathered strength in the Bombay Deccan, and probably it will prove to be a serious factor in the next election there. The Central Provinces are following suit, and it is now possible to say that the constitutional revolt against Brahmin ascendancy is established over those parts of British India where the ascendancy has hitherto been most complete. From the democratic point of view, that is, at any rate, a substantial gain.

The Non-Brahmin Standpoint.

The effects of an evil past are, of course, visible in the details of the non-Brahmin programme, but in essence it is reasonable enough. Swaraj, or Home Rule, may be the ultimate ideal, but Brahmin rule is the immediate danger, and for the time being British rule is the only possible safeguard. Brahmins being selfish folk, non-Brahmins must learn to stand on their own feet, and make adequate use of the majority which they can usually command. That is, in effect, the non-Brahmin platform. It is necessarily repulsive to the men actually in power, who denounce the movement as fatal to national unity, as represented by themselves, but, unfortunately for them, national unity does not exist, and probably never will. They would do much better work for India if they would aim instead at national harmony, based on a recognition of the existing wide divergence of claims and aspirations, and built up gradually by compromise and mutual accommodation. It is to the credit of the transitional Constitution that the first step, the definition of the actual divergence, is now proceeding so rapidly. When everyone knows what all classes of Indians really want, we shall be within sight of the time when nation-building can begin in earnest.

The Physical Basis of Politics.

Many of us who want to see India take a worthy place in the world are oppressed by a growing anxiety whether the national physique will stand the strain. On the one hand, we read far too often of national, or party, leaders dropping out exhausted just when their powers should be reaching the maximum; on the other, we hear that the young men, who should lead the next generation, are crippled in health before they leave school. A University Conference at Simla has just been informed with authority that the low standard of physique is one of the main obstacles to the grant of commissions in the Army to Indian graduates, and the point which strikes visitors to the Indian Military College most forcibly is the unusual development of health and happiness among the lads who have been lucky enough to gain admission. This last fact seems to point the way to better things. The secondary schools all over the country will have to learn from Dehra Dun, and arrange that their students may start in life with a healthy body, and a determination to keep it healthy; if that is not done, there is a real risk that political, and all other, aspirations may be defeated for want of the essential basis of physique.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Tuesday Morning.

Chrysalis or Corpse?

While Liberal leaders are going up and down the country proclaiming the fact that Liberalism is yet not dead, and promising its immediate resurgence, the country itself in the by-elections appears to think otherwise. Mr. Lloyd George announces, in metaphor belonging to his victorious period, that Liberals must at once engage in the fight on both fronts, but Glasgow shows that the country is in no mood to fight for what it considers to be lost causes, and so leaves the poor Liberal candidates in the lurch almost every time.

Mr. Asquith and Sir John Simon may imagine that Liberalism is a beautiful chrysalis but waiting the time to burst forth into loveliness, but the cruel outside world looks on at it pityingly as at a corpse.

Empire Day.

Because of the existence of the Exhibition at Wembley, Empire Day, which was on Saturday, was really the beginning of a week devoted to Imperial things. We do not now make a great fuss of the Empire, and it was out of but few windows that flags were flying on Saturday. But there is no doubt that the Empire Exhibition has helped people to realise not only the material significance and might of the Empire, but also the vastness of Imperial conceptions; and in the vast crowds and organisations that have been assembled in the last few days at Wembley there was something very moving and even uplifting. One does not refer to such mistakes as the playing by three hundred buglers at once of the Last Post, but to the pageants and the thanksgiving ceremonies.

The Next Election.

It is curious how frequently we are told that the next election may come upon us any day; when the Tories are not reminding us of the possibility the Liberals drum it into our ears. But still the mouse is not born. It is patent, of course, that there is much dissatisfaction with the Government, and not a week passes but its position becomes to all appearances more and more precarious. Scarcely a major measure is now brought up but it receives very hostile criticism. First it is housing, then unemployment, then pre-War pensions. How it will all end it is difficult to foretell, for what the Government gains on a West Toxteth swing it proceeds to lose on a giddy Glasgow roundabout. All sides are preparing for the next big encounter, although it can hardly be said that they are arming, because they have no arms with which to arm. The Liberals are, however, particularly busy in foisting up an armoury factory. But one suspects that there will be only the usual clanging with wooden sticks, and no blood drawn.

Newspapers and Morals.

There are few prudes in this country now who would wish to censor all public matter, and particularly the contents of the daily newspapers. That being so, the offence which certain papers have given in their comments upon or revelations of recent murder cases becomes all the more grave. I mentioned this subject the other day, and it is pleasant to be able to record the fact that one or two of the grosser irrelevances have been officially noticed and their perpetrators fined. How such stuff came to be published in reputable papers passes all comprehension. The case in question has certainly aroused more attention than any similar case that I can remember, but to suppose that the public wants a whole budget of sordid or nauseating or sentimental details which does not come out even in Court argues a very low estimate of the public's taste.

This matter, it may be remarked, has nothing whatever to do with the question of Free Speech. The harm that can be done by the publication of certain views is nothing to that that can be done by the publication of certain "stories" or news, for truth is stranger and often viler than fiction.

England's Trial Teams.

The question that has during the last few weeks been on the tongue of every sportsman has been provisionally answered with the official announcement that Mr. A. E. R. Gilligan, the skipper of Sussex, is to captain England in the first Trial match to-morrow. He is without doubt a very popular choice, although many cricketers could at once produce reasons why he should not be given this honour—there are some people who always know better than a Selection Committee of old cricketers. He has under him, among the amateurs, Mr. Fender, the Surrey skipper, who, if cricketing genius were the sole qualification for captaincy, would surely be in charge, and Mr. G. E. C. Wood, the old Cambridge wicket-keeper, who is good enough to be picked for his wicket-keeping alone. The most remarkable thing about this England side is the fact that it contains seven bowlers—a pretty compliment, that one hopes will be justified, to the South Africans.

Sweepstakes.

The sweepstake fever has penetrated very deeply into the post-War English system, and every other man and woman seems to be hoping for the impossible best on some Derby sweep. And it will scarcely be denied that private sweeps are really good fun. On the other hand, the big public affairs are this year apparently catching it rather heavily from the police authorities; men have actually been arrested in connection with advertised sweeps. In all probability Parliament will seek to alter the laws in regard to this system of amassing money, which is too popular ever to be driven permanently out by police action. Meanwhile those who have drawn Dawson City in any sweep have, so I hear, reason to be pleased with themselves. For myself, however, I know nothing of these things.

The Death Ray.

One supposes that it was inevitable, but the newly discovered "death ray" about which there has been so much talk in the Press, has come rather too soon after the War to arouse much other than blasé interest. It is claimed by the Conservatives that this country would be a good deal safer from the air menace with possession of this ray, which Mr. Grindell-Matthews has invented, than if it were to rely merely upon "babbling beatitudes"; and it is being passionately cried by the pacifists that steps ought to be taken to inhibit the use of this "diabolical device." Presumably if it can, as is claimed by its inventor, put an aeroplane out of action, this island is safer than ever it was from attack; but it would be an awkward thing if our Air Ministry turned it down and Mr. Matthews were to sell it to France, who is said to be willing to buy it. The only point about it is that almost certainly someone else would invent something else to nullify the effects of this ray. And so the world progresses.

The Airship.

Only an expert ought to comment upon the recent decision of the Government to operate an airship service, but at least one can speak in approval of its blending of State control with private enterprise. The scheme may, of course, be an utter failure, but it is good to see the Government taking the risk. It shows that it is not, as its opponents like to say, wholly lacking in Imperial imagination.

Mr. Wheatley and Housing.

Since it is generally admitted that the one indisputable success of the present Government is the Minister of Health, Mr. Wheatley, his recent letter on housing to the representatives of local authorities has been read with close attention. And it deserves it. It is, however, being attacked on the ground that it proposes to dispense with the system of private ownership, that it involves far too great an expense, and that it is impracticable.

Yet, so far as the practical objections are concerned, time will surely reveal their strength. On theoretical grounds alone one likes Mr. Wheatley's ideas. He sees more than a few years ahead, and takes into consideration a period when the Labour Government will probably not be in power. In other words, his scheme is informed by a real and generous idealism, and in this particular, at any rate, seems to resemble the plan which Lord Ernle and Lord Milner recommended for the reorganisation of rural life. It is an attempt to shape our cities, not according to the mere needs of the moment, but according to his vision of a better future.

Charity Organisations.

For a long time it had been known that all kinds of undesirable practices were wont to creep into those appeals, which almost daily stud our newspapers, for money on a vast scale for some charitable purpose, and the question asked in the House recently revealed how widespread is the hatred and contempt for the "charitable organisation agent" who, say, takes 10 per cent. on every fifty thousand raised. Many funds are now quite a business, from whose inception the middleman or agent is seldom absent. It is he who primarily benefits by the generosity and kindliness of the unwary, and it may come about, unless something is done to stop this business of agents' commission on a charitable organisation, that future moneys to causes will only be made direct.

The Ideal Radio Programme.

It is not everybody who had installed in their house a wireless set, was very keen upon it for a week or two, and then dropped the unsociable thing for ever; some people are more devoted to it than ever they were. The complaint that the programmes of the British Broadcasting Company are so dry or so monotonous or so similar to each other does not reach their ears, and, in fact, they have just declared what they think is an ideal radio programme. This is how the "wahless fiends" vote: Popular music, dance music, classical music, children's hour, humorous items, light opera, grand opera, news, general talk, modern plays, sport, educational, classical plays, sacred music, fashion talks, literature, hobbies, domestic economy, religious addresses, decorative schemes, and clothing. I have always understood that the majority of listeners-in were men, but this list seems to contain plenty of evidence to the contrary. But does the place of the last item prove that women are still Eves at heart?

ALTER EGO.

An exhibition of Greek paintings and etchings was opened last Monday at Messrs. Arthur Tooth's Galleries, 155, New Bond Street.

PICTURES OF IRAK.

At Sloane Gallery, 188, Brompton Road, S.W.3, Mr. C. W. Cain has an exhibition of his water-colours, which are chiefly devoted to Mesopotamia and Burmah, in which places he served during the War. These pictures are notable above all for their technical efficiency, for, indeed, Mr. Cain's draughtsmanship is almost beyond criticism. It is this remarkable and unerring feeling for line that, natural in one who has made his name in etching, to a large extent compensates for a partial lack of the atmosphere of the East. Mr. Cain, on the whole, is reticent in his use of colour, although there is no need, as is proved, for example, in his "Moonlight Beyond Baghdad" and "Evening—Persia" for such reticence. One of his best drawings is "The Palace of Nebuchadnezzar" (a fine study of the imperishable desolation of Babylon), and almost equal to this is his "Journeying to Nejef," a well-composed representation of the fanatical pilgrims. Four of Mr. Cain's pictures—"Ctesiphon Arch," "Sundown," "Where Tigris Meets Diala," and "El-Ajik"—were, we understand, shown at the Baghdad Exhibition; and there is other work of Mr. Cain in the possession of the Baghdad Government which, unfortunately, is not to be seen at this London exhibition. These water-colours will be of interest both to those who served in Mesopotamia and to those who have visited it in civilian capacity.

LANCASHIRE AND EGYPT.

The Manchester Cotton Association is giving a luncheon at the Midland Hotel, Manchester, on Wednesday, June 4, in honour of H.E. Aziz Izzet Pasha, Egyptian Minister to the Court of St. James. In the evening the Minister will be the guest of the Cotton Spinners' and Manufacturers' Association at dinner.

THE LEBANON MENTAL HOSPITAL.

The annual general meeting of the Lebanon Mental Hospital, Asfuriyeh, near Beyrout, is being held at Caxton Hall, Westminster, on June 3, at 5 p.m. Dr. E. W. G. Masterman is presiding, and the speakers will include the Rev. E. M. Bickersteth and Mr. Herbert Catford, who have both recently returned from Syria.

The death is announced of Sir Asutosh Chaudhuri, Judge of the Calcutta High Court, at the age of 64.

General Weygand has left France on his return to Syria. It is not stated how long he will retain his post as French High Commissioner in Syria.

Ferid Bey, the Turkish Minister of the Interior, has resigned in consequence of a violent Press campaign, says a Reuter message from Constantinople.

A farewell banquet has been given by the Maharaja of Alwar to Major-General Sir H. D. Watson, the retiring Military Adviser-in-Chief to the Indian State Forces.

M. Diomedes, the Governor of the National Bank of Greece, has arrived in Paris from London, where he will stay about a week, and afterwards will proceed to Athens.

King Edward's Hospital Fund for London has received the sum of £100, sent by command of His Majesty King Ferdinand of Roumania as a contribution to the Fund, through M. Nicholas Titulescu, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary.

Reuter reports from Budapest that the Hungarian National Assembly on May 20 unanimously adopted the Treaty of Friendship with Turkey. The Minister of Foreign Affairs declared that Hungary would energetically co-operate in promoting Turkish reconstruction.

By direction of King Ferdinand of Roumania, the Roumanian Minister has sent the Lord Mayor £100 for the poor. The gift is divided between the Salvation Army, the Church Army, the Invalid Children's Aid Association, the Field Lane Institution, and the Mansion House Poor-box.

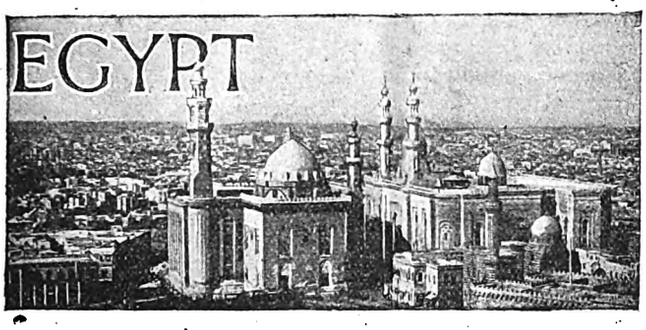
The Near and Middle East.*

From Our Own Correspondents.



Cairo, May 18.

The Negotiations.

The political wind in Egypt chops and changes with disconcerting frequency, never seeming to blow from the same quarter for long together. So it is no surprise that the feeling of uncertainty and depression regarding the forthcoming negotiations, which was alluded to in this correspondence last week, has now vanished, and all once more is calm and hopefulness. It is now no secret that Zaghloul Pasha and his colleagues were greatly vexed with the statement on May 8 by Mr. Ramsay MacDonald regarding the basis of negotiations. The insistent reference to the Declaration of February, 1922, seemed to the Egyptian Premier unnecessary and provocative. The British Premier had rather underlined the Declaration in a previous statement, but that occasion had provoked little comment here. The second emphatic reference, however, was bound to have results troublesome to Zaghloul Pasha unless he made some effective reply. This was the situation which caused the Egyptian Prime Minister to make the speech of Saturday of last week in the Chamber of Deputies —a speech which calmed the Wafd supporters and took from their enemies weapons which might have been used for effective attack, but which, at the same time, seemed little likely to help forward the preliminaries to an Egyptian Delegation's departure for London. The Liberal Constitutionals and the Nationalists, who are trying their hardest to egg Saad Pasha on into some declaration which shall make negotiations impossible, or anyhow increase the difficulties, were delighted with the work of last week-end. But now Mr. Ponsonby's reply to questions in the House of Commons has been cabled out to Egypt, and again all is peace. There now seems to be a chance of Zaghloul Pasha's making up his mind in the near future regarding the London visit, and it is quite possible that a public statement in this connection will be made during the next few days. It had been expected that if the Premier goes to London he would take a short holiday beforehand at Vichy, his favourite health resort; but there is now so little time before the end of June, the period fixed by Mr. Ramsay MacDonald as suitable for the beginning of the London conversations, and so much clearing up to be done in Egypt before the Prime Minister goes away, that it seems doubtful whether His Excellency will get his holiday, which, as he himself is constantly saying, he certainly needs. His health is very far from robust, and it is only by incessant care and constant medical attention that he keeps going at all. It is expected that Parliament will rise about the same time as the Delegation leaves for England, and, if so, the Budget will probably be left over until the autumn session, for nothing that the Chamber of Deputies has so far done encourages the belief that it could discuss and pass the Budget and send it to the Senate in time for the latter body to debate and approve the document within the next month. The new Budget contains so little that is novel that the consequences of this hanging-up are not very serious, but it is none the less unfortunate that one of the first consequences of the Parliamentary régime in Egypt should be the necessity for prolonging, by Royal Decree, the operation of last year's Budget for many months beyond the normal period. But this will be quite in accordance with the other achievements, or lack of them, of the Chamber. As one of the Opposition newspapers pointed out last week, the Deputies, in the first sixty days of their existence, have only one definite accomplishment to their credit—the voting to themselves of salaries of £E600 a year.

An Egyptian Point of View.

In this connection an American journalist, lately in this country to write a series of special articles for his newspaper, told me an interesting story, which had made the greatest impression on him. In the train from Port Said to Cairo was an Egyptian gentleman, to whom the American, who has spent the last four years in Turkey, expressed his congratulations on Egypt's railways, which contrasted so sharply with the inefficient and chaotic Ottoman communications. The Egyptian traveller seemed surprised, and asked whether his carriage companion were not an Englishman. On being told that it was an American journalist visiting Egypt for the first time to whom he was talking, the Egyptian answered: "That is very interesting. Yes, our railways are, as you say, very good. The English laid them, made the rolling stock, and until very recently had exclusive management of the railways. When you get to Cairo you will see a smart and efficient police force which the English have also made. You will also see a fine Parliament building, built by an English architect, and housing a legislative body for which Egypt has to thank the English. But even the English cannot make the Egyptian Parliament work properly; the only thing the deputies have so far done is to vote themselves fifty pounds a month apiece." It would be foolish to attach much importance to these chance remarks of an unknown Egyptian, who may have been voicing purely personal opinions, quite contrary to those of his friends, and certainly opposed to most of the Egyptian sentiment which finds utterance, but it is worth pointing out that the apparent inability of the Chamber of Deputies to settle down to serious work is creating much apprehension regarding the future in the minds of many people in this country. In any case, the special correspondent of the Chicago newspaper was greatly impressed.

Wireless Developments.

For some time past various groups have been approaching the Egyptian Government in an endeavour to obtain concessions for beginning broadcasting in this country. So far, the Government has made no move, the reason, it is understood, being that there is at present neither a code of regulations for the control of commercial radio nor the necessary trained technical staff in the Government service for the supervision of the activities of any companies that might be allowed to begin operations. The Government has nominated two officials, one British and one Egyptian, to attend the forthcoming international wireless conference in Paris, and after their return will probably decide upon a policy. This holding-up of a decision is probably wise, for it is doubtful whether the people at present engaged in concession hunting could maintain a satisfactory service, or even make a profit for themselves; while letting them get first into the field would almost certainly create rights which might hinder the development of radio in the future. The first public demonstration of radio in Egypt was given last week-end, in connection with a charity fête. The organisers, who have been endeavouring to get the Government to give them a concession, thought that they would make a good impression by demonstrating the efficiency of their equipment, and announced that they would relay the programmes of London, Paris, and Rome stations. But listeners-in who were enthusiastic enough to make more than one visit during the evening to the tent where the loud speaker was installed were puzzled, not only by the surprising clearness of the transmission, but also by the fact that the same programme was being repeated over and over again. In the end it transpired that what was being broadcast was neither Paris, nor London, nor Rome, but a gramophone installed at the top of a building less than a couple of miles away. It is thought that this demonstration—of ingenuity rather than of wireless efficiency—is hardly likely to convince either the Government or the public of the advisability of giving a concession to that particular group of promoters.

A Nile Perch.

Every fisherman will envy the luck of Mr. J. W. Macaldin, an official of the Egyptian State Railways, who landed a Nile perch weighing 165 lb. from Assouan Reservoir ten days ago. This is much the biggest fish ever caught in the neighbourhood, and is believed to be the largest ever caught in the Nile on such light tackle—a salmon-rod and line—as Mr. Macaldin was using, though monsters of nearly 200 lb. have been caught in Lake No with the appropriate equipment. As a rule the largest fish are those that are never brought to land, but Mr. Macaldin makes no claims and has no hopes of ever hooking anything larger than his latest catch.

Kasr el Aini Hospital.

The medical world in Egypt, and Kasr el Aini Hospital in particular, are suffering a great loss in the departure from Egypt of Dr. Owen Richards, Director of the Hospital, and four other senior members of the staff. How their going will be felt was indicated by the Minister of Education in the Chamber of Deputies the other evening, when he said that, in the absence of qualified Egyptians, it might be necessary to fill the vacant posts by other foreigners, specially engaged. Another loss in connection with the hospital world is of £E10,000, which the Government must now pay to the architects who prepared the plan selected for the new hospital which was to have replaced Kasr el Aini. Under the terms of the competition the designer of the selected plan would be the architect in charge of the work, or, if the building were not begun in twelve months, would be paid £E10,000. The twelve months has expired, and the money must now be paid. The dead loss is bad enough for the Egyptian Treasury, but what is worse for the country is the practical certainty that, having let one year elapse without doing anything in the matter, the Egyptian Government will never now be able to make up its mind to spend the £E1,000,000 odd required for the building of the new hospital which Cairo so badly needs.

BULGARIA.

Sofia, May 15.

General Rousseff's Speech.

Politically speaking, Bulgaria has been very quiet for the last few weeks. Very little interest was evinced in the Departmental Elections which took place on Sunday, May 4, and which resulted in the Government obtaining about 50 per cent., the Agrarians and Communists 35 per cent., and other parties the remainder of the seats. In a few days the Communal Elections will be held, and the Agrarians contend that they will meet with more success.

Otherwise the most notable event has been the speech which General Rousseff delivered at Sofia. Taking as his theme "The Agrarians and the Communists," the Minister of the Interior denounced Communist propaganda in most vehement terms, while he accused the Extreme Agrarians of having formed an illegal organisation with revolutionary intent. The Minister announced that in future no Communists would be allowed to hold any State posts whatsoever, and he referred with scorn to the sums of money which were being sent from Russia to Bulgaria, and which sometimes succeeded in buying the Bulgarian conscience. In general, his speech made it clear that the Government was ready to deal summarily with all extremist factors. He did not mince his words, and the speech may prove to be an important political landmark.

Political Groupings.

Despite the lull in active politics, the position of the various parties is gradually becoming clear. On the right there is the Democratic Sgovor, which is mainly controlled by the Narodniak Party. The Cabinet is almost entirely composed of Sgovorists, and its internal policy, as expressed by General Rousseff, is to follow in the wake of former Prime Minister Stambouloff, who ruled with a firm hand. After the Sgovor come several groupings, such as the dissentient Democrats and Radicals, the Socialists, and the Agrarians of the Centre. These three groups are not vastly opposed to each other in their internal policy, and in time they may join each other and form a broad Coalition. Then on the left there are the Communists, who are outside the law, but who continue to possess a good deal of influence. Finally there are the Liberals, while Draguieff, the hermit of Stara-Zagora, has still a small though faithful following of idealistic peasants.

A possible Cabinet reconstruction may take place during the month of June. The Ministry of Railways is vacant, and this may serve as a pretext for bringing in two or three new men who will take the place of others considered deserving of a rest. For M. Zankoff's Government has been in power for almost a year, and it has been an exceptionally stormy one. As a whole the Cabinet is not likely to resign, but one or two changes would serve to pave the way for a reconstruction later on.

Aviation.

After five years of enforced inactivity the Bulgarian Aviation Service is coming back into its own. Over a dozen French and four British machines were recently purchased, and a school for pilots has been started. During the summer an aerial postal service will be inaugurated between Sofia and the principal centres in the provinces. Later on it is hoped to establish a passenger service.

The Peace Treaty having debarred Bulgaria from possessing any fighting machines, those which she has purchased were all subject to examination by the Allied Aviation Authorities. It is thus solely on civil aviation that Bulgaria will concentrate, and as internal communications, both for persons and letters, are somewhat slow, the air service should meet with success. The terminus will be at Boujourishte, which is some ten miles from Sofia, and where there is a good aerodrome.

The Greek Bulgarian Mixed Commission.

This Commission, which works under the League of Nations, continues to carry out most useful though unobtrusive work in evaluing the properties of Bulgarians who formerly lived in Greece and who have either already left their homes or intend to do so up to August 31, 1924. It does the same thing for Greeks, and has established a number of sub-Commissions who up to date have dealt with between thirty-five and forty thousand claims. The Commission, which is composed of four members, two appointed by the League of Nations, one Bulgarian, and one Greek, has, indeed, become the medium towards which the Bulgarian and Greek Governments turn in times of difficulty. Quite recently a difference of opinion over a certain matter threatened to develop into something more serious, but through the good offices of the Mixed Commission the matter was satisfactorily settled.

Very shortly the Greek-Bulgarian Convention will be applied in Western Thrace, but despite certain measures taken by the Greek Authorities in favour of the deported Bulgarians who were deported from Thrace, but who have now returned, it seems that there will be a big emigration movement of the Bulgarian minorities back into Bulgaria.

GREECE.

Athens, May 10.

The British Legation Outrage.

With the excitement of the plebiscite, the Byron celebrations, and the arrival in Athens of Squadron-Leader Maclaren with his flying amphibian, the British Legation outrage had been entirely forgotten, and as the labourers who were employed in sinking the well in the park opposite the Legation had been released and no further arrests made it looked as if the culprits had made good their escape, and that the matter had been referred ad Kalendas Græcas. A few days ago, however, the police suddenly announced that an ex-officer named Louizidis had been arrested in Salonika, and that everything pointed to his having committed the crime. Louizidis naturally denies the charge, but the Minister of Justice, M. Stamoulis, was telling me yesterday that the authorities are convinced that they have got hold of the right man. It appears that a fortnight or so before the outrage Louizidis offered to reveal the names of the members of a gang which he said was planning to blow up a number of public buildings in Athens, including the Parliament, with a view to overthrowing the régime. This gang consisted of many ex-officers, who were assisted by foreign propagandists. For some reason or other the gangsters were unable to carry out their plans, and, it is presumed, that in order to pocket the reward promised him by the Government, Louizidis blew up the Legation door, but, fearing detection, failed afterwards to claim his reward.

ALBANIA.

Tirana, May 19

Grave Events.

The commission appointed by the Constituent Assembly to study and report upon the reform of the Constitution failed to deliver their report before the Easter vacation. This, owing to the incidence of the Mohammedan festivals of Ramadan and Bairam in May this year, means a prolonged holiday of about seven weeks before work could be resumed. The Prime Minister, Shefqet Bey, had the satisfaction, however, before the recess of completing his Ministry. M. Gurakuqi, the Catholic Deputy Leader of the Liberal Party, was persuaded to accept—not, however, without considerable reservations—the post of Minister of Finance, and the Ministry of Public Works was undertaken by Dr. Fahri, a Mohammedan Irredentist from Kossovo.

Since then grave events have occurred, which at one time threatened to lead to very serious disturbances. At the end of April public opinion was shocked by the murder of Avli Rustem at Valona, the young Deputy famous for having killed Essad Pasha in Paris and for having been acquitted by a Parisian jury.

The Murder of Avli Rustem.

Rustem had been organising a new Party of Action in Albania, to be known as the Union of

Digitized by Google

Young Albanians, and modelled on a similar basis to that of the Fascisti. It was one of the members of this Union, a young student, who in March last attempted the life of the then Prime Minister, Ahmet Zogu. The murder of Rustem, whose party, though deprecating violence, had taken up an uncompromising attitude against Zogu, must unquestionably be regarded as an act of vendetta, which, in the circumstances, takes on a political aspect. And, what makes matters worse, the assassin, though known to be a Tirana man, has succeeded in evading arrest.

Zogu, though fallen from office, remains in many respects the power behind the throne. The present Prime Minister is his prospective father-in-law. The Government has accordingly been widely accused of complicity in the murder. An extraordinarily imposing funeral was given to Rustem at Valona. Nearly forty Deputies of the Opposition attended it in person, and representatives assisted from over 200 communes. Magnificent wreaths were heaped upon his bier and upon his tomb. Moreover, the Opposition Deputies announced their intention of refusing to return for the reopening of Parliament at Tirana, where, it was declared, their personal safety was compromised. Parliament consequently has not yet reassembled.

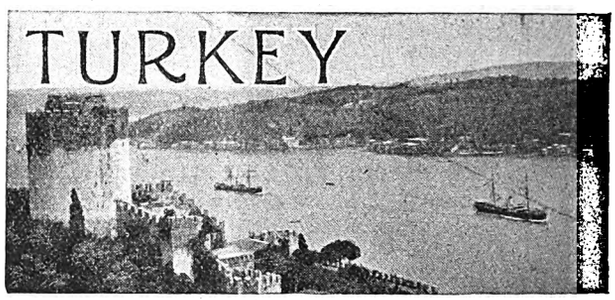
Zogu retaliated by a speech in which he rebutted with considerable success the charges made against him. His speech was nevertheless of a very provocative nature. He declared that Rustem had had what amounted to a Christian funeral, since it was not the custom for Mohammedans to place wreaths upon the tombs of the dead. The effect of his appeal was practically a call to the Mohammedans of Central Albania to be on guard against Christian encroachments, and constitutes an attempt for the first time since the days of Essad Pasha to foment religious strife in the country.

The Government's Position.

M. Gurakuqi has accordingly threatened to resign, but so far has not yet abandoned his recent appointment. The prestige of the Government, never very high, has in any case been gravely shaken. The intriguers, characteristic of the Balkans, having their seats in neighbouring States, have had inevitably a recrudescence; and it is this that may lead to an improvement of the situation. Patriotism is the one force capable of making Albanian politicians forget their personal ambitions in moments of national crisis. The more cool-headed members of the Opposition are consequently now reconsidering their intransigent attitude, and it is hoped that the Assembly will be able to be reopened shortly at Tirana. It is further hoped that the present Government will give way to one of a less partisan character under the ægis of Elias Bey Vrioni.

The L.O.N. Report.

Dr. Pittard, the League of Nations High Commissioner in Albania, has issued his first report on the plight of the mountain population stricken with famine. The Famine Fund, subscribed following Albania's appeal to the League, and immediately answered by a gift of £5,000 from the League as a whole, £5,000 from the British Government, and 500,000 lire from Italy, has been further swelled by several additional contributions (£500 from Czecho-Slovakia, £300 from Spain, £2,000 from America, £600 from the International Save-the-Children Fund, and £200 from the International Red Cross). Further, the Fund organised by Mrs. Stirling, Mrs. Parr, and Miss Durham has reached considerably over £3,000, and the Pope contributed 90,000 lire. Mrs. Parr has been personally supervising relief work in the Dibra district, and the Pope's contribution is being dedicated to the relief of the Catholic tribes near Scutari. With the remainder of the money Dr. Pittard estimates that it will be possible to distribute between 40 and 50 lb. of maize per head to the starving populations in the Prefecture of Scutari; but another £3,000 will be required to do the same for those suffering in the Prefecture of Kossovo. Moreover, if a still worse famine is to be avoided next year, resources must be forthcoming to supply these districts with the means of restarting their lives, namely, with seed, implements, and livestock. Dr. Pittard will accordingly make a further report on this question for submission to the League in June. The present report speaks of really terrible suffering, and it is to be hoped that the necessary measures will be able to be taken to prevent the recurrence of so ghastly a state of affairs.



Constantinople, May 22.

The Mosul Pourparlers.

The chief thing this week to record is the arrival of Sir Percy Cox and the members of the British delegation for the Mosul pourparlers. The delegation was met at the station by members of the Embassy staff and representatives of Fethi and Adnan Beys. The usual introductory visits were made, and on the following evening an official dinner to the two delegations, with their wives, was given at the Embassy, this being the first occasion on which such a Turko-British function has taken place since the beginning of the Great War. The actual business of the negotiations began yesterday at the Admiralty building at Kassim Pasha.

The Press comments on the delegation and its task have been innocuous and cautious. References to the oneness and indivisibility of the Turkish and Kurdish races are what one would expect, and they neither cause more surprise nor create a deeper impression than they would do if made a year ago or a year hence. The most satisfactory feature of the Turkish attitude to the pourparlers is the general optimism concerning the favourable issue and the sober recognition of the fact that there must be a certain amount of give and take in international relations: in that respect the Turk of the spring of 1924 has made a great advance towards a normal habit of mind since last autumn.

Administrative Anomalies.

The Municipality of Constantinople, which disposes of a rich and assorted variety of revenues, and is able to project and carry out grandiose schemes for the beautifying of the town, has been sued in the courts for the payment of certain sums due a long time ago for property expropriated for the purpose of street improvements. According to all the rules and regulations, the money should have been paid over to the wretched owners of the property on the nail. Now that the owners have secured a judgment of the courts in their favour, the Municipality declares that it cannot, or will not, carry out the sentence of the court, and consequently, its beautiful new electric bakery, which was to supply the town with incredible quantities of bread at low prices, has been seized by its creditors, and has, of course, not yet begun to operate.

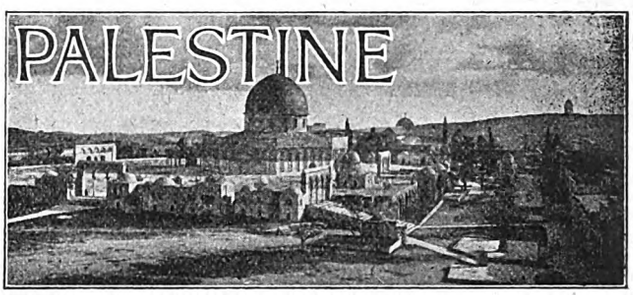
Another interesting sidelight on the condition of the country is provided by a paragraph which appeared in all the papers a few days ago. A journal, published in Eskishehir, announces that a state of famine exists at Seid Ghazi, Merkez, and Sivrihissar, and in all the surrounding villages, where the inhabitants are making shift to feed themselves on greenstuff. It is not necessary to take the news au grand sérieux, as some of the papers here are doing for propaganda reasons, for the situation is possibly caused by a temporary disorganisation of the transport arrangements, and the privations suffered by the population of those localities are probably not very intense; but one is nevertheless inclined to agree with the local critics when they point out that there is something rotten in the state of Denmark if, while at Constantinople every kind of foodstuff, whether a necessity of life or a luxury, can be obtained with the greatest ease and in unlimited quantities at prices which compare favourably with those ruling in many places in Western Europe, at Eskishehir, which is only eight or nine hours away on a direct line of railway, the basic necessity of life, bread, cannot be obtained. To make a simple comparison, it is as if Manchester were starving while London was revelling in plenty.

The Turkish Navy.

The resuscitation and reorganisation of the Turkish Navy is very dear to the hearts of the powers that be, and a sum of about six and a-half millions of pounds Turkish has been allocated in this year's Budget to the needs of the Navy. The only two units of the navy which are fairly modern and useful are the Yavouz (late Goeben) and the light cruiser Hamidie. The latter is in commission together with a certain number of little gunboats. The Yavouz is still a lame duck, which, after eight months' dignified retirement at Bebek, is now going to be towed back to her old station in the Ismidt Gulf. The rest of the fleet appears to a layman to be nothing but scrap-iron, which were better sold to the ship-breakers before it rusts completely away. Although the fleet itself is in such a parlous condition, the Ministry of National Defence has begun to put into practice its scheme for the reorganisation of the shore services. The Turkish coast has been divided up into three sectors—the Marmara Naval Base, with headquarters at Constantinople; the Mediterranean Naval Base, with headquarters at Smyrna; and the Black Sea Naval Base, with headquarters at Amasra. The two first are normal dispositions, and their choice is easily comprehensible; but no one outside the Admiralty has yet been able to fathom why Amasra has been chosen in preference to Sinope, where the anchorage for ships is much more spacious and sheltered than at Amasra, which is nothing but an open roadstead except for very small craft. Perhaps the authorities intend to construct a new port there!

The Dry Régime.

The dry régime must not be grudged its usual few lines, for its abolition is not yet accomplished. The other day, in fact, they suddenly stopped the supply of beer again for a few hours, but better counsels prevailed towards the evening, and the brewery vans began to circulate again. The main difficulties at the moment are, as far as can be gathered from the conflicting accounts, what is the difference between a casino, a bar, a restaurant, and an autre endroit, and which of them is to sell by the bottle, and which by the glass? Is raki like the other liqueurs, and can it be sold in bottles or by the glass? (To those who know not raki, the answer to the first part of the above conundrum is in the negative; it tastes like furniture polish.) The last and most serious difficulty is a purely administrative one, and concerns the Ministry of Finance, the Public Debt, the Ministry of the Interior, and the "interested departments," number unspecified. Apparently, none of these exalted authorities can make up their minds on which of them is to decide on the suitability of the various applicants to become licensed victuallers, and each is trying to convince the other that the job is his. At one stage there was some hope that something practical might soon be done, for the police took matters into their own hands and formed a special commission of police officials to settle the whole business, but that happy initiative was squashed by the Ministry of the Interior. The wines and spirits are meanwhile slowly maturing in the sealed cellars.



Jerusalem, May 10.

A Quiet Easter.

Yesterday saw the departure of the Jerusalem and neighbouring Moslem pilgrims to Nebi Musa. Everything was orderly. Numbers of mounted police and gendarmerie were in evidence—not owing to any nervousness on the part of the authorities, but simply to manage the crowds. This is certainly the quietest and least anxious Easter that has been experienced since the British Occupation. One hears various reasons for this. The Arab Press, for example, would have us believe that the lack of popular thrill and political assertiveness is due to the grievous fact that the British Administration is ruling with an iron hand, regardless of Arab or even Jewish feelings; it has set up a wholly British Advisory Council which, under the High Commissioner, makes and repeals laws, appoints and dismisses officials, contracts loans, and inflict taxes, all at its own sweet will, while the spirit of the country is crushed into dumb impotence, without power or leadership, and with no means of making its sufferings articulate. Thus the Mirât esh-Sharq a few days ago delivered itself of a parable: "The state of parties in Palestine is like to the ape and the bear who found a nut; they could not agree between themselves how they should divide it. They sought the advice of the fox. The fox took the nut, split it, gave half the shell to the ape, the other half to the bear; while as for the kernel—the fox itself ate that."

Another Arab Congress.

The stagnation in the world of Arab Palestinian agitation is moving certain portions of the Arab Press to agitate for another congress of all Arab parties, to voice existent grievance, to appoint the inevitable "executive," and generally organise Arab forces of all parties against the elaborately organised inroads of Zionism. The Mirât esh-Sharq, however, in a tone of bitter disillusionment, points out the futility and disappointments which have always followed such schemes. "The people hoped that redemption would come by means of delegations to London; the delegations went, the delegations returned, and in place of progress we suffered reverse! The people hoped that redemption would come through King Hussein; Hussein came and departed, leaving the Palestine people and the Palestine Government just as they were. The people hoped that redemption would follow the publication of the sixty-page volume [one of the resolutions of the last Arab Congress was to publish a history of the Arab revival and conditions in Palestine for home and foreign propaganda]; but a year has passed and no volume has been published. The people hoped that salvation would come through committees and political parties, whereas these have effected nothing. But, none the less, certain papers think it necessary to summon a general congress, to be different from all preceding congresses, in the hope that this will afford a remedy." And then the paper goes on to point out, very shrewdly, that the mental calibre of an average meeting is lower than that of the average individual; and that there is no reason whatever to hope for better things in future congresses than in past congresses—where the speakers were afraid to speak out their real convictions from fear of temporary unpopularity. This particular paper's solution of the difficulty is a suggestion that about twenty intelligent Arabs should come together and draw up proposals and resolutions in an atmosphere of free thought and free speech, and that the larger congress should accept these findings!

There is, however, yet another explanation of the present reign of quiet—that the Palestinian Arabdom is quite happy in its present state; Zionist oppression and overwhelming Jewish immigration, which had previously aroused their fears, have proved to be myths; the patient tolerance of the Administration has had its effect; there is no trace of Jewish domination, but many pleasant results of the pouring in of Jewish wealth. The Arab leaders have cried out "Wolf!" once too often.

The Anglo-Catholic Pilgrimage.

The Anglo-Catholic Pilgrimage, led by the Bishop of Nassau, is now with us. They are some 250 all told, and very conspicuous with their huge scallops. They are to be here for about a fortnight, and will be able to test, for future reference, the possibility of touring Palestine in the early summer as well as in spring. They are being hospitably received by the Orthodox and other Eastern Churches, but their somewhat ecclesiastical assertiveness is causing a good deal of feeling among the Latins. The Latin Patriarch has found several causes for grievance owing to real or imaginary encroachments, and the Franciscans in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre are carefully on the alert to protest against anything which may form an awkward precedent. This body of Anglo-Catholics is something quite new and exceedingly difficult to "place" in the local ecclesiastical scheme of things, which hitherto has known only the simple distinctions of Latin, Orthodox, and Protestant.

Transjordan Changes.

The recent local event of largest significance is the change in the Chief Minister of the Transjordan Government. The new man, Ali Rida Pasha el-Rikabi, was some two or three years ago much in evidence as the Transjordan official with whom the Colonial Office treated in its efforts to work out a scheme for conveniently administering Transjordan. He was energetic and shrewd, and won the confidence of the higher British authorities to such an extent that—so it is reported—the £120,000 annual subsidy (annually allotted for the purpose of setting Transjordan on its administrative legs) was granted on the understanding that Rikabi Pasha should be responsible for administering the money. Ali Rida Pasha el-Rikabi was then Abdullah's Chief Minister, but he did not long remain so. The Emir's dignity was, it is understood, offended at the power put into his Chief Minister's hands, and he showed his displeasure to such an extent that Ali Rida Pasha had to resign and, one must assume, give the Emir easier access to the annual subsidy. Transjordan's period of probation is now over, and the subsidy is cut off. The country has advanced by nothing worth speaking of; the Emir has acquired semi-regal tastes and habits, but the agriculture, public health, education, roads and transport, and general civilisation in his realm are much as they always were; to what extent he has won the respect of his subjects is not ascertainable. Some far-reaching change in the status of Transjordan is clearly now contemplated. Nothing (outside higher official circles) is yet definitely known, but Transjordan, it is commonly supposed, is now to be brought into immediate financial subjection to the Government of Palestine; the deposed Rikabi Pasha has suddenly returned (at the instance of the British Government), and is energetically trying to introduce order, progress, and economy and everything that, theoretically, should make Transjordan respectable and self-sufficing; and the Damascus Alif-Ba reports Mr. Philby, the late Chief British Representative in Transjordan, as having stated that he was leaving his post with the object of making arrangements for attaching Transjordan once more to Palestine.

The New Currency.

The Committee appointed to report on the advisability and means of introducing a special Palestinian currency has not yet published its findings. But El-Falastin professes to know that the main conclusions have been reached, and that the new currency will be based on the pound sterling; the pound will be divided into ten "dinars" or half-dollars; and these into a hundred cents—the equivalent of the Egyptian millième.

Increasing Tranquillity.

Just as the Moslem pilgrimage to Nebi Musa had recently come to be the most nervous interlude in the Easter-Passover season, so the most nervous moment in the Nebi Musa week was the passage, through the packed narrow alleys in the Old City, from the Jaffa Gate to the Haram Area, of the pilgrims from the Hebron districts. The main body of the pilgrims go down from Jerusalem to Nebi Musa on the Friday; but it is the special feature of the Hebronite procession to pass through and leave Jerusalem on the Sunday following. This last Sunday the Hebronites arrived as usual, very primitive and very picturesque, carefully shepherded along the whole route by the gendarmerie. There were no incidents; the Palestine police showed themselves quite capable, good-tempered, and alert. The Easter of 1920, with its anti-Jewish outbreak, and the two or three similar episodes which followed within the next two years, are sinking back into almost forgotten memories. By nature the simple Palestinian is childish and excitable rather than vicious and scheming, and if only he can be kept free from the distortions of the professional malcontents (whose numbers and influence seem definitely to be decreasing) he is not likely to be much bother to the authorities.

The seventh Arab Congress is to meet in Jerusalem on June 15.

The Anglican pilgrims to Jerusalem were received by Sir Herbert Samuel, the High Commissioner, on May 16.

POLITICS AND PROJECTS IN YUGOSLAVIA.

The Ministerial crisis in Yugoslavia has ended, as most of those who have followed the recent trend of politics in that country expected it to end, in the return to power of M. Pashitch. At the last general election in March, 1923, the Radical Party obtained little more than one-third of the seats in the Skupshtina, but as a result of the tactics of the Croatian Party under M. Raditch, who refused to allow his seventy followers to go to Belgrade, M. Pashitch was able to secure the support of a majority of the deputies actually present. When, last March, after a period of exile abroad had given him time for reflection, M. Raditch began to realise the futility of his policy of abstention, and authorised his party to take their seats in the Skupshtina, the Government was confronted with the certainty of defeat. M. Pashitch wished to dissolve Parliament at once on the ground that no Cabinet could command the support of a majority, but King Alexander was unwilling to agree to this course until the situation created by the presence of the Croatians could be explored constitutionally. To surrender thus tamely his parliamentary advantage did not accord with the fighting instinct of M. Pashitch. He resigned when only twenty of the Raditch Party had had their mandates verified and were able to take their seats. In the Skupshtina, as at that moment constituted, he still commanded a majority, and for the next six or seven weeks he was able to watch without much anxiety the King's efforts to solve the crisis on strictly constitutional lines. As M. Pashitch had foreseen, however, without the fifty Croatians, the verification of whose mandates would take some time, the Opposition could not hope to outnumber the Pashitch-Fribitchevitch coalition. The King called upon every available politician in turn to form a Cabinet, but all had to admit their inability to carry on the government of the country in the absence of the bulk of Raditch's party. Finally, last week, M. Pashitch was again entrusted with the task of forming an Administration on practically his own terms. Parliament is to be prorogued until the autumn: but it is generally understood that elections will be held before it meets again, and they will be held under the auspices of M. Pashitch's Government—an important factor from the point of view of the Radical Party.

Unfortunately, the end of the Ministerial crisis has not brought Yugoslavia any nearer to a solution of the political tangle in which the new State has been involved ever since it came into existence. If the next elections are to clear the atmosphere it will be necessary for the various parties to put up a straightforward political issue which will have some chance of dividing the country otherwise than on regional lines. The situation is complicated by the unpractical nature of M. Raditch's policy and by his absence abroad. No party can do justice to itself without a recognised head, and it is not likely that the Croatians derive much satisfaction from the precarious touch that they can maintain with their leader in Vienna. As far as is known, no attempt has been made to re-state the Croatian programme. Some of the items in the version expounded by M. Raditch before he went into exile to which the more serious objection could be taken are believed to have been tacitly dropped by him since, although they probably still serve to damage the Croatian party in the eyes of the rest of the electors. It is difficult to understand how a body of seventy deputies can consent to remain a political cipher owing to the idiosyncrasies of a leader. If personal considerations prevent M. Raditch from returning to Yugoslavia, his party ought to elect another leader, who could then take the opinion of the rest of the Opposition on the question of the Constitution. In the event of M. Pashitch's being unwilling to accept any compromise on a centralised form of government in contradistinction to the federal system, the issue could be submitted quite clearly to the electorate, whose decision would settle the matter for the time being. If the Federalists won, they could be relied upon to hold together long enough to introduce a new Constitution, and thereafter could separate on any lines that suited them; if the Centralists secured a majority, the Vilovdan Constitution would be reasonably safe from attack for a considerable period, and the Radicals would be able to get on with the country's business.

It says much for the vitality of Yugoslavia that, in spite of the political blight that has rested on the country, progress, slow but steady, has been made in material prosperity. Much more would have been achieved if a solution of the political problems could have been found, as foreign capital has been chary of committing itself while the future of the new State has been so uncertain. Railway construction has provided an interesting object-lesson. In the first flush of post-War enthusiasm great schemes of railway development were propounded, and a loan of a hundred million dollars was to be provided by the United States for a railway to the Adriatic. When a first instalment of fifteen million had been paid over, the political outlook became less satisfactory, and the wisdom of grandiose schemes was being questioned in Yugoslavia. The loan stock slumped, and it came to be taken for granted that the last had been heard of the hundred million dollars. In the meantime the Yugoslav Government has been undertaking railway construction and the improvement of existing lines with such funds as it had at its disposal, and has been able to make important progress in the extension of internal communications. The Blair loan stock has advanced many points, and the possibility of reviving the original scheme is now being canvassed. British capital is showing some interest in the proposal, and its co-operation would be welcomed in Yugoslavia, in the hope that more British funds would be attracted for the development of the country. Before the Blair scheme is revived in its original form we should like to see an attempt made by an expert Commission to draw up a comprehensive statement of Yugoslavia's railway needs with a view to ensuring the most profitable expenditure of any money raised for the purpose. It is by no means established that the country would be better served by the Adriatic railway, which would probably cost in the end more than a hundred million dollars, than by the earlier construction of a number of shorter lines, together with a bridge over the Danube at Belgrade The best service, therefore, that British capital can render to the Yugoslavs is to lend itself, as far as possible, to their more pressing needs first. The bigger schemes will follow in due course, and will prove more profitable if development in other directions has been able to keep pace with the country's growth.

THE SUDAN TREATY.

To the Editor of THE NEAR EAST.

Sir,—So Zaghloul Pasha is coming to England to discuss with Mr. Ramsay MacDonald the Sudan Treaty. Moreover, if correctly reported, nothing will satisfy this Nationalist leader till he sees the British flag no longer flying over the Palace at Khartoum, the spot where General Gordon died. This news recalls to my mind the long ago and half-forgotten memories of events which occurred in the early 'eighties, events which culminated in the treaty above mentioned, that is if one may call an agreement with one of the Parties concerned under tutelage by such a high-sounding title! We who saw the Sudan tragedy unfold itself are begged to keep silence, lest we may make the delicate task undertaken by our Prime Minister still more difficult. Personally I have no desire or intention of interfering with the Foreign Office experts by whom Mr. Ramsay MacDonald will be instructed, but the British public has so short a memory that it may be of interest to the younger generation if I be allowed to reconstruct this Sudan crime (for it was a crime) with few, if any, comments on the issues involved.

In the first place, may I congratulate Mr. Ramsay MacDonald on his invitation to the Egyptian Prime Minister, as by this "gesture" he has at any rate endeavoured to undo the unhappy error which was committed immediately after the War when the Egyptian leaders soliciting an interview to state their views anew were refused.

I have no dates to refer to, but if I remember right it was during the late summer of 1883 that Cherif Pasha, who was then Prime Minister, resigned on account of Lord Granville's refusal to countenance any expenditure from the Egyptian Treasury or to assist in any way with either men or money from England in the suppression of the rebel who proclaimed himself to be the Mahdi and was collecting around him a following at El Obeid in the Darfur Province. My next recollection is seeing this Governor-General of the Sudan at the interior, where he had been promoted on account of his dissensions with Hicks Pasha, the retired British General, whom the Egyptian Government had obtained to command the expedition which was proceeding to suppress the rebellion. We all anxiously awaited news from Hicks, and our consternation may be imagined when Colonel de Coetlegau, who had been left at Khartoum, wired that Hicks and his entire army had been surrounded and massacred to a man. But seeing that Hicks and the few British officers with him were all on half-pay or retired, this disaster merely strengthened the British Government's decision to have nothing to do with the Sudan. Lord Granville was obdurate, merely counselling the Egyptian Government to evacuate all their garrisons as soon as possible. Eventually after much telegraphing on the part of Lord Granville, Sir Evelyn Baring (as he then was) reluctantly agreed to General Gordon's being sent to carry out his policy of evacuation.

In the meantime the garrisons in the neighbourhood of Suakin had been loudly calling for help, as they were hard pressed by Osman Digna, one of the Mahdi's lieutenants. Two of these garrisons were within easy reach of the sea, and might easily have been saved by the newly formed Egyptian Army, with the assistance of a British battalion or two. But this help was refused, and the young Egyptians recently recruited were deemed too unreliable to be trusted alone. General Valentine Baker was therefore allowed to try to relieve Sinkat, the nearest garrison, with some 2,000 gendarmerie, the remnants of Arabi's army. After a month's drilling at Suakin the attempt was made, the gendarmerie refused to fight and were massacred in sight of their ships; General Baker and a few British officers, narrowly escaping the same fate, re-embarked on their transports. The British Government then sanctioned a punitive expedition of British troops collected from transports returning from India, Baker's defeat was avenged, but too late to save Sinkat. For a time there was talk of constructing a railway from Suakin to the Nile for the purpose of relieving Gordon at Khartoum, and navvies and material were brought from England for the purpose; but the idea was abandoned and the British troops withdrawn from Suakin.

Eventually public opinion was too strong even for Mr. Gladstone, and the British Government sanctioned an expedition by the river to relieve Gordon, who by this time was hard pressed. The river expedition with rowing-boats was General Lord Wolseley's scheme, influenced, no doubt, by his Red River experience. It was about this time that Major Kitchener was first heard of, as he succeeded in penetrating to Dongola with a few Camel Corps and reported that Province still loyal to the Egyptian Government. The advance by the river proved slower than was anticipated, and a dash for Metemmeh was made across the desert. The battle of Abouklea was fought and the Nile reached, but the General commanding was killed. Moreover, when Khartoum was reached by steamer from Metemmeh Lord Beresford and the half company of British troops on board with him found the Palace occupied by Dervishes and Gordon killed.

The death of Gordon gave the British Government an excuse to withdraw the expedition, and Wadi Halfa was declared to be Egypt's most southern limit. Not only so, but a High Commissioner (Prince Hussan) was actually sent to Wadi Halfa by the Egyptian Government to make terms with the Mahdi. It only shows how ignorant we all were of the fanatical spirit which was the driving force of the Mahdi, or rather the Khalifa, who had succeeded the Mahdi by that time. Moreover, it soon became clear that Home-rule was by no means the summit of the Khalifa's ambition, although Mr. Gladstone still persisted in making speeches about "a nation struggling to be free." It was no longer a matter of allowing the Sudanese to stew in their own juice, but whether the newly formed Egyptian army were capable of defending their own frontiers without a strong backing of British troops. Our fears, however, were set at rest as the Dervish invading force under Wadi Neguni were easily defeated by General Grenfell, and their leader killed without the assistance of British troops. But defending Egypt was quite a different matter from retaking Khartoum, and I doubt even an Egyptian Nationalist contending that at that early period the Egyptian army was, without British assistance, capable of doing so had they been permitted to make the attempt. The moot point appears to be: Ought we to have recognised from the start that the control of the Nile was of vital importance to Egypt? Having, therefore, undertaken the regeneration of Egypt, ought we to have held on to the Sudan coûte que coûte? Further, supposing that we considered the Sudan as outside our province, ought we to have allowed the suzerain Power (the Turks) to send troops to suppress the rebellion? There can be no question that at one time we were to a certain extent mindful of Turkey's right (vide the Wolfe Commission).

But whatever the British policy may have been, or ought to have been, the younger generation of British officers who from now onwards held command in the Egyptian army very soon made up their minds that Mahdiism must be smashed at its source.

Sir Herbert Kitchener, who had succeeded General Grenfell as Sirdar, left no one in doubt regarding his intentions, and, the Egyptian Treasury being no longer in a state of bankruptcy, Lord Cromer was soon convinced, and, in turn, persuaded Lord Salisbury, then in power. Three or four British battalions with a regiment of cavalry were all that was asked for by Sir Herbert Kitchener, and the result we all know. I believe that I am correct in stating that the cost of the whole campaign did not exceed £500,000. But whatever the actual figures may have been, no one can question that the Sudan expedition was the cheapest ever carried out under modern conditions, as Sir Herbert Kitchener was a great economist, and invariably obtained full value for money expended. At this juncture it is interesting to note that the £500,000 which the Egyptian Government appropriated from the reserve for the purpose of the campaign had subsequently to be refunded by the British Government, the Mixed Tribunal ruling that this appropriation was ultra vires, so limited were the Egyptian Government's powers in financial matters in those days.

This is briefly the record of the events which led up to the Agreement of 1899, commonly known as the Sudan Treaty, which the Egyptian Nationalists are now asking the British Government to annul. The main features of this agreement are :—(a) There was to be no interference of the Mixed Courts or any Consular authority in the administration of justice in the Sudan—in other words, the Capitulations were abolished.

(b) The appointment or removal of the Governor-General was to be made or carried out only with the approval of the British Government.

(c) No law, decree or arrêté of the Egyptian Government would apply to the Sudan, unless promulgated by the Governor-General.

In practice this has meant that all the superior appointments in the Sudan Civil Service are held by British officials. The subordinate appointments are held by Egyptians, with a sprinkling of local Arabs as the education of the past twenty years qualified them to fill such posts. No special reference is made to the conservation of the water supply required by Egypt, but the British Government has expressed its willingness to safeguard the Egyptian rights in this connection by the creation of a Joint Board of Control. The Egyptian Nationalists maintain that the Sudan is an internal part of Egypt, and the Sudanese as a national unit capable of governing themselves as non-existent. They argue that the race distinction between the inhabitants of the Assuan Province and of Berber and other provinces north of Khartoum is no more than between the fellaheen of Upper and Lower Egypt. Moreover, that all speak more or less a common language and are of the same faith. They contend further that, granted there was oppression in the old days, the Egyptians themselves were also sufferers from Turkish rule, but now all this has been changed, and the Egyptian methods of government are certainly not inferior to the methods other civilised nations have adopted. On the other hand, the British Government contend that they were the predominant partner in the reconquest of the Sudan, and have, therefore, equal, if not greater, rights in this connection than the Egyptians. Moreover, the Egyptians have yet to prove that they can govern themselves before trying their 'prentice hand on others. Again, Egypt is a very small country, and there are other inhabitants of the Nile Valley with riparian rights. Finally, that the inhabitants to the south of Fashoda bear no resemblance to the Egyptians in customs, religion, or even colour. In short, without British credit the Sudan cannot be developed; without British supervision and assistance all the good work of the past thirty years may be undone.

This is the problem as it presents itself to one who is absolutely without bias one way or another. I have no intention of suggesting any solution. I will content myself by stating that there appear to be several alternative proposals indicated, any one of which might with advantage be adopted. It only requires a little good will on both sides.—

I am, etc.,

COLES PASHA.

P.S.—It seems to be the irony of fate that the son of the Minister who was assassinated for signing the Treaty should be coming to London to try to get the Treaty annulled.

THE SPELLING OF IRAK.

To the Editor of THE NEAR EAST.

Sir,—I am sorry to see, in your issue of May 15, the position that you take up regarding the spelling of Iraq and other Eastern names.

You talk of "the system on which THE NEAR EAST has tried to regulate the spelling of foreign words." But why should you not use the official system already laid down, and adopted by Government offices, Lloyds, and very many other people, by the Permanent Committee on Geographical Names (of which I happen to be chairman)?

It is a practical, and at the same time scientific, system as far as it can be made, and we are doing our best to get it adopted by everyone, so as to regulate the appalling chaos which exists on the subject. I am, I confess, much disappointed that a periodical of your standing, which would be of much value in getting it taken up, has not yet adopted it. I assure you we have had every assistance from the highest authorities, including local ones, in spelling, especially Eastern and Arabic names, and our aim has been the same as yours—viz., "to convey as near as permissible the sound in the original."

May I, by the way, venture to point out that the ' (not ') in 'Iraq is neither an accent nor a breathing, but a separate letter (ain).

In conclusion, I sincerely beg of your assistance in popularising the "R.G.S. II." system which we have adopted. The Assistant, P.C.G.N., at the Royal Geographical Society, Kensington Gore, S.W.7, will be only too happy to supply you with lists of words and an explanation of the system.

I am, etc.,

EDWARD GLEICHEN, Major-General.

RIVAL RELIGIONS.

"JUDAISM AND THE BEGINNINGS OF CHRISTIANITY." (London: G. Routledge and Sons. 5s. net.)

The disappearance of religious bigotry is the brightest spot in our social and political horizon. Until recent years the champions of rival creeds met only to indulge in acrimonious controversy, and refused to recognise any virtue in an opponent's cult. It is a hopeful sign of the times that Christian and Jewish theologians should foregather to discuss the first collisions of their respective creeds in a spirit of sweet reasonableness. The new departure is evidenced by a course of lectures delivered last year before the Union of Jewish Literary Societies. Published in book form, they will do much to dispel the mutual ignorance which keeps Christians and Hebrews at arm's length. The introductory discourse, by Dr. A. Cohen, deals with the momentous century which witnessed Christ's advent. The dawn found Judæa enjoying a high degree of prosperity under the Roman ægis; at its close the land lay desolate and its people were reduced to slavery. Dr. Cohen attributes the ruin of Judæa as a political entity to the spirit of faction and to an unholy alliance between religious and temporal power. It will be news to most readers that the Pharisees strove to adapt the Torah, or body of Jewish law, to the ever-changing phases of human life, while their antagonists, the Sadducees, clung to the letter of the law. The latter sect was the mainstay of the priesthood, whose depravity and intrigues alienated the population at large from the Temple's ordinances. Dr. Cohen ascribes the survival of the Jewish nation, despite unparalleled persecution, to the influence of the Torah and the Synagogue, which gave unity and common ideals to its scattered fragments. In describing the relations between Christ and His fellow-citizens, the lecturer treads deftly on rather delicate ground. Jesus, he states, never claimed to be the founder of a new religion, and was in all essentials a practising Jew. His teachings excited astonishment, but they did not warrant His expulsion from the community. But fierce hostility was aroused by His attacks on the priesthood, and by the fact that His followers hailed Him as the long-expected Messiah. Then only did priestly hatred and Roman jealousy conspire to compass His death. Not until St. Paul had created the theological system on which Christianity rests was there any definite cleavage between the latter and Judaism.

The lecture delivered by Dr. F. C. Burkitt, Norrisian Professor of Divinity at Cambridge, treats of the Jewish Apocalypses—a series of sacred books, which includes that of Daniel and Esdras II. In his opinion these writings exercised enormous influence on the generation into which Christ was born. A more conspicuous quality is implicit faith in God's eventual justice, which has enabled Jews to support the direst repression. Though inferior to the Canonical books in power and literary form, the Apocalypses reflect and explain the national feeling which ranks among the wonders of history.—The Rev. R. Travers Herford's inquiry into Pharisaism is in some respects an expansion of the initial lecture. Christianity, he says, was carried far beyond the Jewish pale by St. Paul's teachings. Their basic doctrine was belief in Christ's mission and atonement, while Judaism enjoins the conscious doing of God's will as set forth in the Torah. Thus an impassable gulf yawns between the respective creeds, despite the fact that Christianity accepts the Jewish Scriptures and its congregational worship originated in the Synagogue. Dr. Herford, however, admits that the Christian Churches, "in bringing light and truth into the darkness and ignorance of the Gentile world, have done a great work for God."

Josephus is the subject of the concluding lecture by Dr. H. St. John Thackeray. His defects as an annalist are patent enough. Regard for self-interest ranged him on the Roman side; but he displayed the purest patriotism by standing forth as the champion of his fellow-countrymen at a time when everything was to be gained by belittling their splendid bravery. From a literary standpoint his writings cannot be compared with those of the pagan historians who were avowedly his models. Yet to Josephus we are indebted for such knowledge as we possess of the decline and fall of Jerusalem; and he displayed a breadth of view which is in refreshing contrast with the particularism of orthodox Jewry. AMONG THE PARSIS.

"SUBLIME THOUGH BLIND." By M. M. Banaji. (Bombay: Banaji. Rs.8.)

In this typically Indian novel the writer has aimed at giving a picture of the life of the Parsis "at their hearth and home and abroad, and of their sayings and doings, manners, customs, religion, etc." Those who look on their novel-reading as an anodyne would probably not find it to their taste, but for those (who, one may hope, are a constantly increasing number) who wish to learn something of India and her many communities, and to whom information is more important than thrilling incident, this book should make a distinct appeal.

THE SOUL OF GREECE.

(By SIR VALENTINE CHIROL.)

A painter born in Russia, a member of the Russian Fine Arts Academy, M. Nicholas Himona was driven out of Russia by the Bolshevist revolution, and sought refuge in Greece, which was his parents' country. Perhaps it is the Greek blood in his veins that has helped him to put the restless soul of Greece into his Greek landscapes. The collection which he is now exhibiting at the Beaux Arts Gallery, in Bruton Place, is not a very large one, but it ranges over the whole gamut of Greek scenery, from the dark storm-clouds sweeping over the Greek mountain tops to the peace that reigns on the shores of the wine-coloured sea, from the immortal Parthenon, with all the gorgeous memories of Hellas reflected in the crimson clouds piled up above it, to the humble fishing huts of heroic Missolonghi. Byron's centenary gives actuality to a delightful little picture of his monument, whilst such studies as the beautiful Greek thistle and the brilliant field of yellow flowers at Poros and the little white church perched characteristically high up on a rock, show how admirably M. Himona seizes the lesser as well as the larger aspects of things. The hills of Attica may be bare and bleak when the sun hides his face from them, but where in the world are there hills that respond as they do to the brighter and more tender as well as to the sterner moods of Nature? For Englishmen there must be a special pathos in the two pictures "On Parga's Shore." Towards the end of the Napoleonic wars the British flag replaced the tricolour on the battlements of the old fort at Parga, which the French had wrested from Turkish hands; but at the Congress of Vienna the little seaport on the coast of the Adriatic escaped the memory of British diplomatists, who carelessly allowed it to revert to Turkey. When the heartbroken people absolutely refused to go back under the Turkish yoke, all the English Governor could do was to lend them ships so they should embark and go forth into exile before the terrible Ali Pasha of Yanina set his soldiers loose upon them. Nor did they embark until they had proceeded to the sepulchres of their fathers and silently unearthed and collected their remains, which were then solemnly consumed on a great pyre built up in front of the church. It is a fine bit of Greek history, of which any who has been to Parga must be grateful to M. Himona for having recalled at least the setting—a strangely peaceful setting to-day, now that the shadow of the Turk has been long since banished from it.

This Exhibition closes on May 31.

THE QUEEN OF ROUMANIA

Queen Marie of Roumania is crowding activity upon activity during her visit to England. To-night (Thursday) she is honouring Admiral of the Fleet Earl Beatty and Countess Beatty with her presence at their dinner, reception, and dance at Mall House. Next week-end she is spending at Plymouth, as the guest of Lord and Lady Astor. On Monday, June 2, she will dine with the French Ambassador and Comtesse de Sainte-Aulaire (Comte de Sainte-Aulaire was at one time Minister to Roumania), and on the following day she is partaking of the luncheon which the P.E.N. Club has arranged in her honour. Her Majesty is leaving London for Bucharest on June 5. Princess Ileana will arrive in England towards the end of next month.

THE LIBYAN DESERT.

On May 22 Hassanein Bey, the distinguished Egyptian explorer who is now a member of the Egyptian Legation in Washington, lectured to the Central Asian Society upon the expedition which he undertook last year through the Libyan Desert southwards viâ Kufra to El-Obeid, in the Sudan. His vivid and modest account was made even more interesting by the abundant display of some very remarkable coloured photographs, which enabled one to appreciate some of the beauties and the hardships of the desert through which he had passed. Starting from Sollum, the expedition of Hassanein Bey went on to Siwa, Jalabub, Kufra, and thence, not by the usual trade route to Wadai, but by a more directly southward route towards the Sudan. By the time that the expedition had reached El-Fasher they were almost at the end of their resources, but, said the lecturer, owing to the kindness of British officials, they were able to complete the last lap in style.

In the course of his lecture Hassanein Bey paid a simple tribute to the power and the motives of the Senussi, whose suspicion of foreigners was based not so much on religious grounds as on fear of foreign penetration.

Subsequently, Mr. Keith-Roach, of the Palestine Government, related some of the impressions of Darfur he had gained on service there during 1916-1920, emphasising particularly the point that the lecturer had made of the laziness of the men and the industry of the women of those parts.

At the request of the Queen of Roumania, Eton boys are to be given a holiday later in the half.

Approximately 60 per cent. of the votes in the Bulgarian Communal elections were cast for the Democratic Entente. The Agrarians and Communists lost ground, a satisfactory result from the point of view of the Government.

NOTES AND NEWS.

Turkish Bondholders.

The question of the revenues allocated to the Ottoman Debt collected by the British Government in Palestine and Irak during the war was raised last week in the House of Lords by Lord Banbury. In the course of an exhaustive answer (which will be found in another column), Lord Arnold, Under-Secretary for the Colonies, referred to correspondence between the Council of Foreign Bondholders and the Treasury and the Foreign Office, and quoted the reply to the Council that there could be no question of imposing further liabilities on the exchequers of the Governments of Irak and Palestine over and above their existing liabilities. He added that the Government could not contemplate reopening the settlement reached on this matter in the Treaty of Lausanne. But this has not been suggested, and all the bondholders want is that the revenues which would naturally have accrued to them should be handed over, and on this subject it cannot be said that Lord Arnold's will give any great measure of comfort.

Progress of Empire Cotton Growing.

The report of the British Cotton Growing Association, extracts from which will be found elsewhere in this issue, provides most satisfactory evidence of the steady progress that is being made in the production of cotton within the Empire. The approximate value of the cotton grown in the Empire during the year under review was £5,503,000, as compared with only £2,716,000 for the previous period. "The increased quantity of cotton produced during the year in many parts of the Empire," it is pointed out, "is very gratifying, especially at a time when the prospects for a greater production in America appear to be getting more remote every year." The year was one of marked depression in the cotton industry, and it is emphasised that the statistical position shows that if normal conditions had obtained there would have been a great shortage of usable supplies of raw cotton. As it was, the supplies of Empire growths of cotton have been very welcome to the trade. As I have had occasion to point out on many occasions, the time is bound to come when the sources on which Lancashire now relies will no longer suffice, and with the gradual economic recovery that time is rapidly approaching. That fact makes it incumbent to do everything possible to develop supplies within the Empire, and as the report shows, this is now being done to the fullest extent, particularly in the Sudan, where the production is now rapidly increasing, and with the development now in progress may be expected to advance by leaps and bounds.

Burmah Oil Dividend.

The results of the past year's working of the Burmah Oil Company can only be described as extremely satisfactory, especially when the prevailing conditions are taken into consideration. The petroleum position during 1923 was governed by the over-production in America, but, despite the effect of this factor, the Burmah Oil Company shows increased net profits of £2,204,000, as compared with £2,116,000, after a considerably larger allocation for depreciation than a year ago. This result speaks volumes as to the strength of the concern. The proposed final dividend is 20 per cent. free of tax, making 30 per cent. for the year free of tax, this being the same distribution as in the three previous years. The allocations to the reserves are the same as before, £20,000 being placed to the insurance reserve and £200,000 to the general reserve, leaving £382,133 to be carried forward as compared with £335,063.

The Exhibition.

Many people on principle avoid visiting an Exhibition at the commencement, and if the attendance at Wembley during the opening month, except on special occasions, has not been quite in accordance with expectations, there is nothing in that fact that need give rise to adverse conclusions as to the result of the enterprise. From the beginning of next month onwards the real rush of visitors will set in, and if the total number of those who go to Wembley does not quite attain the figure hoped for, there is no doubt that it will reach very respectable dimensions. As I have said before, however, I do not believe there will be the great influx from abroad that seems to be expected. Of course, the numbers will be above the average, but the times are too unfavourable to admit of anything really out of the ordinary. But that will not affect the success of the Exhibition, the effect of which on the development of trade within the Empire is bound to be most pronounced.

G.I.P. Dividend.

For the year 1922-23 a dividend of $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. was paid by the Great Indian Peninsular Railway Company, in addition to the guaranteed interest of 3 per cent. The additional dividend now proposed for the year ended March 31 is $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. There was a substantial decline in traffic receipts during the year, and it remains to be seen to what extent compensation has been found for this in reduced operating expenses.

COMMERCE AND INDUSTRY.

BULGARIA.

Sofia, May 15.

The Deal with Czecho-Slovakia.

The arrangement made with Czecho-Slovakia whereby Bulgaria buys rolling stock to the value of 270 million levas, and in return Czecho-Slovakia buys 750 million levas of tobacco, is the first important transaction of its kind to be carried out between Bulgaria and a foreign country. It is reported that the price obtained for the tobacco is very low, but it is a good thing that the deal was carried through, as of late the tobacco glut has assumed serious proportions. So far, the exchange rate has not been affected, but later on in the summer it is expected that there should be a rise in the value of the lev.

Few British Motor-Cars.

With Bulgarian newspapers reproducing news about the McKenna duties, one is reminded of the negligible rôle which the British motor industry plays in Bulgaria. The number of British-made cars can be counted on the fingers of one hand, and there is no sign that any more will arrive. This is somewhat extraordinary, as during the last twelve months there have been quite considerable imports of foreign cars, notably Italian Fiats, Austrian Steyrs, and French Citroens. In addition, some cheaper brands of American cars have just made their appearance.

The import tariff is heavy, nominally 33 per cent. ad valorem, but as Bulgarian roads are in a shocking condition a good sound car is required. Those which at present command the readiest sale are neither dear nor cheap, and the moderate-priced English car should, under certain conditions, be able to compete, for Bulgarians do not go in for the cheapest brand of cars.

HAIFA-BAGHDAD MOTOR SERVICE.

A telegram in The Times last week announced that the Nairn Transport Company had broken all "records" by motoring from Baghdad to Beyrout, a distance of 614 miles, in 16½ hours. The company's mail and passenger service between these two towns has now been in operation some nine months. In the period between October 18, 1923, and May 8, 1924, its cars travelled 125,000 miles and carried 16,000 lb. of mails (an average of 550 lb. a week). The number of passengers carried amounted to 700, the largest convoys in any one week being on March 27, when there were fifty-two people on the desert at one and the same time in thirteen cars, seven homeward and six outward bound. During the period in question stoppages due to mechanical defects were confined to two occasions when the cars had to be towed. No mails have been late owing to mechanical inefficiency, but they were delayed twice, once by weather and once as a result of bridges being broken by floods.

The traffic receipts of the South Indian Railway for the week ended April 26 amounted to Rs. 10,71,001.

Viscount Churchill has been elected to a seat on the board of the P. and O. and British India Steam Navigation Companies.

The export is prohibited from Syria and Lebanon of wheat, barley and oats and their derivatives (bran and flour). Exceptions to the prohibition may be granted.

EMPIRE COTTON GROWING.

British Cotton-Growing Association's Report.

The British Cotton Growing Association has just issued its annual report. We give the following extracts :—

It is generally admitted that the year under review has been one of the most unprofitable ever experienced in the history of the cotton industry of this country. The great bulk of the mills using American cotton have been working on short time, and the earning power of the operatives has been seriously curtailed. The statistical position of the world's supplies of raw cotton shows that with normal trade conditions there would have been a great shortage of useable raw cotton, and although the supplies of Empire and other "outside" growths of cotton are still comparatively small, they have been very welcome to the trade, and the types are becoming better known and sought after.

During the year the shipping facilities from African ports have been mostly satisfactory, particularly in the case of the Nigerian cotton crop. With regard to Uganda, it is important that a frequent and regular service of steamers should be maintained between Mombasa and Liverpool, as otherwise a good deal of the crop will be shipped to Bombay.

The question of making Empire and other "outside" growths of cotton (i.e., cotton other than American and Egyptian) tenderable against a "futures" contract has for some time been receiving the consideration of the directors of the Liverpool Cotton Association. A special committee was appointed to inquire fully into the matter, and representatives of the association were invited to confer with this committee and place their views before them. The great bulk of the cotton now being produced in many parts of the Empire is grown from American seed, and the quality is at least equal to the average American type, and there is no doubt that it would give a great impetus to Empire cotton-growing if all cotton produced from American types of seed could be made tenderable against the American futures contract.

The accounts show a surplus for the year's working of £102,967 2s. 1d., which, with £59,522 0s. 2d. brought forward from last year, increases the excess of income over expenditure to £162,489 2s. 3d. As usual, full provision has been made for depreciation, also for income-tax and in respect of corporation profits tax. This satisfactory result has been brought about notwithstanding the fact that, in accordance with the Association's invariable policy, the native growers have been paid the highest possible prices for their seed cotton on the basis of current Liverpool values.

From September until the end of the year a rapid advance took place in the price of American "futures," and the favourable conditions under which the cotton could then be marketed contributed in a large measure to the very satisfactory statement which the Council are pleased to be able to present

India.

The estate near Khanewal, Punjab Province, which has been granted by the Government on long lease, which is being operated by "B.C.G.A. (Punjab), Limited," consists of 7,300 acres, of which 6,800 acres is now culturable. The farm grew 1,200 acres of American cotton in 1922-23, which produced an average yield of 12 maunds (one maund equals 82 2-7 lb.) an acre in 4F and 289F types, and 10½ maunds per acre for the 285F. The Desi variety produced nearly 16 maunds per acre, and the 4F type gave the best financial return by about 15s. per acre. No other large farm produced anything like these average yields in the Punjab. The system of cultivation adopted—line sowing and interculture—also double rauni (i.e., two waterings before sowing) for cotton, is being widely followed, especially within twenty-five miles of Khanewal, and on large farms elsewhere. Seed production, to which special attention is given, both at the farm and at the ginning factory, is greatly appreciated. Seed for 100,000 acres of cotton was supplied to the Agricultural Department last year, and a great deal was also sold direct by the company.

Large scale tests under reliable assistants are being carried out for the Agricultural Department, both for cotton and wheat, thus facilitating and accelerating attainment of results for Zemindars.

Agreements are in hand for the company to take up in earnest the question of power farming, where, by tractors or steam, large tracts will shortly be coming under cultivation for the first time, both in the Punjab and Sind, and as under present conditions settling and colonising a new tract is slow work after the completion of a canal, it is hoped that very important economical results will be achieved by reducing the interest charges on the project.

A feature of the estate is the well-planned villages, roads, trees, and wells put up by the lessees for their tenants and labourers, whose prosperity and contentment must be considered in all successful estate management.

There has been a substantial increase of considerably more than half a lakh of acres (50,000) in the area planted with American long-stapled cotton in the Lower Chenab Canal district as a result of the very good outturn of American cotton, and of the substantial premium for this over the Desi varieties in the previous year. The increase in American cotton on the Lower Bari Doab Canal also exceeds half a lakh of acres, which represents over 31 per cent. of the total of last year. Whilst the cultivation of Desi cotton shows a decline, the increase in the area under all cotton on this canal is 20 per cent. over last year. The 285F type of American cotton has steadily been increasing in area, and it is estimated that 20,000 acres are cultivated with this variety, the remainder being 4F American. Altogether an increase in the Punjab colonies is shown from 300,000 to 550,000 acres, representing an increased yield of 100,000 bales of good useful cotton.

Ceylon.

Some years ago the Association were interested in cotton growing developments in Ceylon, but eventually, owing to the outbreak of the War and other competitive crops, such as rubber, tea, etc., it was decided to withdraw. With the higher standard of prices for cotton, in comparison with rubber and other crops, the prospects are now much brighter, and a good deal of rail construction is being carried out which will give rail access to Colombo from districts which are considered suitable for cotton cultivation. The question has been referred to the Empire Cotton Growing Corporation, and, as a preliminary, they have decided to send out an expert from India to make a tour of inspection and to submit a report as to the possibilities.

Sudan.

The cotton crop dealt with on the four estates which are managed by the Sudan Plantations Syndicate, Ltd., amounted to 12,266 bales of 400 lb. each, the corresponding quantity in the previous year being 11,386 bales. The highest yield was obtained at Tayiba, where 1,680 feddans produced 7,457 kantars, or nearly 4½ kantars of lint cotton per feddan. In addition to these four stations the new areas served by the Wad el Nau Pumping Station, and extending roughly to 10,000 feddans, are now under cotton cultivation, which means that the cotton area in the Gezira is doubled.

There is every likelihood that the Makwar Dam will be finished in 1925, and ready to supply water for a considerable number of acres, and with this in view the Sudan Plantations Syndicate, Ltd., are developing and arranging for the minor canalisation of the greater part of the 300,000 acres area for 1924, in order to be in a position to start ploughing, in October, 1924, an area commensurate with the anticipated water supply for the dam in the first year.

At Tokar a total of 112,633 kantars of seed cotton was obtained during the season from 21,000 feddans, an average of 5.36 kantars of seed cotton per feddan. The crop was three weeks later than usual, and caused a certain amount of anxiety in its early stages. The cotton was of very superior quality, and the noticeable characteristic was the very high percentage of first-class cotton, over 76 per cent. of the total crop being classified first-class. The reports of the 1923-24 crop are very promising; there are about 52,000 feddans under cultivation, and the cotton was looking well and the prospects are bright. The control of the waters that supply the delta is difficult, but it is hoped that a way will be found to regularise the distribution of the water.

A keen interest is being taken in the cultivation of American cotton as a rain crop in the Blue Nile and Fung Provinces, and for the coming season a total crop of some 7,000 bales of long-stapled American cotton is anticipated from the Sudan; this is in addition to some 35,000 bales of superior Sakellarides cotton from the Gezira, Tokar Kassala, etc.

Irak.

The production of cotton in 1923 amounted to about 1,500 bales, against 350 bales for the previous season, and the Association's ginning factory at Baghdad is being enlarged to deal with this increased production.

The quality of the cotton on the whole is satisfactory, and the Department of Agriculture is considering proposals for the prohibition of undesirable varieties of cotton in certain areas.

Eighty tons of cotton seed has been sold for sowing for the new season, sufficient to plant 6,400 acres. The Agricultural Department has tackled the question of seed distribution in good time, and a minimum crop of 3,500 bales is forecasted for the coming season.

Conclusion.

The increased quantity of cotton produced during the year in many parts of the Empire is very gratifying, especially at a time when the prospects for a greater production in America appear to be getting more remote every year.

It cannot be denied that the cotton industry in this country has been passing through the worst time it has experienced since the cotton famine, and there can be little doubt that the cost of cotton goods, largely due to the high price of the raw material, is responsible to a great extent for the poor demand from overseas markets. The world supply of useful cotton has been seriously curtailed as a result of the recent failures of the American crop, and with better trade conditions the demand for raw cotton would certainly have exceeded the supply.

The authorities are becoming more alive to the importance of this subject, and it is beginning to be realised to what a great extent the welfare of many of the colonies depends upon the development of the native cotton growing industry. Transport facilities are being improved in some places, but there is still a good deal of work to be done in the construction of railways, roads, etc., before the resources of the colonies as cotton producers can be fully developed.

THE OTTOMAN PUBLIC DEBT.

Position of Bondholders.

In the House of Lords on May 21 a series of questions was addressed to the Government by Lord Banbury dealing with the position of bondholders of the Ottoman Public Debt in respect of sums collected by the British Government in Palestine and Irak during the War, and with the actions of the Turkish Government in relation to the Decree of Muharrem.

Lord Arnold, in reply, said: In reply to the first part of the question, the British military authorities, when they occupied Mesopotamia and Palestine, retained so far as possible the machinery and personnel of the Ottoman Debt Administration, and kept separate accounts of the proceeds of the assigned revenues. There was, of course, no question of actually paying over these revenues to the Ottoman Debt Council at Constantinople, which then consisted of enemy nationals, and which was withholding payment from all Allied bondholders while continuing to pay enemy bondholders. Subsequently it became clear that these territories would not in future form part of the Ottoman Empire, and the continuance of separate agencies for the collection of a part of the revenue of these territories could not have been justified. The receipts in respect of the assigned revenues were treated until 1920 as forming part of the general revenues of the territories in question.

I must next allude to the provisions in regard to the Ottoman Debt contained in the Treaty of Peace with Turkey. It will be remembered that the conditions of peace were first drawn up early in 1920 and the Treaty of Sèvres was signed on August 9, 1920, but was never ratified, and after three years of negotiations, during which the political situation in Turkey underwent, not once, but several times, the most complete transformation, the Treaty of Lausanne was signed on July 24, 1923, and has been ratified by Turkey, and will shortly be ratified by His Majesty's Government and the other Allied Powers. The financial clauses of the Treaty of Lausanne provide for dividing the liability for the pre-war Ottoman Public Debt between Turkey and the territories detached from the Ottoman Empire after the Balkan wars of 1912-13 and after the Great War of 1914-18.

Under these provisions the date from which Palestine and Irak are to assume responsibility for a portion of the pre-War Ottoman Public Debt is fixed, as the noble Lord indicated, at March 1, 1920. In this respect, the Treaty of Lausanne does not differ from the Treaty of Sèvres. The question of the date from which the liabilities should start under the plan of division of the Ottoman Public Debt was a matter of considerable controversy during the Lausanne Conference. On the one hand, it was argued that Turkey should be responsible for the whole of the Debt until the Treaty, under which Irak and Palestine and other territories were formally detached from Turkey, came into force. On the other hand, it was urged that these territories had been actually detached at least as early as the Armistice of October 30, 1918, and that the division should start from this date. Your Lordships will note that in the result the solution agreed to was a compromise between these two views. The question at issue was not whether or no the bondholders should be deprived of part of their rights, but whether they should be entitled for the period in question to look to Turkey alone on the one hand or to Turkey and the other States concerned on the other hand.

In reply to the second part of the noble Lord's question, the Council of Foreign Bondholders, in December last, applied to the Foreign Office for the restitution of the revenues formerly assigned to the Ottoman Public Debt, which were collected in the occupied territories of Turkey up to March 1, 1920. Correspondence on the matter has subsequently passed between the Council of Foreign Bondholders and the Treasury and Foreign Office. The reply returned to the Council of Foreign Bondholders was that there could be no question of re-opening the settlement on the subject of the division of the pre-War Debt in the manner proposed by them nor of imposing further liabilities upon the Exchequers of the Governments of Irak and Palestine, over and above their existing liabilities, in respect of the share of the pre-War Ottoman Debt assigned to them. From this position the Government are unable to depart; the Treaty of Lausanne was finally drawn up after three years of most difficult negotiations, and the Government cannot for a moment contemplate the possibility of re-opening the settlement reached on this particular point.

The liabilities to be undertaken by Irak and Palestine in respect of their share of the pre-War Ottoman Public Debt will impose a heavy burden on those countries, and I think the noble Lord who asks these questions scarcely gives sufficient recognition to the fact that these liabilities imposed by the Treaty of Lausanne should be of material benefit to the bondholders. I would observe that the Treaty provisions in regard to the Ottoman Public Debt are in certain respects very favourable to the bondholders. For the first time in the history of Turkey, practical effect is given to the principle that States to which Turkish territory is ceded should assume responsibility for a share of the Ottoman Public Debt. This is a principle that has been constantly advocated by the Ottoman Debt Council, and the bondholders for over forty years, but hitherto in vain. The attitude of the present Turkish Government in regard to the Ottoman Debt, to which I shall refer later, reveals clearly how important an advantage it is to the bondholders that Turkey is no longer their only debtor, but that responsibility for the Debt is now shared by other Governments.

Lord Banbury of Southam: Is it not a fact that the Council for Administration of the Ottoman Public Debt has now been dissolved by the Turkish Government?

Lord Arnold: I am going to deal with the position with regard to the Turkish Government later. It comes under the sixth part of the noble Lord's question. But the noble Lord is not content with the Treaty. He wishes us, I presume, to assume a further liability which the Treaty does not place upon us, and to invite the British Parliament to vote money to the bondholders to make good revenues which the Debt Council might have expected to receive if there had been no war. His Majesty's Government certainly do not feel justified in asking the British taxpayers, who have already made such serious sacrifices in connection with the Turkish settlement and the military occupation of Constantinople for a number of years, to provide funds for the satisfaction of the present claim of the Council of Foreign Bondholders. I need scarcely remind your Lordships that all these various promises were given before the present Government came into power. The position of the present Government is that it sees no reason to depart from what was done and arranged by their predecessors in regard to these matters. I may add that the Allied Delegates on the Council of Foreign Bondholders have been fully aware of the provisions of the Treaty in question ever since they were first drafted, and no protest was received from the Council of Foreign Bondholders or from the Ottoman Debt Council on the matter until five months after the end of the Lausanne Conference, or some three and a half years after the proposal to make these provisions was first known.

In reply to the third part of the question, it is the case that the British Government in the past has consistently upheld the rights of the British holders of Ottoman Public Debt, and in December, 1912, informed the belligerent Balkan States that the revenues assigned to the Ottoman Public Debt were under the protection of the great Powers. It must be observed, however, that the case of the Balkan wars of 1912-13 referred to in the question was in one respect essentially different from the case of the Great War. During 1912-13 the bondholders were not of the nationality of any of the belligerent parties, and there was no good reason why the assigned revenues should not continue to be paid to the Ottoman Debt Council. During the Great War, as I have already explained, it was out of the question to pay over assigned revenues collected by British authorities to the Ottoman Debt Council, as those revenues would have passed at once into the hands of the enemy. It is the case that in 1916—not in 1914, as stated in the question—the British Government authorised the British Ambassador at Petrograd to associate himself with the French Ambassador in representing to the Government of Russia the desirability of respecting the rights of holders of the pre-War Ottoman Public Debt under the Decree of Muharrem; but, of course, it was not the intention of the French and British Governments that the assigned revenues should be paid over to enemy hands.

In reply to the fourth part of the question, the Government have received no information from the French Government as to the method in which assigned revenues collected in Syria have been dealt with, and it is not, therefore, possible for me to give the noble Lord any information on this point.

In reply to the sixth part of the question, I regret to say that, according to information recently received from the British representative at Constantinople, it is the case that the action taken by the Turkish Government towards the Ottoman Debt Council violates the conditions laid down by the Decree of Muharrem in spite of the fact that, as stated by the Financial Secretary to the Treasury in another place on May 5, there is nothing in the Treaty of Lausanne which justified such action on the part of the Turkish Government. Under the Decree of Muharrem of 1881 and the Decree-Annex of 1903, certain revenues were assigned to the Ottoman Debt Council. In March, 1920, the Angora Government set up a public Department, under which the agencies of the Ottoman Debt Administration in Anatolia and in Thrace (while under Turkish authority) were placed. These agencies ceased to pay any revenues to the Ottoman Debt Council or to receive any instructions from them. Numerous protests were made by the Ottoman Debt Council, and certain promises were received from the Turkish Government; but, nevertheless, a week or two ago the Turkish Government removed from the control of the Debt Council those agencies which were still responsible to the Council (namely, those in Constantinople and its neighbourhood), and, accordingly, no part of the assigned revenues is now received by the Ottoman Debt Council. I understand that the Ottoman Debt Council have themselves in the first instance taken up the matter with the Turkish Government, and I think it would be premature to make any statement at this moment as to what action His Majesty's Government, in concert with the other Governments concerned, may deem it desirable to take in the matter hereafter should the intervention of those Governments become necessary.

Lord Banbury of Southam: May I ask the noble Lord this question? Am I to understand that in certain events His Majesty's Government will, in conjunction with other Powers, take some steps to protect the rights of the bondholders?

Lord Arnold: The noble Lord is now dealing with the sixth part of his question. I have said that, in the first instance, I understand that the Ottoman Debt Council have themselves made representations, and I think it would be premature to make any further statement at the moment as to what steps may be considered desirable. The matter is one for consideration.

AGRICULTURAL CONDITIONS IN IRAK.

The Agricultural Bulletin of Irak for the month ended April 15 gives the following particulars:—

During the period under report the water demand of both winter and summer crops was heavy. The rainfall was inadequate to meet these demands. High and dry winds and continuous days of cloudless sky necessitated frequent irrigation of all standing crops. This being the flood season, the water supply has been satisfactory in practically all canals. The floods so far have been normal, and no serious breaches have been reported.

The condition of the cereal crop is in general satisfactory, except in the case of unirrigated crops, and more especially those of the Mosul-Erbil area, where the sowing rains were late, and the crop has ripened prematurely on a short straw owing to the subsequent adverse climatic conditions.

Cotton sowing started early in March, but most cultivators have withheld their sowings until early April, as the result of experience gained last year, when the early sown crop received a check with late rains and unusually cold weather. Early sown crops are likely to do well this year. The demand for cotton seed continues to be brisk; about 195,000 lb. of seed have been sold, which is sufficient to grow about 6,500 acres of cotton.

Crop-cutting experiments on private estates in the Diala Liwa on 702 donums of $\frac{5}{8}$ acre shows that in 1923 the average receipts from rice cultivation on these areas were Rs. $20\frac{3}{4}$ per donum, as compared with an average of Rs. 65 per donum on 1,428 donums of cotton. Rice is estimated to demand four times as much water as cotton. So that the returns from water used for irrigating cotton on this basis are twelve times higher than when used for rice. There is a noticeable increase in the area ploughed on contract by tractor for cotton cultivation.

Various reports have been prepared for Sir Thomas Ward, who is investigating irrigation projects in Irak.

Packets of silk eggs disposed of to cultivators, mostly in the Diala area, number 350. Flax grown experimentally by a few landowners is making good progress. Climatic conditions are more favourable to the date crop than at the same period last year. An intensive study of various date pests is being undertaken by the Assistant Entomologist recently stationed at Basrah. All fruit trees imported from America, with the exception of orange trees, are doing well.

The July to March exports of wheat from Irak were 72,760 tons, and of barley 90,840 tons—total, 163,600 tons, as compared with 144,998 tons for the same period in 1922-23. The total exports of the 1923 crop of dates to the end of March, 1924, were 128,760 tons, valued at Rs. 15,030,630, as compared with 105,123 tons, valued at Rs. 12,801,238, for the corresponding season last year. The July to March exports of wool were 4,678 tons, as compared with 1,443 tons for the same period of 1922-1923.

SMYRNA'S TRADE IN 1923.

H.M. Consul-General at Smyrna states that the import trade during 1923 amounted to 187,091 tons, whilst the exports amounted to 141,846 tons. The principal imports included foodstuffs (cereals, feeding stuffs and various crops, meat and fish, food and drink, livestock and vegetable products), wood, building materials, etc., mineral products, coal and charcoal, textiles (cotton and cotton manufactures, wool and woollen manufactures, etc.), metals and metallic articles, vallonea and its products, and fruits (miscellaneous, fresh and dry, and figs and raisins and their products). The chief exports included fruits, vallonea and its products, foodstuffs, liquorice, tobacco, mineral products, coal and charcoal.

SPECIAL MARKET REPORTS.

Cyprus, April 19.

No rain has fallen since the date of our last report. A certain quantity of flour is being imported into the island in anticipation of a shortage in the wheat crop. Local markets are dull.

Haifa, April 26.

The cereal market remains firm, and offers are scarce owing to an order from the Syrian Government prohibiting the export of this produce.

Mosul, April 12.

The continued drought, aggravated by the appearance in certain parts of this region of locusts, blight, and another kind of insect very injurious to cereals, has had an unfortunate effect on the cereal crop, and has shattered the hopes entertained as a result of the harvest. As a result of this state of affairs, the prices of cereals rise day by day.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Uncertain Tendency in Futures.

The Alexandria Commercial Company, in their report for the week ended May 15, state :—

Since our last report the futures market has been much weaker for old crop options, whilst new crops have remained relatively firm. A serious reaction set in early in the week, and had it not been for the firmness of New York we think prices would have touched still lower levels; the market was overbought, and was lacking commercial support, so that the liquidation of a few long positions sufficed to break it. The May position is still fairly well held, its premium over July at one time touching 150 points. Should this premium be maintained, it would be but natural to see heavy tenders on the last tender day of May, inasmuch as Fully Good Fair spot is now worth about May futures price. At the second May tender 1,500 krs. dockets were issued. The demand from abroad has been poor and the Liverpool spot market not very active; it looks as if spinners have covered their immediate requirements, and the heavy discount of new crop options is checking fresh business. Ashmounis old crop have lost their popularity and have been very little dealt in. The relative improvement in new crop options must be attributed to some trade purchases; prices are reasonable, and spinners interest in them is quite justified. The consumption figures of cotton in the U.S.A. for the month of April are B/s 480,000, against B/s 484,000 last month and B/s 577,000 a year ago. The total since August 1, 1923, is B/s 4,561,000, against B/s 5,039,000 the previous season. The week's receipts amount to 22,876 krs., against exports 162,375 krs.; the stock stands at 1,029,939 krs.

Spot.—We have had a week of dull markets at Minet el Bassal, and demand from spinners has been poor. Sales amount to about 6,900 B/s, of which we estimate 5,800 B/s Sakel, 1,000 B/s Uppers, and 100 B/s other growths.

Sakellarides.—Medium and good grades have attracted the bulk of the business done, and the lower grades have received but little attention. Prices of spot against contracts are without much change for Fully Good Fair and Good, rather dearer for Fully Good, and rather cheaper for Good Fair and below. Desirable cotton is getting daily scarcer.

Uppers.—All styles have been dealt in, but the medium and better grades have been in most request. The demand for Uppers, generally, has fallen away considerably. With the exception of Good, which maintains its parity, prices of spot against contracts are generally easier.

Other Growths.—A few bales of Pilion and White have been done. Prices of spot against contracts are generally easier in both these growths.

Crop 1924.—Climatic conditions have, in general, been favourable. The great bulk of the cotton lands have been sown normally, and germination has been superior to last year. The first period of the growth and progress of the plants has been passed satisfactorily. The second period, that of vegetation, has now begun, and will last for about three months; the crop during this period will be subject to the influence of the following factors: climatic conditions, insect pests, and water supply. Not much can be said at present on the first two factors, but as regards the third, which is perhaps the most important, judging from the good irrigation rotations decided by the Irrigation Department, there is every reason to anticipate an ample water supply for both Lower and Upper Egypt.

The report of the Ministry of Agriculture for the month of April reads :—Weather conditions were not quite favourable during April, and growth was delayed owing to temperature on most days having been lower than usual. Sowing is almost finished. Only very few fields remain to be sown during the first week of May. Germination is satisfactory, and the amount of resowing has been much less than last year. Although complaints of shortage of water at tail ends of canals were general, the damage caused by this was insignificant. Thinning, watering, and manuring were going on throughout the month. Attacks of cut-worm and sore-shin were generally mild, and caused very slight damage.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Quiet Conditions.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended May 21 :—

Egyptian Spot.—A further reduction in the bulk of the daily inquiry has been observed since our last report, and conditions remain quiet. Trade in Manchester seems to have materially fallen off during the last few weeks, and, pending some definite pointer as to the probable extent of new crop supplies, spinners appear unwilling to commit themselves any further for the present. The two most noticeable features in the week's inquiry have been a recrudescence in the demand for Uppers, from pass to 100 points on, and the improved demand for White Sudan cotton of the best quality which has sprung up. Prices of the latter vary according to quality from about 250 to 450 on American futures. This demand has come chiefly from the American section. As regards the Uppers, spinners appear to have given up all hope of any longer obtaining "the best," and the inquiry has settled down to practically the range quoted. A few lots of doubtful Fully Good Fair cotton are still being hawked round the market at about 75 to 100 points on, and numerous offers continue to be made from the Continent of c.i.f. and f.o.b. cotton. Many of these offers are hopelessly out of it as regards price, the would-be sellers evidently being unacquainted with the change in sentiment which has lately taken place here. The demand for Sakellaridis has shown little change. Cotton about 300 on still continues to engage most attention, but a slight improvement has again been noted in the inquiry for Good Fair on the one hand, and for Fine to Extra Fine on the other. Except in the case of the very fine cotton, the basis for Sakel has been rather easier, Alexandria, in spite of a very steady futures market, giving a lead in this respect with a shoal of comparatively reasonable c.i.f. offers. Other growths have been neglected. C.i.f. business has been done on a moderate scale only. Forwardings to spinners for the week ending 16th inst. were returned as 7,609 bales. Estimated sales, 2,700 bales Egyptian and 600 bales Sudan.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

Position Unchanged.

The Manchester Cotton Trade Review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended May 24 states :—

The state of affairs in this market remains unchanged from that reported in recent weeks. Operations have taken place only in respect of immediate requirements and for small quantities. Whether buyers abroad can maintain this attitude until the uncertainty regarding the new American crop is in part or wholly removed remains to be seen. Under the present circumstances there is a tendency for spinners and manufacturers to lose ground, but, generally speaking, quotations remain fairly steady.

Yarn.—For both American and Egyptian spinnings demand remains on a small scale. Prices of the former are a shade weaker, but, as previously mentioned, Egyptian spinners are fairly comfortably placed for orders, and in this section prices are firm.

Cloth.—Numbers of contracts in respect of small quantities are arranged from day to day, but the total trade done is disappointing. For no market abroad does demand come up to expectations, and there is nothing of interest to report with regard to any of them.

Raw Cotton.—There has been a weaker tendency, and quotations of both American and Egyptian are reduced. The very quiet state of trade in Manchester has resulted in a small "spot" demand in Liverpool. As is usual at this season, reports from the United States regarding the new crop have been rather conflicting, but those from Egypt continue to be good. Closing prices yesterday were as follows :—American Fully Middling, 18.01 ; Egyptian Fully Good Fair, 22.95.

COTTON-GROWING IN THE SUDAN.

The following extracts are taken from the report of the Central Economic Board of the Sudan Government dated April 2 :—

Blue Nile Province.—February : The cotton on the Kamlin farm has been most successful. Extra land was temporarily expropriated for this farm last summer to enable an improved system of rotation to be introduced. This year's cotton is all on the new land, and a yield of over 4 kantars of 315 rottles (unginned) is assured. The American cotton crop on gerf lands continues to do well. The prices paid have been large, American touching P.T. 585 and baladi P.T. 310 per kantar of 315 rottles (unginned) in Wad Medani.

Kassala Province.—March : Most of the Gash cotton damaged in February has put up a strong growth from the bottom, but it will be difficult to estimate the prospect of getting a crop off it before May. Kassala Market : 1,541 kantars of 315 rottles (unginned) of cotton have come in to the end of March, but the quality remains poor, as this includes the damaged area. Of this quantity only 17 kantars were first class and the bulk third and fourth class. It is noteworthy that about 4 kantars of American cotton were brought in from the Atbara, which was nearly all first class. Mekali : About 635 kantars have come in. Up to March 11 360 kantars had been received, of which 82 were first class. Hadaliya : Results have been favourable. Of 1,400 kantars received up to March 15 from the demonstration area, 728 were first class and 505 second class. The late sown cotton is, if anything, the best. 165 kantars were brought in from other shiotes, of which 51 were first class and 53 second class. Since the 15th about 952 kantars have been received. Total yield of Gash crop to end of March is approximately 4,670 kantars of 315 rotties seed-cotton, of which 2,952 was from the demonstration area. Rain-cotton : The total brought in to Gedaref and Mafaza is 620 kantars, and the latest price P.T. 346½ per kantar. Tokar : The cotton market opened on March 1, and good prices were obtainable at once. The prices have varied from £E7.450 m/ms. to £E8.253 m/ms. per kantar of 315 rottles (unginned) for first class cotton, with an average price of £E7.907 m/ms. Second class cotton varied from £E7.198 m/ms. to £E8.048 m/ms., with an average price of £E7.639 m/ms. The total purchase price realised was £E262,365.865 m/ms. Khor Arbaat Cotton : The first picking of this crop came on the market this month, and was sold in one lot of 147 kantars of 315 rottles on March 7, realising £E7.950 m/ms. per kantar. Picking is still proceeding, and there is every hope that it will go on for some time yet.

Berber Province.—March—Kitiab : 194 kantars of 315 rottles (unginned) of cotton were weighed into store during the month, making the total up to date 2,278 kantars, or 3.5 kantars per feddan. This is the highest yield per feddan yet reached on this station, the previous best being 3.3 in 1921/22. Last year the final yield was 2.4. A fair amount of cotton is still coming in, chiefly from Nuba and Hanek. Cotton received its last watering on the 29th. The percentage of first class cotton now being received is very small. Bouga : Cotton is again heavily in boll, and the prospect of a high yield is assured. The quantity brought in during the month was 333 kantars of 315 rottles; the total to end of March being 2,655 kantars. Gendettu : Area under cotton, 662 feddans. 105 kantars of 315 rottles (unginned) of cotton were weighed into store during the month, making the total up to end March 2,444 kantars, or 3.69 kantars per feddan. This compares favourably with last year's final yield of 2.68 kantars per feddan on an area of 617 feddans.

Dongola Province.—March—Nuri : Cotton has yielded well, the average to end of March being 3.86 kantars of 315 rottles per feddan. Total cotton received into store up to end of March was 2,748 kantars. Also 205 kantars of sagia cotton. Gureir : Cotton has given an average yield of 2.3 kantars per feddan. Total quantity weighed into store up to end of March was 737 kantars. Ghaba : Area under cotton, 450 feddans. 1,553 kantars of 315 rottles (unginned) of cotton have been received into store up to the end of the month. This represents a yield of 3.46 kantars per feddan. 27 kantars of sagia cotton were received during the month.

The Fung Province.—March : 64 tons of unginned cotton were exported by rail from Makwar river siding.

The Great Indian Peninsula Railway Co. recommends a dividend of 10s. per cent. for the year, making £2 for the half-year, less tax.

The annual Baku Fair was opened on Friday (says a Reuter message from Moscow dated May 25); 5,000 tons of goods are reported to have arrived, as compared with 500 tons last year. A considerable number of Persian and Turkish merchants are attending the Fair.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The Bucharest Explosion.

Official statements regarding the explosion of ammunition in Bucharest are, fortunately, more reassuring than the earlier Press reports. The arsenal, it is stated, has not seriously suffered, and its activity will be resumed within a few days. As for the exploded ammunition, it was old and was going to be put out of service. Bucharest, it is to be feared, had nevertheless an unpleasant experience. The damage to neighbouring buildings, including the Royal residence, Cotroceni Palace, where King Ferdinand was at the time, was great, but, happily, there was no serious loss of life. In the absence of definite confirmation, reports that the disaster was due to incendiarism must be received with reserve. The political situation in Roumania is unsettled; Government and Opposition are both preparing for a trial of strength; all nerves are somewhat highly strung, and it is inevitable that the worst interpretation should be placed at first on the incident, especially if it is the case that the Government at once enforced a strict censorship.

An Opposition Protest.

A later report from Roumania speaks of a monster demonstration against the Government, headed by General Averescu. It is to be hoped that bloodshed will be avoided, but the situation is likely to be critical if a large body of peasants march on Bucharest and attempts to restrain them by means of troops are made. General Averescu disclaims all intention of challenging the Government by force; he is mainly dissatisfied with the effect of the Government's financial policy on Roumania's foreign relations. There can be little doubt that representatives of the Opposition parties, including General Averescu himself, have been sounding foreign opinion with a view to substantiating their case against the Government. In the long run, however, it will be home opinion of the Government's domestic policy that will determine the complexion of a Roumanian Cabinet.

Mediterranean Rivalry.

The millennium has not yet started in the Mediterranean. As an offset to the announcement of the Greek naval programme, Turkey has decided to increase her fleet by six submarines. On the occasion of the Royal Italian visit last week Mr. Ramsay MacDonald received a number of Italian journalists at the Foreign Office. One of the subjects referred to is understood to have been Italian uneasiness over the presence of a large British naval force in the Mediterranean, and it has been necessary to point out to the Italians that this happens to be the only sea near Britain which is suitable for naval manœuvres on a large scale. Whether public opinion in Great Britain is likely to be much exercised over Italian fortification of the island of Leros may be doubted; in any case, if it were, the reason would not be that Great Britain had any ground for uneasiness, but that the conversion into a strong naval base of an island to which the Italian claim does not rest on any strong foundation is likely to be regarded in other quarters as a provocative act. The best solution of outstanding difficulties would be an Anglo-Italian naval agreement, which would reassure the countries which are inclined to take alarm at the naval activities, not of Britain but of Italy, that the fortification of Leros is dictated by a policy of pacific precaution rather than by aggressive designs.

The Political Struggle in Yugoslavia.

M. Pashitch's success over his political opponents has stirred the latter to great depths of indignation. When the Skupshtina met to receive the new Ministry the mandates of the remaining forty-seven members of the Croatian party were quickly ratified, and M. Pashitch found himself in a minority of fifty. Thereupon he read the Royal Decree terminating the session and proroguing Parliament until October 20. The Opposition denounce the proceeding as unconstitutional and bordering upon a coup d'état, in so far as the Crown has acted on the advice of a Minority Government and prorogued the Skupshtina against its own wishes. There are even threats that the Government will be brought to trial for its arbitrary acts. The Opposition, however, remains a heterogeneous collection of parties with little in common except their hostility to M. Pashitch, and it is unlikely that it will be able to accomplish much while Parliament is not sitting. Its best course, one would imagine, would be to spend the next four months in proving their case, if they can, to the satisfaction of the electorate.

Albania.

Reports from Belgrade and Italy represent the situation in Albania as critical. Information from the former source has not proved itself very reliable in the past, and is, therefore, always suspect in England at least. But there seems little doubt that fighting is taking place, although it may be premature to regard the country as already in the throes of civil war. Of the two movements, that in the north appears to be the more formidable. The insurgents are said to have occupied Skutari, and to be marching on Tirana; but the conflicting statements regarding their numbers suggest that a certain amount of guesswork enters into the information. In the meantime there has been a change of Government in Tirana, a new Cabinet having been formed, as foreshadowed in our last letter from Albania, by Elias Bey Vrioni. Whether the new Prime Minister will be more successful in dealing with the insurrection remains to be seen.

Egypt and the Negotiations.

The "difficulties" that are supposed to have arisen in the path of the negotiations between the Egyptian and British Governments are essentially of Egyptian origin, and are inclined to present a less formidable appearance as they come to be examined. The one that has loomed largest in the Egyptian Assembly is the British Government's Declaration of 1922; but gradually it is coming to be realised that the surest way of annulling the Declaration is to open negotiations between the two countries. Both the Assembly and Zaghloul Pasha, however, had decided that they wanted an ostentatious withdrawal of the offending document, in order that the present Egyptian Ministry could show how different was its attitude towards Great Britain from that of its predecessors. To protest against the Declaration at the time of its promulgation, and to deny Great Britain the right to reserve any subjects when declaring Egypt independent, was at least a logical course to adopt; but to maintain the protest two years later, when the subjects have been reserved all that time, is less intelligible, and must certainly be hard to justify through diplomatic channels. It is unfortunate that the Opposition in the Assembly should appear to set more store on embarrassing Zaghloul Pasha than on furthering the interests of Egypt which call for an early adjustment of all outstanding questions between Great Britain and the Egyptians.

TO READERS OF "THE NEAR EAST."

If you find any merit in "The Near East," if you hold with us that British interests in the Near and Middle East call for a Paper devoted exclusively to the affairs of that part of the world; if you consider it a worthy cause that Britain and the British should be sanely interpreted to the people of the East, and those people in their turn be made better known to Britons, support "The Near East" by becoming a subscriber yourself if you are not already, and by securing for us new subscribers. The Indian Services Report.

It is rather a striking fact that no one outside Whitehall will ever be able to criticise the Report of Lord Lee's Commission on the basis of an independent examination of the evidence. Nearly two-thirds of the witnesses appeared under a guarantee of secrecy; to publish the evidence of the remainder by itself would obviously be misleading, and we are forced, therefore, to start with the assumption that the Commissioners have attached due weight to the facts and opinions placed before them. In some cases such an assumption would be dangerous, but the practical unanimity attained by nine men approaching their task from widely varying standpoints appears to us to furnish an adequate guarantee on this point, and the right way to treat the report is to regard it as offering a safe middle course for the authorities to pursue. It will inevitably be criticised by partisans on both sides, while a large section of the Indian Press, having tried to discredit the Commission before it started work, can scarcely be expected to show any enthusiasm for the results; but we believe that the recommendations, taken as a whole, will be found adequate to the emergency, and we trust that the weight of middle opinion will be thrown decisively in their favour.

Recruitment in England.

Regarding the recruitment of Englishmen, the recommendations of the Commission aim at employing a smaller number and offering terms which will attract the number required. The changes proposed in conditions of service are so designed as to make a relatively small increase in expenditure go as far as possible. Salaries in general are not largely increased, but the provisions for passages to and from India, for home remittance at privileged rates, for medical attendance, and so on, strike us as just about sufficient to render tolerable a position which has become impossible, and, provided they are not whittled down in the course of application, they will justify parents in choosing an Indian career for young men of the required type, so far as material conditions are concerned. The question of atmosphere is, of course, independent of rules and schedules, nor can it be affected directly by any official action. The hope for the future, for India as well as for India's public servants, lies in the gradual improvement of India's Press and politicians. Parliament banked on that when it gave India a Constitution, and, while progress in this direction may appear to be exceedingly slow, we believe we are justified in the conclusion that the atmosphere to-day is better than it was two years ago.

The Passing of the Services.

Apart from terms of employment, the main interest of the Report is that it marks the beginning of the end for the great Services built up in the days when India was a Dependency and nothing more. If the recommendations of the Commission are accepted, the less important of these Services will be closed to future recruitment forthwith, and will thus die out as the existing members disappear, the various Provinces providing for successors to suit their tastes and their resources. The remaining four—Civil Service, Police, Irrigation, and (except for Bombay and Burma) Forests—will continue to be appointed and controlled from Whitehall, but only "for the present," and the frequent repetition of this or some similar phrase indicates that the Commission recognises their ultimate elimination to be inevitable. We are not disposed to quarrel with this conclusion, which has, in fact, been suggested in these columns. The practical question is now one of times and seasons, and, though some Indian politicians would prefer a clean cut once for all, we think they will be well advised to accept the very substantial instalment which is now offered and see how it works out before asking for more.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Tuesday Morning.

"The House of Pretence."

It was some years ago, and not of a Socialist Government, that the Daily Herald applied to the House of Commons the term "House of Pretence." There was aptness in the remark then, and there is aptness in reviving it now. Last week, particularly, there was in Parliament a heavy atmosphere of unreality. The Conservatives, knowing that they would fail, had tabled a resolution to reduce the salary of the Minister of Labour, but, as everybody except the deliberately ignorant newspapers had foreseen, the Liberals rallied to the Government's side, and it was in anticipation of this rallying that the Prime Minister could threaten the Opposition with an appeal to the electorate. (It was said, indeed, that the Conservatives were anxious lest the Liberals should not prevent them from defeating the Government.)

We had been told in the Press that this division which the Conservatives were managing meant a crisis to the Government, but, in common for once with the politicians, we did not believe it. The Liberals obviously do not relish the idea of an early election, and so long as they prefer the patient policy of Mr. Asquith to the more fighting, though possibly less sapient, policy of Mr. Lloyd George, we may expect to hear in the House little but the clanging of rusty armour on the part of the Conservatives and the mechanical sharpening of blades by the Government.

Politics, however, are but of secondary interest when there are the Derby and the Cricket Championship to talk about, and one hears only rarely the Government spoken of in terms either of enthusiasm or of indignation.

The Season.

The London season is now at its height, the climax being heralded by the visit to England of the King and Queen of Italy. Everywhere gaiety abounded, and really one was rather proud of the colour which dingy old London took on in their honour.

To-morrow many hopes will be dashed to the ground at the Derby, which race is the openest that has been held for years. At the moment, however, it looks somewhat as if the festive season is to be considerably damped by the perfectly horrid weather. The papers have given up Germany and Russia as the source of all bad weather: the place now being execrated is the Bay of Biscay. And of the two, the East really seems preferable.

Agriculture.

Dismal reading is provided in the report of the Agricultural Tribunal, for it states beyond all idea of controversy that the countryside is being steadily depopulated. It is not only sentiment that makes one hope that some party will take up in earnest this question of agriculture before it becomes a too expensive matter to remedy. Seemingly it must be the State that will guarantee the farmers stability, and it is not easy for the layman, seeing that tariffs have been rejected, to see how the country is to be saved. The Liberals have no remedy beyond advising the farmers to imitate Belgium or Denmark, or some helpless counsel of that sort; the solution of the Conservatives was rejected at the last election; and only the Labour Party remains. At present there seems to be little hope from that quarter, but one imagines that this Government would have a better chance of going down to history as benefactors to the country through an enlightened agricultural policy than by any of their more advertised routes.

The South Africans.

In some quarters it is possible to hear the South Africans dismissed as a second-rate team, but, to judge from observation of their game at Lord's last week against the M.C.C., such pooh-poohing would seem to be at least a little premature. They have, at any rate, one world batsman, Mr. H. W. Taylor. He pleased everyone by the perfect fluency of his orthodoxy, and it is quite certain that our Test bowlers will find him a very difficult nut to crack.

On days without much sunshine the South African fielding is ragged, not comparable in any way to that of Mr. Armstrong's famous team, but in Mr. Pegler they have a bowler surely as hard to play as any we can boast. If it should so happen that a few weeks of really hot weather befall us, the South Africans will be a team by no means to be despised.

It is an additional trouble to the Selection Committee of the England eleven that they have to look through the South Africans to the Australians next year.

That Death Ray.

The fuss that was made over Mr. Grindell-Matthews' "Death Ray" was, as was generally suspected, mostly paper fuss. One did not like the way in which it was tried to hustle the Air Ministry, who acted with no more circumspection than the affair demanded. It is impossible to resist the conclusion that the Ministry have not missed a real opportunity, and that we are, at any rate, as safe as ever we were.

Correct English.

From time to time we are reminded, generally by Scotsmen, Irishmen, or Welshmen, of the slipshod, careless, incorrect way in which we speak what we used to think, until the possession of it was taken over by our Northern and Western neighbours, was our mother tongue. And now Mr. Bernard Shaw, not content with corrupting our economics, comes along from Ireland to tell us that Mr. Ramsay MacDonald speaks correct English, and that if we wish for salvation we had better start at once to imitate him. I do not know whether Mr. Shaw means, when he so engagingly damns us all, that we speak incorrect English or merely pronounce wrongly. But if the latter, then one had better tell him that our Premier gets out of the word "criticise" something like "criticaise," and that he makes of "don't" "donnt."

The truth is, of course, that we do speak very badly, and that we have always done so. The athleticism in speech for which Mr. Shaw pleads becomes in modern estimation affectation; and it is possibly just that consciousness that he is speaking what he has been brought up to believe is the correct pronunciation of the language used in the greatest of the British Isles, that makes the claim of the Scotsman and the Irishman to be listened to with the utmost respect fall a little flat in the South Country.

It is all a question of fashion, this matter of speech. Possibly really correct pronunciation varies but little from generation to generation, but common usage undoubtedly varies a good deal. Whether a man will adopt the ruling fashions or depend alone upon his ear is a question that depends for answer on the worth and individuality of the man.

Art Exhibitions.

The picture galleries in London are at their busiest just now, and one is enabled to gain a fair idea of what English art is doing at the moment. If one were to judge from the Exhibition of "Pastoral" Water-colours at Walker's Galleries, New Bond Street, or from the Exhibition of the Society of Twenty-five Painters at the Fine Art Society's Galleries, New Bond Street, one would say that the eternal pleasant paths of English traditional painting are still being dutifully trod. Nearly all things in these two exhibitions please the fancy, but they seldom strike the imagination.

One is struck hard, on the other hand, at the New English Art Society's show at their galleries in Pall Mall East. Here, besides much good and sometimes exciting work by the older people, such as Rothenstein, Holmes, Steer, and so on, there is not a little pretentious, precious, and patently insincere work. The paintings of minor artists who are sufficiently skilful to indulge in patterned blasphemies are present in undue number, but at least it is possible easily to separate the tares from the wheat.

Sport and Old Age.

The sporting world has been greatly intrigued during the past week with a book written by Mr. A. C. Maclaren on the decline of the present-day cricketer, and by the appearance of Mr. Storey, the twenty-three-year-old golfer, in the Golf Final. Mr. Maclaren, who, from the point of view of the youthful cricketer, is an old man, lays about him very gustily on such things as the two-eyed stance, the modern inability to cut and to drive, and so on. But it is possible to confuse the eternal principles of cricket, which Mr. Maclaren knows, of course, as well as anyone living, with an idea that they should be always applied. The modern cricketer takes up the attitude, forced on him by the increased craftiness of the bowlers, that the eternal is not and should not be the invariable. In other words, that the two-eyed stance is almost imperative when facing googly bowlers. But, from the spectator's point of view, the old England captain, who understands the googly, is much more right than wrong.

And of Mr. Storey, although he was beaten, after a very gallant fight, by Mr. Holderness in the Golf Final, it is sufficient to say that he is holding high the torch of youth, which Mr. Tolley and Mr. Wethered began defiantly to brandish a year or two ago.

The Empire Exhibition.

I cannot write much about this great Exhibition, because I have visited Wembley as yet for only a few hours. But I cannot help expressing my delight and surprise at the artistry of the whole thing. That there is a certain amount of incongruity must, of course, be taken for granted, but, apart from this, it is really a refreshing experience to survey and to enter the different pavilions. And the thousands of tulips in the gardens look very beautiful.

One was rather prepared for something a little vulgar, with jostling, garish crowds, intent for the most part on amusement, but one also found a very certain dignity and the proprieties of the situation well observed. ALTER EGO.

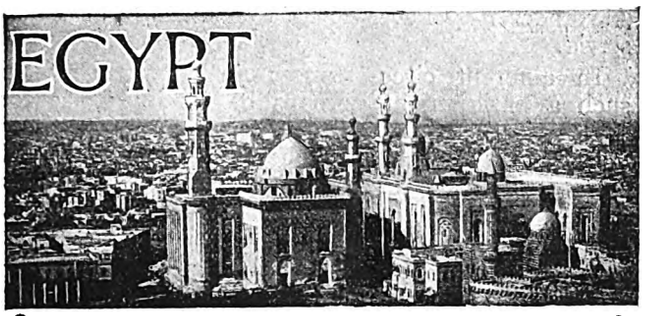
From Our Own Correspondents.



Cairo, May 25.

A Week of Scandals.

The past week has brought forth a succession of revelations of human weakness in high, or comparatively high, places. "Prince" Said Halim (like most Nabils, he has retained, for unofficial purposes, the senior royal rank) has been deprived of his title for scandalous conduct; while Mohammed Aboul Futouh Pasha has been referred to a Council of Discipline, charged with having used his position as Under-Secretary of State in the Ministry of Agriculture to defraud the Government, in connection with a land transaction, of £E37,000. Rather lower down the scale come two inspectors of examination results, both sheikhs, who are alleged to have given pass marks to two sons of Cabinet Ministers whose papers, had they been judged without bias, would have been awarded nothing like the requisite 50 per cent. Besides these major scandals, there have been a number of minor frauds, embezzlements, allegations of improper pressure in electoral matters, and so on, which have entailed dismissal or trial by disciplinary courts. All these dreadful doings have one feature in common: the culprits are invariably supporters of the Liberal Constitutional Party. Here in Egypt it is understood that the Liberal Constitutionals are the fathers of all evil, and that it is only right for the Zaghloulists, now they are in power, to mete out punishment to the wrongdoers. Later, when the pendulum swings back, the Zaghloulist whips of to-day may fade into significance when compared with the Liberal Constitutional scorpions which will be brought into play.

By-Elections.

There is a miniature General Election now in course of preparation, for, as a result of recent promotions, unseatings, deaths, and other causes, some eight or nine seats are vacant. The most important contests will be at Beba (Assiut), where Mohammed Pasha Mahmoud will try to regain the constituency from which he was ejected on petition, and Abdin (Cairo), where a lively campaign is in process between two interesting candidates. The Wafd selection is Abdel Rahman Bey Fahmy, of Vengeance Society notoriety, and his opponent is Hafez Bey Ramadan, leader of the Nationalist Party, who is lending colour to the contest with his speeches. Here is a sample reported last week: "Say to them (the Zaghloulists), 'If you are human beings, we will teach you patriotic songs, and by the methods of the best masters. But if you are Satans and devils, get you hence.' Cry as long as you like, 'Down with the Sudan!' Demand that the Nile shall dry up and that Egypt, this luxuriant Eden, shall be an arid and inhospitable desert, uninhabitable for human beings, but fit refuge for the imps of hell whom you resemble, and for your brothers, the devils!"

Discontent at Al Azhar.

The Government has contrived to get itself into disfavour with a section of its former supporters whom it can ill-afford to offend. These are the students of Al Azhar, who are dissatisfied with recent reforms giving the graduates of the School of Kadis an equal footing with those of Al Azhar where appointments in the Mohammedan Law Courts are concerned. The Azharists claim that, from time immemorial, they enjoyed preference, and the Ministry of Education has now appointed a committee to reconcile the claims of the two theological institutions.

More Departures.

Every week one sees depart a further batch of British officials or residents who, if they come back to Egypt, will come only as tourists. Among those who have just gone or are about to go are Mr. W. S. Nisbet, Secretary-General and for a year acting Under-Secretary of State in the Ministry of Communications; Mr. F. M. Maxwell, the barrister, who during the past few years has handled most of the important prosecutions before the military courts and several big cases in the Mixed Courts; and Mr. B. St. G. Verschoyle, the recently retired General Manager of the Egyptian State Railways; while from another section of Cairo life there has gone Major H. F. C. Hobbs, A.A.G. of the Egyptian Army, and one of the best A.D.C.s that the present High Commissioner ever had, who has completed his period of service in this country, and now goes to rejoin his regiment, the West Yorkshires. In nothing is the change so rapidly taking place in this country more remarkable than the way in which it is making those of us of comparatively short residence begin to feel like old inhabitants.

YUGOSLAVIA.

Liubliana, May 28.

The Victory of M. Pashitch.

The Yugoslav Parliament has been prorogued until October 20, and herewith the long-drawn-out struggle between M. Davidovitch as leader of the Opposition, and M. Pashitch as leader of the Radical Party, has ended in a victory for the latter.

But, however undeniable the fact of this victory, M. Pashitch's triumph is by no means complete, since he has failed in his principal object, which was to obtain the mandate to form an Election Government. The verification of the Raditch mandates which he had to put through at the instance of the Crown has been another bitter pill. By this step the former numerical proportions in the Skupshtina have been altogether upset, and the Pashitch-Pribitchevitch Government can scarcely hope to command a majority. Owing to the equivocal and vacillating attitude of the Turks and Germans, it is unfortunately not possible to fix the numerical proportion between the Government and Opposition at all accurately. This much is certain, however. The Opposition, under M. Davidovitch, can muster 63 deputies of the Raditch Party, plus 33 of his own group, plus 24 Slovene Clericals, plus 18 Bosnian Moslems—total 138 deputies; whereas the Government can safely count upon 128. Should the Turks with their 14 deputies and the Germans with their 8 make up their minds to side with the Government—and, according to the latest reports, this seems probable—the numerical superiority of the Government over the Opposition would be placed beyond a doubt. The Zemljoradnici (Agrarians) with their 11 deputies cannot be included with either of the big leading groups, as they adhere strictly to the peasant-class standpoint. At the same time it may be safely assumed that they will vote against the present Government just as much as against an eventual Davidovitch Government. As regards their State constitutional attitude, they certainly stand nearer to the advocates of the Vidovdan Constitution than to the Autonomist, Federal, or Revisionist parties.

Yet another circumstance must be taken into account. All M. Davidovitch's deputies were elected with the Vidovdan Constitution as a plank in their platform, and it is not inconceivable that there will be still further secessions from the present Democratic Club. It is even being predicted that M. Timotivevitch will leave the Opposition bloc with his followers.

This is all the more intelligible, as M. Raditch constantly renders co-operation with himself very difficult for the Democrats by his egregious statements abroad. It was, after all, due in the main to M. Raditch's statements that the Davidovitch Government became an impossibility. And the most remarkable thing about it is that these statements invariably appeared at the very moment when they were of the greatest advantage to the Government, and beyond all things inconvenient to the Opposition!

The Prorogation.

Of course, the Opposition bloc is highly indignant over the prorogation of the Skupshtina. But not quite justly so. Its majority is still problematical, and its government programme altogether nebulous. Thus the Raditch deputies—by far the strongest group in the Opposition bloc—say that their standpoint is quite strictly republican, but that King Alexander may nevertheless remain King of Yugoslavia.

In different circumstances an arrangement on such a basis might perhaps be feasible; but for Yugoslavia as she is to-day a solution on these lines would be absurd. The State is young, and precisely because of the divergencies of tradition some strong authority is absolutely indispensable. Such authority can, however, be vested only in the King. There is not a single personality in all Yugoslavia to-day capable of filling—successfully filling—the office of a President of the Republic. Yugoslavia possesses no Masaryk, and even a Masaryk would have had a chance of popular election only in the ecstasies of liberation of the year 1918.

A General Election.

There is something humorous about the fact that the two strongest parties, the Radicals and the Raditch Party, should both have demanded an immediate General Election. This desire has been frustrated, and, on the whole, it is good that it has been so. For a General Election at this juncture would only give a fresh impulse to racial agitation, and the consolidation of the State would suffer in proportion. Up, Serbs! Up, Croats! would have been the battle-cry, and since the nation is still backward in its political development, we should probably see the electoral campaign degenerating into a perfect orgy of demagogy.

It is, therefore, greatly to the credit of the King that he adhered firmly to the golden mean. Elections are not to take place until differences have been smoothed over a little and practical problems call for the decision of the electorate.

There is yet another good reason for this putting off of the General Election. The interval until October 20 will give the Opposition bloc time to earn the confidence of the Crown. Seeing that all the Raditch mandates have been verified, there is nothing to prevent the bloc from taking office after that date, provided, of course, that there is an end to M. Raditch's seditious statements, and that the Opposition bloc gives convincing proof that its government will be advantageous to the State and the principle of unity.

Unfortunately, one feels pessimistic in regard to this outlook. To judge by the progress of events hitherto, all parties are preparing for an election, and therefore merely intensifying the intransigence, instead of bridling it. But, no matter how the decision may fall, one thing is sure even to-day. Yugoslavia needs time and quiet, much quiet, in order to develop, and as by the prorogation of the Skupshtina she is assured of quiet for at least a few months, the consolidation of the State will progress in the meantime. If there was ever a country which ought to adopt for its motto the words, "Less politics and more work!" that country is Yugoslavia.

Constantinople, May 27.

The Mosul Deadlock.

The British and Turkish delegations for the Mosul negotiations have got down to their work in earnest, but one is not allowed to know much of what is going on. The local Press comments are striking in their unanimity, not only in reporting facts, but also in the spirit and content of their comments and criticisms. Hence it must be assumed that they are being spoon-fed by the official Press agency. The gist of the information published since the important sittings when both sides stated their case is that the two points of view are completely irreconcilable. That this very uncompromising statement has not yet been followed up by the formal abandonment of the conference suggests that on one side at least a desire prevails to seek a solution other than the reference to the League of Nations.

Resignation of Ferid Bey.

The outstanding event in Turkey's domestic affairs has been the resignation of the Minister of the Interior, Ferid Bey, presumably on account of the Press campaign against him, and his replacement by Rejeb Bey, Deputy for Kutayieh. The importance of the event lies not so much in the retirement of Ferid as in the fact that Ismet Pasha has been forced, or has thought it good, to recede from the position he took up two months ago, when he obstinately refused to sacrifice any one of his colleagues at the instance of popular or Assembly clamour. People are now asking whether his yielding in the case of Ferid is a form of insurance premium, or whether it is the beginning of the end of the present Government. The answer to the riddle will doubtless depend upon the developments in Turkey's foreign relations, which have again become the main obsession, to the exclusion of the domestic problems.

Jerusalem, May 24.

The Arab Congress.

Palestine has been enjoying an exceptionally long spell without noteworthy political incidents. The "All-British" Advisory Council, set up some six months ago, has proved, at least for the time being, to be the best way out of the maze of party discontents. It appears to have carried out its functions without a hitch, and with no very noticeable outside criticism. But this spell of political quiet is soon to be interrupted. The "Arab Executive" is convening a "Seventh Palestinian Arab Congress," to meet in Jerusalem on June 15 and following days. One naturally asks why? It is just a year since we had the "Sixth Congress," whose resolutions were as ineffective as they were high-sounding. For the Congress of a year ago there was some justifiable reason: the "Mixed" Advisory Council and the Anglo-Arab Treaty were then burning questions, and seemed at the time vitally to affect Palestinian Arabdom. But those questions have fallen far into the background, and as for newer matters, the Hussein Khalifate is, so far as the local Arabs are concerned, a fait accompli; while touching the present Palestinian currency question, the leading Arab dissentients were last week invited to meet the Chief Secretary and the Treasurer of Palestine, and are understood, finally, to have agreed to the soundness of the Government's financial intentions. Doubtless, in the course of a few days, a long agenda of business will be issued, but for the moment one is puzzled to know what are the main problems and grievances to be laid before the coming Congress.

Actually (as El-Falastin, the more or less official organ of the Arab Executive, recently admitted) the prime motive for summoning the Congress is to whip up the flagging energies of the Palestine Arab Movement. El-Falastin writes:—"Many of the Arab leaders regard the Arab Movement as at its last gasp or even completely dead, owing to the suspicions and doubts cast on its leaders. . . . The people put their faith in the Arab Executive and the Christian-Moslem Association, and placed their fate in the hands of these bodies. But the Association has taken its duties too lightly, and not fulfilled its functions." The reasons for the stagnation in the movement are, the paper maintains, the dissensions in the Arab camp: "We hope that the members of the coming Congress will make possible a general Congress comprising all men of thought and reason in Palestine, no matter what may be their individual politics, and so secure a real Arab representation."

"El Falastin."

The same paper thus comments on the Palestine Pavilion at Wembley: "Most of the rooms are given up to the Jews, apart from three of four places allotted to Arab manufactures, the Pro-Jerusalem Society, and the Government. All the rest goes to the Jews, the Rutenberg Scheme, and so forth. We think the Arab Executive ought to announce publicly in the London Press that the Arab inhabitants of Palestine have not shared in this Exhibition, because they knew that they stood to gain nothing by it, since the Palestine Pavilion was simply a piece of Zionistic propaganda, and because the right of sharing in this Exhibition belonged only to the British Colonies, and Palestine should not be regarded as a British Colony."

El-Falastin has recently been running a series of articles describing the economic depths into which Palestine is plunged owing to alleged misgovernment. In conclusion, it propounds the methods by which prosperity can unfailingly be secured. These are the suggestions put forward in all seriousness: "The immediate transference of Government from the present administration into the hands of some expert in finance and commerce; the creation, at the earliest possible moment, of a Palestine Parliament, made up of the most important people possessed of wide knowledge of commerce and finance—people who belong to neighbouring States, but who are of Palestinian birth or descent; an increase in Government offices of the number of native officials, who shall have a share in the political administration; immediate publication of an order that all the inhabitants of Palestine shall deal only with Palestinian merchants; abolition of additional customs duties; reduction of the police and gendarmerie; reduction of postal and telephone rates; the building of ports; the appointment of a native official in the Railways Administration to supervise expenditure and share in the control; compulsory military service; and compulsory education." Unfortunately the writer has not sketched out an annual Budget to show how all this is to be done.

IRAK.

Baghdad, May 15.

Outbreak Among Assyrian Levies.

At a time when the political situation in Baghdad is causing much anxiety, when some of the tribes in the Afag area are out of hand, having attacked the police force and killed four, including the very capable commandant, and when the delicate negotiations for the final settlement of the Assyrian question are in progress, comes news of a serious nature from Kirkuk. As a result, it is said, of a quarrel between a shopkeeper and two of the number, two companies of the Assyrian Levies (troops enlisted locally and serving under the British Government) ran amok, killing some fifty townspeople and wounding as many more. As soon as the officers had got their men under control they marched them out of the town into the desert, where, out of temptation's way, the outbreak of fanaticism might be given a chance to subside. But this gave the Kirkuklis an opportunity of revenging themselves upon their Christian neighbours, and to the already high casualty list were added a further ten or more.

The authorities acted with commendable promptitude: armoured cars were at once despatched to Kirkuk, and aeroplanes conveyed British troops and machine guns to the scene of action within a few hours of the outbreak. Only one hitch occurred in the otherwise admirable arrangements—the aeroplane carrying most of the officers refused to start, with the result that they did not arrive until the following day. In spite of this minor contretemps, the situation was rapidly restored to normal.

While this unhappy affair cannot but be deplored, it must be remembered that the savage fury of the Assyrians is attributable, not so much to a petty squabble about prices, as to the memory of the massacres in which, during the War, thousands of their kindred lost their lives at the hands of Muslims. Their sufferings at that time are too recent to have been forgotten, and a small gust is sufficient to fan into flame the smouldering hate between Muslim and Christian.

The High Commissioner at once flew to Kirkuk on receiving news of this affair, and assured the inhabitants that a full and immediate inquiry should be held, and the ringleaders punished. The Irak Government, appreciating these measures, does not seem likely to make capital of an incident as unpremeditated as it was unexpected.

The Anglo-Irak Treaty.

For fifty days the leading personalities of Irak have been assembled in the capital, and in that space of time have not reached a single decision on even the first of the three matters for the discussion of which the Constituent Assembly was called together—namely, the Anglo-Irak Treaty. The deputies, like other Orientals, unwilling to make up their minds, complacently accept the delays and postponements engineered by those of their number who still hope by procrastination to bring about the fall of the present Cabinet. A further incentive to delay is the fear of the Press—a fear hardly to be credited by anyone not living in this country. Though the mass of the people favour the Treaty, a small minority would not welcome its ratification, and it is this minority which controls most of the vernacular newspapers, the pungent comments of which so terrify the average official or deputy. Some of the newspapers—the more virulent—have already been closed down by the Government, while others have moderated their tone in order to ensure continued publication. Perhaps, however, the procrastinations of the Assembly are not without method. Its members know well that the political attention of the fickle Baghdadi is not long focused on one subject, and when once this attention has been diverted they may hope to ratify the Treaty without bringing to bear upon themselves all the batteries of the local Press.

At the time of posting comes news that the discussion of the Treaty is again postponed until next week.

PERSIA.

Teheran, May 12.

The Republican Failure.

The past two or three weeks have been practically devoid of political interest, and after two months of excitement and uncertainty, during which it appeared that the country was rapidly turning Republican, things are back again just where they started; the short-lived Republican movement has completely fizzled out, and one hardly ever now hears the word "Jomhooree" (Republic), which a short while ago was on everyone's lips. Whether the question of a change in the Government of the country has been definitely abandoned or merely temporarily shelved, to be revived at a later date, is a matter of conjecture. The movement was conducted with too much haste to permit of success in slow-changing Persia, which still remains part of that East which it is difficult to hustle. The Republicans in Hamadan, Kermanshah and Sultanabad were very reluctant to throw up the sponge, and resorted to obstructive measures in a last futile effort to carry out their aims, which was, however, foredoomed to failure. They occupied the Post and Telegraph Offices, and closed other Government administrations, thus producing a general strike, which practically paralysed trade and business. For a day or two all postal and telegraphic communication was interrupted, and a censorship was instituted. At the Mesopotamian frontier, at Kasr-i-Shirin, the military, who appear to have actively aided the Republicans throughout, seized the Customs House and prevented for a week or two the import of all goods into Persia. This farcical state of affairs could not, however, last, and was soon abandoned, and the Republican movement is now only a memory. It is significant to note, in this connection, that a "Salaam" (reception) was held, as usual, by the Crown Prince last Tuesday, on the occasion of the Eed-i-Fitr, the religious holiday to celebrate the close of the month of fasting, Ramadan. As I mentioned at the time, no Salaam was held at Norooz, the Persian New Year, for the first time for countless years, and the Shah's birthday last month, which has always been the occasion of a big public reception by His Majesty or the Regent, was this year totally ignored.

them, however, recently accomplished a non-stop flight from Bushire to Ispahan in four hours, this being the first flight over this stretch of country, which probably accounts for the difficulties encountered by the French pilots, who are naturally unacquainted with the atmospheric conditions prevailing. Besides these, the Government has been purchasing planes in Russia and Germany, and two of the former landed in Teheran this morning, having flown from Enzeli via Kazvin, but I have not yet had an opportunity of examining them, the aerodrome being some distance out of town.

The Army Commanders.

All the army commanders in the provinces were recently summoned to Teheran to attend a conference at the War Ministry, the object of which has not been disclosed. The attitude adopted by the chiefs of the different armies after the Prime Minister's resignation and departure from Teheran a short time ago had a great deal to do with the speedy settlement of the crisis by the Parliament. They all wired to the Mejliss demanding the continuance in office of the Prime Minister and Commander-in-Chief, threatening independent action in his interests should satisfaction not be given, and it was understood at the time that they were ready to march on Teheran with the forces under their command, if necessary, to enforce their demands. The commanders are returning to their posts.

THE BOMBAY DINNER.

A Bombay dinner—the first, it is hoped, of a series of annual Bombay dinners—was held at the Hotel Cecil on May 30. In the absence of Lord Willingdon, who was prevented from being present by the sudden death of his mother, the Hon. Mabel Freeman-Thomas, Sir Charles Armstrong presided over a company numbering 170. The committee responsible for the organisation of the dinner included the following :—Sir Charles Armstrong, Sir T. J. Bennett, Mr. W. T. Coulton, Colonel S. G. Evans, Mr. W. A. Haig Brown, Sir John Heaton, Sir Malcolm Hogg, Viscount Inchcape, Mr. M. R. Jardine, Sir George Lloyd, Colonel C. F. T. Murray, Colonel R. Owen, Sir Stanley Reed, Mr. J. H. Robinson, Sir Montagu Cornish Turner, and Mr. O. C. B. Wimbush. Mr. W. A. Haig Brown acted as Honorary Secretary. After the toast of "The King Emperor," Sir Charles Armstrong proposed the toast of "The Presidency of Bombay," to which Sir George Lloyd, the late Governor, replied. Sir Dadibha Dalal, High Commissioner for India, also spoke, and the health of the "The Chairman" was proposed by Sir Malcolm Hogg. Among others present were :— Lord Lamington, Sir Stanley Batchelor, General L. N. Beatty, Sir James Begbie, Sir Thomas Birkett, Colonel J. Crimmin, V.C., Sir J. G. Cumming, Mr. M. M. S. Gubbay, Sir Robert Highet, Sir Claude Hill, Mr. D'Arcy Lindsay, M.L.A., Sir G. Lowndes, Admiral Lumsden, Sir E. Maconachie, Sir J. L. Maffey, Mr. J. S. Wardlaw Milne, M.P., Sir Campbell Rhodes, Colonel Sir B. Scott, Sir W. D. Sheppard, Sir Aurel Stein, Sir Thomas Strangman, and General Sir J. Willcocks.

In a written reply to Sir Philip Richardson, who asked whether, in view of the greatly increased cost of steamship travel, officers serving in India might be granted free passages home for themselves and their families upon their retirement, the Under-Secretary of State for India says :— "Concessions to officers of the Indian Service in regard to such passages will naturally come up for consideration in connection with the impending revision of conditions of service in India."

INDIAN POLITICS.

"INDIAN POLITICS." By J. T. Gwynn. (London: Nisbet. 12s. 6d.)

This volume contains, apparently with only slight modifications, the survey of Indian politics in 1922 which Mr. Gwynn contributed to the Manchester Guardian. Its value to the student in 1924 is accurately defined in the short introduction furnished by Lord Meston as providing material from which "each of us will find some assistance in forming his own judgment" on the present complex situation. The book is well written and extremely interesting. it gives us much insight into the views of most of the politically important classes, and Mr. Gwynn has succeeded to some extent in coping with the great difficulty of getting at the minds of "the little people" whose languages he does not know. The main drawbacks to its use to-day arise first from a certain lack of proportion, and secondly from a perspective which is inevitably somewhat unsatisfactory. As to the first point, fully one-third of the book is devoted to Bombay, which, when heads are counted, represents about five per cent. of India, while Madras is only mentioned incidentally; yet Madras is more than twice as large as Bombay, and knows at any rate twice as much about politics. Again, we have a full account of opinion in the town of Broach, which is tolerably vocal, but we look in vain for any reference to Benares, which creates opinion, but does not talk to strangers about its creation. Such unevenness of treatment might have been avoided, but the defect in perspective is almost inevitable in the conditions under which the special correspondent works. He is bound to present a view of things as they stand at the moment of his visit, but for serious students such a presentation of the static position requires to be supplemented by an estimate of direction and of speed, a task for which the correspondent is as a rule inadequately equipped. In the case before us, Mr. Gwynn enables us to grasp very clearly a large volume of opinion, which is based, to a quite exceptional extent, on ignorance or misrepresentation of facts. We may recognise the justice of his inferences as to whither that opinion leads, but what we chiefly want to know is how far, and how quickly, that opinion is changing, or, in other words, to what extent an approximation to truth is in progress. Mr. Gwynn found India full of poison-gas, some of it the result of accidental explosions, some of it produced deliberately and malignantly: the vital question is whether the atmosphere is getting purer or fouler, and its determination requires methods of a somewhat different kind from those which he employs in this book. To say so much is not, however, to condemn his work. If the points we have indicated are borne in mind when reading it, it will be found not only interesting in itself, but a contribution of real value to the discussion on the future of India, a future which now seems to depend largely on the ability of Indians to learn from their own mistakes.

INDIAN DRAMA AND SOME POEMS.

"TALES FROM THE INDIAN DRAMA." By C. A. Kincaid. (Humphrey Milford: Oxford University Press. 1s. net.)

"VASAVADATTA." Being a translation of an anonymous Sanskrit drama, "Svapanavasavadatta," attributed to Bhasa, by V. S. Sukthankar. (Humphrey Milford. Oxford University Press. 6s. net.)

"VAISHNAVA LYRICS." Done into English Verse by Surendranath Kumar, Nendalal Datta, and John Alexander Chapman. (Humphrey Milford: Oxford University Press. 5s. 6d. net.).

Mr. Kincaid has expressed his love for the Indian Drama of the heroic period in a little book where he gives summaries of the stories of the two great dramas of Kalidasa, "Sakuntala" and "Vikramorvasya," of his beautiful poem "Meghaduta," and of three other dramas. These outlines do give an impression of the ideas and the atmosphere to be found in the plays. Also, they would be a help in following the plot, thus making it possible for a reader to appreciate the beauty of any of the dramas without being troubled by its intricacies.

"Vasavadatta" is a translation of an early Sanskrit drama, which was not long since discovered, and which has been attributed to the playwright Bhasa. It deals with the legend of Udayana and Vasavadatta, and sets forth the ideal of the spirit of sacrifice of the Indian woman. Vasavadatta's utter self-effacement and sweetness are expressed amongst the scented flowers of the Forest Hermitage, where most of the action takes place, and we are soothed by a vision of the simple dignified calm of an ancient civilisation.

The translations of a few of the Vaishnava lyrics were, as we are told by Mr. Chapman in the Preface, turned to English rhyme by lines from the prose translation of his two Bengali colleagues. They do not show any great gift for poetical expression, but they do show a sensitiveness for the delicate beauty of the originals. The translator of these poems of the love of Radha and Krishna is so carried away by his admiration for their spirit and form that he succeeds in conveying their charm to us.

AN ARMENIAN ARTIST.

On May 29, at 9, St. Paul's Studios, Baron's Court, H.E. the Persian Minister in London declared open an exhibition of paintings by Sarkis Katchadourian. In this declaration H.E. Hovanes Khan Massehian, the renowned Oriental translator of Shakespeare, and Professor A. Raffi joined, the former pointing out the essential Oriental (Armenian) nature of Katchadourian's art, the latter explaining that the holding of this exhibition was in large measure due to Mr. Brangwyn.

It is easy to understand how Mr. Brangwyn was attracted by Katchadourian's work, for the two artists have patent affinities. The most notable characteristic that they share is perhaps a high, exulting delight in colour. Katchadourian's colours, indeed, especially in his oils, are a wonder to behold; they are bright but never gaudy, keenly contrasted, but always convincing. For the most part he has chosen subjects either from his native land or race, and without question he has seen deeply into both the physical and the psychological aspect of Armenia. He is alive equally to its joys and its sorrows, its possessions and its losses. The plight of its recent refugees has made a profound impression on his mind—an impression of which he is able to awake an echo in his spectators' hearts. Although his outlook is severely national, the appeal that his genius (which is not too strong a word) makes must be international.

Between so many pictures, oils, gouaches, and water-colours it is difficult to choose, but of his oils one cannot forbear mentioning the beauty of his "The Monastery of Sanahine," "The Village Oshakan," and "The Fountain of the Princes"; of his gouaches, "Armenian Orphans" and "The Mount Aragadz"; and of his water-colours, "The Mount Ararat."

This is an intensely interesting exhibition, not only for those intimately acquainted with the lands and types which Katchadourian depicts, but also for those who believe that the art of the future will come about from the blending or fusing of Occidental and Oriental art. Katchadourian is a most gifted artist, who, although he has studied, and to excellent purpose, Western methods, yet has remained essentially Oriental. Whether he will return to his own Armenia or seek newer paths farther West cannot yet be said, but in any case his achievement already is considerable.

IRAK AND THE TREATY.

As a result of the dilatory tactics adopted by the Constituent Assembly in Irak towards the ratification of the Treaty with Great Britain, which was signed by King Faisal in October, 1922, the British Government has found itself obliged to communicate the Treaty and the subsidiary documents to the League of Nations before ratification has actually taken place. In an official statement issued last week it was announced that the League had been asked "that Irak may be placed on the agenda of the June meeting of the Council." The statement continued:—"If, as is hoped, the Constituent Assembly accept them (the Treaty and subsidiary agreements) His Majesty's Government intend, after obtaining the assent of the British Parliament, to invite the Council of the League to adopt the documents now submitted as defining His Majesty's Government's obligations in respect of Irak. If, however, the Constituent Assembly have not accepted the Treaty and subsidiary agreements before the next meeting of the Council, His Majesty's Government may have no option but to obtain the authority of the Council for some alternative arrangement for carrying out in Irak the provisions of Article 22 of the Covenant." The significance of this statement, it is to be hoped, will not be lost on the Irakis. Great Britain has obligations not only towards Irak, but also vis-à-vis the League of Nations, and there is no reason why the dilatoriness of the Constituent Assembly of Irak should prevent her indefinitely from regulating her position in regard to the League. Already an anomalous situation has been created—entirely for the benefit of Irak—in so far as the Treaty is not subject to the approval of the League and comes into force before the Mandate. It cannot be a substitute for the latter, because it does not concern the relations between Great Britain as Mandatory and the League; but it does constitute an important annotation of the Mandate, and there should be no further delay in bringing it officially to the League's notice.

Inevitably the last sentence in the Government's statement has arrested attention. It suggests a definite time limit within which the Irak Assembly must make up its mind whether it will ratify or reject the Treaty and subsidiary agreements. In the event of the Assembly's not coming to a decision before the next meeting of the Council of the League—and equally in the event of rejection—Great Britain may be compelled to obtain the Council's authority for some alternative arrangement for carrying out the provisions of Article 22 of the Covenant, which lays down that the degree of authority, control, or administration to be exercised by the Mandatory shall, if not previously agreed upon by the members of the League, be explicitly defined in each case by the Council. It is, perhaps, not surprising that in the careful wording of this sentence a number of people have found an indication of the desire, if not of an actual resolve, on the part of the Government to evacuate Irak at once. Even if other considerations were not impelling it to this course, reluctance to be made the sport of party politics in Irak might well prove the determining factor in such a policy. The Irakis, we imagine, will not overlook this sinister interpretation. That they want to see Great Britain evacuate the country at once we do not for a moment believe. The temptation to pick holes in the Treaty and subsidiary agreements is, doubtless, a strong one; it adds so much to one's sense of one's own importance to take Great Britain to task before an applauding House, and to suggest how much wiser the critic is than those who had accepted the Treaty. But because the critics set no store on time and lack the understanding necessary to distinguish between details capable of adjustment and the broad principles, all important to Irak, involved in the Treaty, they require a sharp warning of the dangers of the policy on which they are embarked. A very clear undertaking has been given by the British Government that it will readily discuss the subsequent revision of details as soon as the Treaty has been ratified in its entirety. It is concerned far less with the wording of individual clauses than with the necessity of settling the Irak question and liquidating its obligations to the League of Nations on the one hand, and to Irak on the other. Great Britain is not trying to strengthen her hold on the country, but rather to encourage the Irakis to take charge of their own affairs proportionately to their capacity to do so without grave risk to the interests of Irak.

Already Great Britain has shown her anxiety to meet the wishes of the Irakis by agreeing early in 1923 to substantial modifications of a treaty signed in the previous October. The treaty is to terminate upon Irak's becoming a member of the League of Nations, and, in any case, not later than four years from the ratification of the peace with Turkey. This reference to the Treaty of Lausanne, it would be thought, would remind the Irak Constituent Assembly of the dangers that still threaten the young State. There is no truth in the allegation that the people desire to see the Turks back in Irak; they are fired with as lively a desire for independence as any other Arab or Eastern community, and they know that, just as it is entirely due to Great Britain that the present measure of independence has been accorded them, so it is only with British good will that they can hope to retain that independence. Irak, moreover, cannot exist without the vilayet of Mosul, and the British Government alone is in a position to secure it for the Irakis. The delay in the ratification of the Anglo-Irakian Treaty by the Constituent Assembly will have helped to encourage the Turks in their intransigent attitude over Mosul, for they will argue that, although they have not been able to get the better of Great Britain in debate, there will now be opportunity to intrigue in Irak with a view to undermining the British position there. If, when the subject of Mosul comes before the Council of the League of Nations, it can be shown that the prospect of the separation of the vilayet from Irak causes the Irakis so little anxiety that they do not appreciate the necessity for seconding the British effort to retain it for them, there will be no one to fight their battles for them, and with the alienation of Mosul the days of the independence of Irak would be numbered. Fortunately there are indications that this aspect of the situation is gradually being brought home to the Constituent Assembly, and we may yet hope to hear that the Treaty has been duly ratified.

A CRŒSUS OF THE MARSHES.

By FULANAIN.

A patch of swampy land dotted with reeds seems hardly worth the shedding of blood, yet it was to settle a dispute over the ownership of such a patch, without recourse to such an argument, that I found myself floating slowly down the broad waterway of the Masas canal on my way to the village of Sheikh Solagh, one of the richest rice sheikhs in Mesopotamia.

Every spring the Tigris flood pours its waters into the marshes, and by depositing its silt is gradually turning the waste of reeds and waters into the most valuable land in Irak. No wonder, then, that Sheikh Solagh and his neighbours watched the marsh with jealous eyes, ready to appeal to the sword and rifle if but so much as a hand's span were in dispute.

It was just before sunset when we reached the sheikh's village, where I was to spend my first night. Landing, we were led to the tribal madhif or guest-house—the largest I had ever seen; out of curiosity I paced it later, and found it (though made entirely of reeds and rushes from the marshes) to be 108 feet long by 18 feet wide; its height was perhaps 18 feet. The whole floor space was covered thickly with carpets from Persia. At the far end lay a number of silk-covered mattresses, on which were piled scores of velvet and silken cushions, blue and green, orange and scarlet—a single bright mass of colour which threw into high relief the simplicity and fine proportions of the building itself.

Here we seated ourselves. Though the evening was far from cold, a slave entered with a brass munkala heaped with glowing charcoal, from which rose the faint scent of incense. Other slaves, more richly dressed than their master, brought in tea and coffee, and offered cigarettes, which they lit in their own mouths—an attention with which one could well dispense. Beside the sheikh sat a small girl, perhaps eight years old, a demure, dark-eyed little creature—the only one of her sex present in the great madhif—who, accompanying her tall, bearded father, as the favourite daughter of a sheikh often does, should have made a charming picture of Arab childhood. But, alas! she was dressed in pseudo-European fashion, with feathered hat and tan buttoned boots—an outlet for one small fraction of Solagh's superfluous wealth.

On his domestic affairs, indeed, the greater part of this was expended. As a strict Mohammedan, Solagh only permitted himself four wives; but his religion placed no restriction on the number of times these four might be changed. It was his custom to take a new wife every month. Quietly and with no ostentation one of the four reigning queens would be divorced and sent back to her home; then, with rejoicing and acclamation, feasting and merry-making, a new wife would come to rule over the unstable heart of Sheikh Solagh.

Some two hours after our arrival a cloth was spread on the carpeted floor, and the evening meal began to make its appearance. I say began, for it was a long business. Solagh, in common with many other tribal leaders, was possessed of wealth enough to have enabled him to emulate the princes of Arab folk-tales, and feast his guests with the expensive if unsatisfying luxury of dishes heaped with gold. Luckily for me, this idea had not occurred to him, and the meal was the normal Arab supper, differing from that of humbler folk only in the quantity of food and the number of servants.

First came the sheikh, bearing in his hand a dish, which he placed carefully on the cloth. Behind him came a string of slaves and retainers, each with two dishes—a seemingly endless procession. Soon the cloth was covered with great mounds of rice, roast chickens and wild duck, savoury stews, plates of honey and ground rice, sweet pastries made with date juice; but still the stream of servants entered at the high arched doorway; plates were pushed more closely to make room, and soon the whole floor was covered.

As I looked down the long madhif and in the dim light of the lanterns held up at intervals by slaves saw the great white mounds of rice diminishing in perspective, saw the whole roast sheep and the deep bowls of sherbet, I thought of other meals, when a few plates of food had been put on a round mat, and the sheikh, his sons, and his mullah had eaten with me from a common dish. At such meals one shares the family life, one hears of the joys and sorrows of the people. And for another reason I thought enviously of those simple meals; the mighty feast before me had taken so long to bring in that every dish was stone cold!

Bedtime is early among the Arabs, and soon afterwards a large iron bedstead, decked with many brass knobs, was carried in—evidently the pride of the household. Unfortunately, I found that the Arab is distrustful of springs; a stout wooden board was brought and fitted over the wire mattress. But, to mitigate the hardships of this arrangement, a pile of soft mattresses was added—so many that I was reminded of the old tale of the princess who slept on a pea, and told it to Sheikh Solagh. This was not exactly a success, however, for he quite failed to see the point, looking puzzled and uncomfortable until the inspiration came to him that I was delicately hinting at a desire for more doshags, when he hastily ordered his servants to bring in ten more! On these were spread silken sheets embroidered in gold and brilliantly coloured padded quilts.

The sheikh bade me good-night, then loudly called in one of the sentries, and, taking the man's rifle from him, told me that he intended to spend the night outside the madhif, watching over the slumbers of his honoured guest, which polite myth was maintained the next morning by a series of prolonged yawns, indicative of the weariness of his night vigil.

I awoke to a grey morning of pouring rain. Usually the first rain is a time of general rejoicing, for it means a drop in the price of food. But here, among the rice-growers, this early fall meant losses, the spoiling of much paddy harvested but not yet threshed, the possible flooding and total destruction of much that was still uncut. Sheikh Solagh was sunk in gloom—a gloom which changed abruptly to surprise when I announced my intention of proceeding to the marshes. In Irak rain involves the suspension of almost every pursuit. No one dreams of proceeding with anything, however important, until the rain stops; hence Solagh's surprise.

But as it was important that I should complete my inspection that day, and not important that the sheikh should accompany me, I told him that he might be excused, one of his sons coming in his stead. The look of relief which passed over his face was quickly followed by one of cunning. It was as though he said to himself, "This is a test to see if I am as loyal and willing a servant as I declare myself to be"; and more deeply sunk in gloom than before, he led the way to the waiting mashhuf.

It was a dismal and depressing journey—the sky mud coloured, the mud-coloured river flowing between banks of mud. Only when we neared the marshes did the eye find any relief from the dreariness of the landscape. Villages became frequent, long straggling lines of huts along the river bank, a mile or more in length. The reed houses, similar in shape to the haystacks of Southern Cornwall, glistened yellow in the rain, in striking contrast to the shining black of the mashhufs moored to the bank, and the buffaloes huddled in the shelter of the huts.

At length, amid the green of reeds and rushes, we came to the area under dispute. It seemed no different from any other stretch of open water that we had passed; but the sheikh knew its value—knew it worth his while to bring together, with bribes of clothing, these wild Ma'dan, the outcasts of the marshes, who would work in the water and mud until the land was ready to bring forth heavy-eared blades of paddy; then only to be driven forth once more into the wilderness of reeds that more favoured tribes might reap where they had made sowing possible.

In the middle of the open space was a cluster of reed huts, half-submerged, weather-beaten, and deserted—or so I thought. But though indeed half-submerged, they were not deserted. The clever fingers of the Ma'dan had helped to split and weave the reeds for Sheikh Solagh's great mądhif, but poverty forbade themselves a roof of any but broken, worn-out mats. Each man had built for himself a little island of mud, rushes, and buffalo dung, covering it in with his poor roof of reeds, and furnishing it with a few utensils of baked mud. This islet, a bare inch or so above the water, was his home; on its floor of mud his womenfolk and his buffaloes gave birth and his naked children played. Here were squalor and misery, toil and tears; here dirt and disease should have given Death an easy victory, yet here was Life triumphant.

Our stay was short, for the rain had caused the waters to rise, flooding the potential rice-lands, so that they could not be distinguished from the surrounding marsh; the question of their ownership had thus to be postponed for settlement at a later date. As we left the village, though not before Sheikh Solagh had ordered that some fish and roba (curdled buffalo's milk) be sent to his madhif as tribute, the sky cleared and the sun came out, tinting all the marsh water blue. My host decided to make full use of the interval of brightness by having the meal which he had brought with him. The mashhuf was accordingly drawn into the shelter of the reeds, just off the narrow channel we were following.

We had finished lunch when, coming towards us from the miserable hovels in which it seemed that laughter and happiness must be unknown, we saw a mashhuf, swiftly poled by a tall young Arab. His only garment lay tossed behind him, and with every vigorous thrust of the pole one saw his strong, supple muscles leap beneath the brown skin. In the stern, guiding the boat with a paddle, sat a girl, the flush of health and open air on her dark face, her scanty blue dress fresh and clean. As they neared us we heard her clear young voice cry a word of endearment, and saw the flash of white teeth as the man smiled back at her, tossed the dark curls from his forehead, and drove his pole with still greater force, glorying in his strength. They were soon lost to sight, but after their passing the water seemed more blue, the reeds greener, the air fresher.

"His young bride," said the Crœsus of the marshes, with a sigh that seemed to me to be a sigh of envy; for this simple human happiness, in Irak no less than elsewhere, is not to be purchased for all the gold in the rich man's coffers.

NOTES AND NEWS.

Tuesday Morning.

The Baghdad Municipal Loan.

Lord Banbury, in his speech in introducing his questions regarding the revenues allocated to the Ottoman Debt collected by the British Government in Palestine and Irak during the war, mentioned an analogous matter, but as it had not figured in the original question Lord Arnold refused to take notice of it. In 1912 a British loan of £30,000 was made to the Baghdad Municipality on the security of the earnings of the municipal slaughter-houses, which were ceded exclusively for the service of the Loan. The capital amount of this Loan now outstanding is £35,529. During the occupation the revenues assigned for this Loan were collected and handed over to the municipality. An offer to settle the indebtedness by the payment of £23,000 was made a year ago, and last February it was suggested that the municipality might even pay £26,000; but the offer was not accepted, and now it is understood that the municipality pleads its inability to pay anything. The British Government can hardly intend to leave the matter where it now stands. It shows little sign, however, of recognising that the timely exercise of its influence is as much in the interests of the debtor as of the creditors in such a case.

Great Britain and Yugoslavia.

In recent months the Yugoslav market has attracted increasing attention in this country, an indication, it may be hoped, of a changed attitude towards the Balkans generally. But even now British trade relations with Yugoslavia are on a relatively small scale, though the position is, all the same, infinitely better than it was a few years ago. Trade between the two countries is the subject of an interesting article by M. A. Vidakovitch in the current issue of the Belgrade Economic and Financial Review, in which it is pointed out that the chief exports and imports of Great Britain and Yugoslavia "not only supplement each other, but often represent real needs of exchange." The small commercial intercourse in the past, the writer points out, has not been due to the lack of goodwill on the Yugoslav side, and he lays stress on the high reputation enjoyed by British goods in Serbia before the war, and adds that the very word "English" is synonymous with good quality in the market.

A Growing Trade.

The statistics of the direct trade since 1919 are very illuminating. In 1920 British exports to Yugoslavia represented only 7 per cent. of the total Yugoslav imports, while Yugoslavia's exports to Great Britain only amounted to .8 per cent. of her total exports. Of course, as M. Vidakovitch points out, allowance has to be made for a certain amount of indirect trade, but, even with the best possible aspect put on the figures for that year, the position could not be regarded as other than very unsatisfactory. For 1921 the percentages were 5.9 and 1.1, a sharp drop in one case and a slight improvement in the other; for 1922 they were 7 and 3, while for the first half of last year they were 11.5 and 4.4, a marked improvement, which is even better than it looks, as the figures for Egypt are no longer included. With the increasing interest now being taken by the British business man in Yugoslavia it is not too much to hope that before long these figures will make a vastly different showing.

Anglo-Egyptian Oilfields.

The financial results of the Anglo-Egyptian Oilfields in 1923 show a slight improvement on the figures for the previous year. The net profits amounted to £234,078, as against £229,730, while the disposable surplus is £470,203, as compared with £469,625. It is proposed that £233,500 should again be allocated for dividends on the "B" and "C" shares, leaving £236,703 to be carried forward, as against £236,125. The total estimated net production of crude oil amounted to 150,423 tons, as compared with 169,313 tons. This reduction, it is stated, was mainly due to the restriction of output owing to the large increase of water produced with the oil. The difficulty is being met by the construction of a new plant. With regard to development work, it is stated that the drilling at Hurghada has indicated that the productive area of the main field does not extend to the west and east beyond the limits already proved. One of the two wells in course of drilling to the north of the main field has given production, while a well between this and the main field has also produced. Farther wells are being drilled between the main field and the first of these exploration wells, and it is pointed out that it would be premature to regard the whole of this area as productive until these are completed, but that it appears likely that some addition to the main Hurghada field may be proved, thus extending the company's producing area.

The Indian Pavilion.

A description of the Indian Pavilion, which has just claims to be regarded as one of the sights of Wembley, appears on another page. The pavilion is a wonderful tribute to the enthusiasm with which all concerned—Governments, Ruling Chiefs, and private individuals—have devoted themselves to the task of producing something that shall be an adequate epitome of India to-day. Because of the vivid passages which have marked Great Britain's relations with the great peninsula, people know more of India than of a number of other parts of the Empire. The Indian Pavilion will give those who have not been to the country a wider knowledge of and sympathy with it.

THE BAGHDAD MOTOR SERVICE.

A New Record.

From a Correspondent.

The desire for speed and efficiency in organisation and in matters mechanical must still be considered Western rather than Eastern characteristics: this being so, it will be no surprise to those who are familiar with the Baghdad-Beyrout overland services to learn that it has fallen to Mr. Norman Nairn, managing director of the Nairn Transport Company of Beyrout, to set up a new speed standard between Irak and Syria.

From Ramadi on the Euphrates to Beyrout, 544 miles, in 14½ hours, including all stops: such is the new record made by Mr. Nairn on May 22, driving an 8-cylinder Cadillac which had already done 90,000 miles on this route, carrying a spare driver, a passenger, mails, and luggage, and the usual reserves of petrol, water and food. There were three stops of 5 minutes each—once for a puncture, twice for petrol.

Allowing 2¼ hours for the journey from Baghdad to Ramadi, this gives a figure of 17 hours by the clock or 16 hours by the sun for the journey from Baghdad to Beyrout, i.e., from dawn to dusk during the summer months, and an average speed of just under 40 miles. The passenger could, had he been so minded, have reached Port Said by train from Haifa on the following evening! The R.A.F. must look to their laurels: the overland mail is only in its infancy, and though such speeds as those attained on this occasion will not yet be the rule, the records of one year have a habit of becoming the commonplaces of the following years, and though grass grows on the desert it is not to be found in the well worn tracks of the Nairn Route.

Mr. Nairn, the pioneer of this service, has done more in the past year to unite the Arab kingdoms of Syria and Irak than all the politicians of Europe and Arabia have been able to accomplish (or prevent, as the case may be) in a decade.

INDIA AT THE EXHIBITION.

A Wonderful Display.

(BY OUR REPRESENTATIVE.)

The external appearance of the Indian pavilion is, perhaps, just a shade misleading in its pretentiousness. Its spacious white frontage, revealing an extensive cloistered courtyard, gives the impression of an unlimited expanse of space within the walls. One has much the same idea, indeed, as in approaching a wing of the British Museum, though instead of the vastness and solidity of that huge edifice one is confronted with the fragile, delicate outlines that are inevitably associated with the East. But though from some points of view the Indian pavilion may suggest more than actually exists, let no one suppose from what I have said that the interior has the appearance of being limited in extent. Indeed, once one has passed from the cool cloisters into the outer halls one seems to have entered a series of almost unending galleries of exhibits, and certainly no one who includes India in the inevitable visit to Wembley (and who could resist the attraction of that wonderful facade?) will find it possible to see much of the pavilion in anything like a brief space of time. From end to end of the long halls there is too much of interest for a tour of inspection that is in any way hurried. On every side, indeed, there are exhibits that arrest attention, and the seasoned Anglo-Indians (I use the term for the nonce in preference to "Indiamen," which seems to me to call also for the use of the scarcely euphonious "Indiawomen"), as well as those whose knowledge of India and things Indian is limited to the written word, the pavilion must be a revelation of the wealth and romance of India. The great peninsula has, indeed, given of its best, and it is possible to see at Wembley the great resources of the country and also of the leading Indian States, for the pavilion owes not a little of its attractiveness to the whole-hearted support given to the Exhibition by the leading Indian chiefs.

If there is one dominant note about the Indian exhibits it is the harmonious tone that is struck throughout. From end to end the pavilion is literally ablaze with rich colour, but all the varied shades blend beautifully into a finished scene which must give the visitor a vivid impression of what is to be found in the land East of Suez. Carpets of curious patterns and of a richness and texture that must make them an irresistible attraction—to those whose purses are long enough—strange and beautiful fabrics of designs that could only come out of the East, elaborate and ornate metal work that suggests how much the West still has to learn in some respects, quaint ornaments that one intuitively associates with the bazaars—these are some of the wealth of treasures that India has to show. And with it all the atmosphere is there, the real atmosphere of the East. Some of the stalls themselves might have been taken out of the bazaars, while another side of Indian life, and that the most attractive presumably to the Western denizen, is brought home by the curious and realistic jungle scenes. But none of the leading phases of the India of to-day are absent, and when one says that the pavilion is a very complete index of the life of the country the praise is not one whit too great.

One aspect which a tour round the pavilion brings home very forcibly is the effect of the growing economic development of India. In the last few years the progress has bordered on the marvellous, and India is now well on the way to realise the promise as an industrial country that her great resources holds out. One can visualise a good deal of the transformation that is going on by the varied and wonderful range of the exhibits. But if one can detect the hand of change passing over the East, it is no less evident that, as far as India is concerned, no industrial advance is likely fundamentally to alter her basic characteristics. India will always be the country of romance, of wonderful history, of an art which is like nothing else on earth, even if here and there industry may infuse an Occidental atmosphere into an Oriental setting.

The Provincial Courts are places in which one can linger long and yet not exhaust the information they have to impart with regard to the localised industries of India. The United Provinces, one of the great industrial centres of India, containing within its limits one of the most important manufacturing cities of the country, of course, plays a very prominent part. Here are to be seen inter alia wonderfully decorated rugs and mats, exquisitely woven carpets, and charmingly fashioned brasswork, while the British India Corporation has on view an attractive range of the famous woollen goods that come from Cawnpore. Madras is noted for its carpets, and of these there is an admirable range on view, also a profusion of rich silks in exotic colours, which must be at once the delight and tantalisation of the ladies, while the variety of the industries of the province is shown by such different exhibits as pencils and earthenware. The jute and cotton industries of Bengal figure largely in the exhibits of that province, which also, of course, reflect the activities of one of the great Indian ports. The Bombay Court is specially interesting. Here is to be seen a model of Bombay illustrative of the Back Bay reclamation scheme: here also may be viewed the great Lloyd Barrage at Sukkur, the most prodigious enterprise of its kind yet to be undertaken, which promises to transform the face of Sind. But each of the Provincial Courts has something unique to itself to offer.

It would be difficult to praise too highly the courts of the Indian States. Each has a distinctiveness peculiarly its own, each has its special delights for the visitor, whether in the shape of strange and delicate carving, exquisite metalwork, curiously coloured cloths, or any of the one hundred and one things that come from the East. In a brief survey it would be impossible to mention all the courts, let alone do real justice to any, and I must perforce confine myself to reference to a few of the courts selected at random. Patiala State shows rugs and textiles in bizarre and strangely alluring patterns. A novelty in this court is a chess board in bluish grey and white marble, a beautiful piece of workmanship, but which I should prefer to look at than to play on. An excellent display of metalwork is a feature of the Jaipur Court, while the Bikanir State exhibits, which are specially interesting, include an admirable display of finely carved woodwork and some charming rugs. Baroda, of course, plays a prominent part, and the exhibits in the court of this State challenge comparison with those of any of the Indian States. They include admirable examples of lacquer ware, some richly ornamented woodwork, notably a screen supported on two elephants—a supreme example of the craftsman's art—ornamental pottery, specimens of inlaid brass and copper work, and some exhibits of the beautiful green marble that is found in the State. Another court of special interest is that of Bharatpur. The exhibits of this State include silk and woollen fabrics, specimens of moongh-hemp and aloe fibre, and of the carpets and mattings manufactured from them, rare examples of the industrial art of the State, such as hand-made fans of ivory, painting on ivory, and pictures worked out in silk thread, numerous varieties of the stone quarried in the State, pottery and earthenware, and a number of most interesting clay models illustrating village life in India.

Such in brief are some of the notable aspects of the Indian Pavilion. But, besides the Provincial and Indian State exhibits, there are a large number of what may for the sake of conciseness be termed purely official exhibits, such, for instance, as that of the Geological Survey, which illustrates most succinctly the vast mineral resources of the country. The Indian Army has an exhibit emphasising one feature of India which, unfortunately, can never be overlooked, and that is that there is such a place as the North-West Frontier, which throughout the centuries has been the gateway into India of people with hostile intentions. The railways, too, play a fittingly important part in the pavilion, as indeed was inevitable, for without the threads of communications that have been cunningly woven into the pattern of the Indian countryside the industrial development that has taken place would have been impossible. This is, indeed, one of the most interesting features of the pavilion, and certainly the one which will be the main attraction for the schoolboy and perhaps also for les autres, for it is difficult to resist the fascination of closely examining the wealth of rolling stock and other exhibits that are on view. It remains to add that the Bengal-Nagpur, the G.I.P., and the rest of the leading Indian lines are all represented. Cotton is given the dignity of an exhibit by itself, staged by the Indian Central Cotton Committee, while the tea industry is also the subject of a very interesting exhibit. No exhibition dealing with India could be regarded as complete, of course, without the inclusion of an exhibit dealing with the connecting link across the Black Water between India and Great Britain, and the P. and O. Company is fittingly represented by models of the Mooltan and the Rawalpindi. One more feature of the pavilion must be mentioned. At the stand of Uberoi, Ltd., who show a most attractive range of sports equipment, there are on view in a case models in ivory and gold of thirty-five British games. The set, which took five years to finish, is the work of Mr. A. E. Trimmings. Whatever people see or do not see in the pavilion, I strongly urge them not to miss this exhibit. It is unique, but, then, so is the Indian Pavilion.

THE RUTENBERG CONCESSIONS.

Development of Palestine's Resources.

In the House of Lords on May 28 Lord Raglan asked the Government, with reference to the Rutenberg Concession in Palestine, whether Mr. Rutenberg has fulfilled in every respect the prescribed conditions as to time, finance, etc.; what works have actually been constructed or sanctioned; and whether compulsion has been used to acquire any land or instal any plant, etc.

Lord Arnold, Under-Secretary for the Colonies, in reply, said: The noble lord in his question refers to the Rutenberg concession in Palestine. I am not quite sure whether he appreciates the fact that there are two concessions in question, and not one. I would, however, in the first place, explain to your lordships that enterprises in Palestine connected with the name of Mr. Rutenberg represent the greatest practical effort that has yet been made to develop some of the natural resources of the country. The first concession was in connection with the supply of electrical energy in the district of Jaffa. It is already in force, and is held by the Jafla Electric Company, to whom it was transferred by Mr. Rutenberg. The High Commissioner has recently reported that this company is conducting its operations to the satisfaction of the consumers whom it supplies, and that it is correctly adhering to the terms and conditions laid down in the concession. With regard to the works which have been constructed, a full report has been received from the High Commissioner, but I do not think I need trouble your lordships with all the technical details.

Jaffa and Tel Aviv are now provided with electrical energy for private and street lighting, water supply and industrial purposes. Petach Tikuah remains to be supplied, and will be supplied either from the existing fuel power house at Tel Aviv, or from the hydro-electric station on the River Auja. The existing power house consists of two Diesel generator sets of 1,000 h.p. capacity. About 5 kilometres of high tension underground cables have been made in Jaffa and Tel Aviv, transmitting energy to five sub-stations fitted with transforming plant. A high tension transmission line 18 kilometres long is now being erected from the Jaffa power house to Surafend, and will serve a number of places in the southern part of the Jaffa district. The erection of a third Diesel generator set will shortly be completed. I have been glad to learn that, since October, 1923, the Arab Municipality of Jaffa and private Arab consumers have been using electric energy from the Jaffa power house. There are 184 street lights in Tel Aviv and 126 in Jaffa. The number of consumers in Tel Aviv is 800, and the number in Jaffa is 260.

The position with regard to the larger Jordan concession—that is, the second concession—is somewhat different. Under the agreement with Mr. Rutenberg of September 21, 1921, a concession was to be granted to a company with an authorised capital of not less than £1,000,000, of which not less than £200,000 was to be subscribed and paid for in cash, application for the grant of the concession being made within two years from the date of the agreement. Application was duly made within the time specified, and the Secretary of State has been satisfied that a company has been duly formed with the requisite authorised and paid up capital. The actual issue of the concession has not yet been made, but I understand that it is on the point of being completed. In these circumstances, the Palestine Electric Corporation, to whom this concession is to be granted, are not yet under any obligation to carry out the terms of the concession. As a matter of fact, however, a considerable amount of progress has been made, and the High Commissioner reports that he is satisfied with what is being done. The engineering investigations into the works to be established on the River Jordan have been completed, and the plans required have been submitted to the Colonial Office, and, after reference to our consulting engineers, have been approved.

I am informed that negotiations for the acquisition of land required for the power house and other necessary works are now being conducted, and that tenders for the necessary machinery and materials have been called for. Work on the Jordan will commence as soon as the necessary land has been acquired, and it is hoped that the work will actually be commenced during the present year. Meanwhile, a good deal of work has been done in connection with subsidiary fuel power stations at Haifa and Tiberias. At Haifa land for the power house and for the future transmission station has been acquired. Plans for the power house are being prepared, and the tracing of the distribution net made. Orders for the steel frame construction for the power house have been placed in this country, and orders for machinery are also being placed in this country. The Haifa power house is expected to commence the supply of energy early next year. Land for the Tiberias power house has been acquired; machinery and materials required are already in Palestine, and an agreement has been arrived at with the municipality for the supply of energy, which is expected to be available towards the end of this year.

Plans for the Jerusalem installation have been prepared as far back as 1921; but the actual execution of the works has been delayed owing to complications which have arisen in connection with the claim of another party to a pre-war concession for a similar purpose. The Palestine Electrical Corporation have been in no way responsible for any delay in this connection. I am informed that the cost of the first stage of the works I have described is estimated at £750,000, of which about £300,000 represents the cost of machinery and materials required to be imported into Palestine. It is hoped that by far the greater part of these orders will be placed in this country. So far as I am aware, no compulsory powers have been exercised in connection either with the acquisition of land or installation of plant for any of the schemes in hand.

Lord Danesfort: May I ask the noble lord whether there is any time limit fixed by the concession within which works are to be begun and completed? I understand from the noble lord's statement that no works have actually been completed which would enable light and power to be introduced, but that certain preliminary steps have been taken. Perhaps the noble lord can tell us whether there is any time limit within which these works will be completed.

Lord Arnold: I would not like to give a precise reply to that without an opportunity of referring to my department. If my noble friend will be good enough to put down another question I shall be glad to reply to it.

The Ionian Bank has declared an interim dividend at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, free of tax, for the half-year ended February 29, payable June 10.

The Bulgarian Government has given to the Skoda Works, Pilzen, contracts for the supply of 20 small locomotives, 12 goods train engines and 12 passenger train engines, to the total value of Kc.32,000,000 (over £200,000). The Ringhoffer Carriage Building Works, Smichov, Prague, have received contracts for the supply of three four-axle carriages (1st and 2nd class), 10 four-axle 3rd-class cars, 50 two-axle 3rd-class cars, 100 road-metal trucks, 250 covered vans, and 250 open trucks to the total value of Kc.34,000,000. LONDON PRODUCE REPORT.

Dried Fruit in Good Request.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

London, Tuesday Morning.

Sugar.—Home refined has continued in fair demand at unchanged rates. Tate's cubes are 42s. 9d., London granulated is 39s. 11d., while Lyle's granulated is 39s. 4½d. Foreign descriptions have been steady. White Mauritius has been done at 36s. White Java has come to business at 36s. 3d., while Czech granulated is 36s. 6d. Futures are fairly firm. Quotations are :—September, 22s.; October, 21s. 4½d.; November, 20s. 7½d.; December, 20s. 4½d.

Coffee.—A variable tone has ruled. Costa Rica has risen 6s. to 134s., Kenya has advanced to 124s. (a gain of 6s.), East Indian is 10s. lower at 122s., while Santos at 88s. is 4s. down.

Dried Fruit.—On the whole, a fair amount of business has been done during the past week. Currants have been in good request and have continued to move off freely. Sultanas have also been the medium of good business, Smyrnas being in special demand. The supply of figs is now practically exhausted, owing to the sustained demand during the season for the home market and for export. Plums have been a specially good spot, but Bosnians have not been in particularly good request.

Oranges.—A good tone has prevailed in the market. Supplies are on a smaller scale, and the finest selected fruit is now scarce, so that prices may be expected to advance. It is expected that the trade in Jaffas will substantially benefit as a result of the fine display of oranges in the Palestine Pavilion at the Exhibition.

Oilseeds.—Linseed has been steady, with Indian at 19s. 6d. and La Plata at 17s. 9d. Rapeseed has been firm. Toria is 18s., real bold Ferozepore is 17s. 6d., while Jamba is 13s. 10½d. Cottonseed is steady. Bombay is 10s. 1½d., Egyptian Black is 12s. 9d., while Sakellarides is 11s. 7½d.

Seed Oils.—Linseed is steady at 39s. 3d. Rape oil is quiet, with crude at 45s. 6d., and technical refined at 48s. 6d. Cotton oil is dull, with refined common edible at 46s., Bombay crude at 37s., Egyptian crude at 40s., technical at 42s., deodorised at 48s., and Egyptian refined at 45s. 6d.

Oil Cakes.—A steady tone has ruled. Linseed is unchanged at 220s., coconut has risen 5s. to 185s., while cottonseed is 5s. up at 165s.

The traffic receipts of the South Indian Railway Co. for the week ended May 3 amounted to Rs. 10,69,999.

From October 1 to April 30, Great Britain imported 136,827 tons of sugar from Czecho-Slovakia. This is a record figure, the quantity for the previous two years having been 68,000 and 21,048 tons respectively.

The Bulgarian Sobranje has ratified the agreement concluded on March 28 last between the Bulgarian Government and the Reparations Commission regarding the fixing of the amount and terms of payment of the occupation expenses of the Allied armies in Bulgaria. Bulgaria will pay 25,000,000 gold francs in ten years by half-yearly instalments, with interest at 5 per cent.

DRIED FRUIT MARKET.

Messrs. J. C. Houghton and Co., of Liverpool, in their monthly report dated June 2, state :—

Currants.—Although the market showed signs of improvement in the early days of the month, no development of any importance took place, and the general trend of business developed into extreme apathy. Such continued lack of demand and absence of support caused prices to sag, and in some instances slight reductions in values were accepted to make progress. The real trouble is the lack of animation from the country. Statistically the position is strong, and the selection, with the exception of Vostizza, is very limited, with a scarcity of fruit of the lower grades. Further arrivals per s.s. Phrygia and Lady Brenda consisted of about 700 tons, only a portion of which was for the market, and sales were :—Bold cleaned, 47s. 6d. to 52s.; Zante, 47s to 50s.; Gulf, 51s. to 53s.; Panariti, 54s. to 56s.; Vostizza, 56s. to 60s.; Fine, 62s. to 72s. 6d.; Smalls, 56s. to 70s. Some forward sales of Pyrgos, 40s. to 42s. c.i.f., prompt shipment, were put through. Quotations :—Calamata, 45s.; Amalias, cleaned, 47s. 6d. to 48s.; Zante, 47s. to 50s.; Gulf and Panariti, 50s. to 56s.; Vostizza, 56s. to 60s.; Vostizza, fine, 62s. to 72s. 6d. Australian.—The first arrivals of the new crop came to hand per s.s. Ulysses and Fordsdale. Quality shows a great falling off from last season's growth, leaving much to be desired as to colour and condition, and, unfortunately, many parcels vary as to size. Opening prices were 60s. to 65s.; latest sales, 58s. Further supplies are close at hand per s.s. Ceramic and Argyllshire.

Raisins.—Valencia practically neglected, and, although offered at declining prices, fail to attract buyers at 37s. for ½-boxes selected. Cape.—Sales are most disappointing considering the excellent quality offering; a little business was done in F.A.Q. at 45s., G.A.Q. at 54s., and even some reduction in these quotations has been without effect.

Sultanas.—The realising that commenced last month became more pronounced during the period under review. News from Smyrna of distinctly favourable crop reports decided holders generally to encourage consumption by further reductions, and some progress was made in good average quality at 49s. to 50s., and cleaned at 51s. to 53s.; good to fine, 55s. to 65s.; the market closing steady at the recent lower level of values. Greek.—Slow of sale; a few poor quality realised 48s., better grades making 50s. to 54s. The first small lot of new crop Australian brought 65s. Some sun-dried Cape were sold at 44s., and sulphured variety at 60s.

Figs.—The few remaining bags Naturals were cleared at 37s.

The gross receipts of the Land and Mortgage Co. of Egypt for the year ended March 31 were £16,505 and the net profits £8,708, plus £10,793 brought in. The directors recommend a dividend of 6 per cent. for the year, less tax, carrying forward £10,500.

SUDAN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

The Annual Meeting.

The present position and future prospects of the Sudan were the subject of interesting comment by the President of the Sudan Chamber of Commerce, Mr. W. T. Bostock, in his report at the annual meeting of the Chamber. He said :—

Customs statistics show an improvement in values both of imports and exports over 1922, imports totalling £E4,669,004, as against £E4,252,890, and exports £E2,562,091, as against £E1,993,436 in the previous year. On the import side tea, fuel oil, timber, cotton piece goods, rails, iron and steel manufactures, oil engines and machinery show material increases, while the import of sugar dropped 2,349 tons and a value of £E230,718, and coal a value of £E163,489. On the export side cattle and durra showed decreases, while cotton, ground nuts and gum marked increases, the last-named commodity registering a record crop, 22,411 tons being exported, valued at £E1,006,223, against 14,556 tons, valued at £E539,673 for 1922.

I notice that re-exports are down from £E305,334 to £E196,334—a drop of nearly £E110,000. Those to Egypt are £E80,000 lower, but as the difference is practically all in the categories of used personal effects and arms and ammunition, this calls for no comment. On the other hand, I see that the re-exports to the Congo and Uganda have dropped from £E39,380 to the negligable figure of £E7,802, and I think this calls for investigation. I am informed that the deficit is more than counterbalanced by the increase in the transit trade, but the figures are not yet published. In any case, I beg the Government to give close study to the rates on their steamers running South of Khartoum, in order that full advantage may be taken of the geographical position of this country to develop transit trade and increase commercial relations with the countries bordering on the southern frontier.

The late President expressed the opinion when addressing you last year that the black times were over, and his prophecy has been supported by the figures just given you. The adverse balance of trade for 1923 shows an improvement of some £E40,000 over 1922, and this notwithstanding the increased imports for the various important development works now going on in the country.

As you are aware, the most important of these is the Ghezireh scheme, and all who took advantage of the opportunity offered by the railways to make one of the recent trips to Makwar—and here I should like to congratulate the railways on the innovation of running these excursions and on the way these were managed—will be able to realise the tremendous difference to the Sudan that this scheme will make when it is completed. The work, both of the building of the dam and the canalisation of the plain is being rapidly advanced, and I believe that there is every prospect that the autumn of 1925 will see a large part, if not the whole, of the proposed 100,000 feddans under cotton. The fear which existed some two or three years back of a shortage of labour to work this large area appears now to be less serious. Further, it has been shown that the resident population of the Ghezireh appreciate the value of cotton as a crop by the increased area of rain-grown cotton planted during last season at the expense of durra.

The work of laying the Kassala Railways is also being pushed on rapidly, and I understand that the line will be opened either this month or next to allow the present Kassala cotton crop to be railed to Port Sudan. I trust that no time will be lost in extending this railway beyond Kassala to Gedaref, as this would not only tap a very productive area, but would develop what is the natural outlet for that portion of Abyssinia bordering on the Sudan. The eventual linking up of this line with the present railway system at Makwar is, I believe, under consideration.

The question of the possibility of producing rain-grown cotton in the southern areas of the Sudan is receiving the attention of the authorities, and if the difficulties of labour and communications can successfully be overcome it should prove an attractive proposition. Taking all things into consideration, I think we can look upon 1923 as having marked a distinct progress in the development of the country.

Among the activities of the committee during the past year I would mention the following :—Appointing a committee to meet representatives of the Government monthly to fix export prices for duty purposes. Reporting to the Federation of British Industries on the Customs facilities of this country. Reporting to the International Chamber of Commerce on arbitration practice in the Sudan. Arranging through the International Chamber of Commerce with the Director of the French Customs regarding certificates of origin for France. The question of pilferage of durra during railway transit has been inquired into, and in this connection I think the trade should be satisfied with the new rating now in force and the additional precautions taken by the railway. The Chamber has asked the Government to endeavour to make some special arrangement whereby an additional mail weekly could be sent to Port Sudan, and we are pleased to see that this service has now been inaugurated.

THE P. AND O. AND BRITISH INDIA FLEETS.

Exhibition Traffic.

In the past twelve months the building programme of the P. and O. and British India Companies has been continued with such activity and speed as was permitted by unsettled labour conditions. To the P. and O. fleet was added, in March, the Mongolia, of 16,000 tons, a roomy mail and passenger steamer for the Australian service, and a sister in general design of the Moldavia, completed a few months earlier. In September the Mooltan, and in October the Maloja, both for the Australian line, and each of 21,000 tons gross, were put in commission, and all these vessels have completed their initial voyages with satisfactory results.

Meantime, eight additional mail and passenger vessels have been laid down—the Rajputana, Ranchi, Ranpura, Rawalpindi, and Rasmak, the last-named of 10.000 tons, the other four each of 16,100 tons gross, and all intended for the India mail and passenger services; and the Cathay, Chitral, and Comorin, each of 15,000 tons gross, also for the company's mail and passenger services. The Rajputana, Rawalpindi, and Rasmak are being built at Greenock by Messrs. Harland and Wolff, who will transfer the vessels, when launched—which is expected to be in the autumn—to their Belfast yard to be fitted out and finished for sea. The Rasmak is expected to be completed by the close of the year, and the Cathay and Comorin (Barclay, Curle and Co.) about the same time. The Ranchi and Ranpura (Hawthorn, Leslie and Co.) are expected to be finished in the spring and autumn respectively of 1925; the Chitral (Alexander Stephen and Sons) about the same time as the Ranpura. Including the ships brought into commission during the year, the vessels named represent a total addition to the P. and O. fleet of 194,100 tons, bringing the aggregate for the entire fleet to 651,772 tons.

During the year the British India Company has added to its fleet, on their completion, the motor vessels Dalgoma and Dumana, of 5,953 and 8,427 tons respectively; the Khandalla, a twin-screw steamer of 7,018 tons gross; the Naringa, a turbine vessel of 6,607 tons; and the Talma and Tilawa, each of 10,000 tons gross measurement. There are, besides, seven ships under construction—the Tairea, Takliwa, and Talamba, each of 8,500 tons; the Kistna and Kola, of 2,300 tons; and two vessels, not yet named, each of 9,000 tons. These vessels, including those commissioned during the year, represent 96,106 additional or replacement tons in the British India Company's fleet, which now aggregates 784,623 tons gross.

In connection with the British Empire Exhibition the P. and O. Company has not put on extra ships, except in the sense that four new steamers of large tonnage and passenger-carrying capacity have, as stated above, been added to its fleet during the past eighteen months. Earlier post-war vessels which have earned popularity are the Naldera and Narkunda, also of 16,000 tons. The coming of these ships into the Australian trade has enabled the company to transfer to the India and China services such vessels as the Mantua, Morea, Malwa, and Macedonia, passenger and mail steamers of 11,000 tons. Thus, without increasing the number of sailings, there has been an all-round increase in the passenger capacity of the various services, and so the company has been enabled to meet the extra demand for berths resulting from the desire of Britons overseas to see the Exhibition at Wembley.

It may be added in this connection that in several instances, particularly in the case of Australian departures, the forward bookings, always fairly heavy, have been heavier than usual this year. For example, the Mooltan and Maloja, while still in the builder's yard, were fully booked for their first homeward voyage from Australia.

At the British Empire Exhibition the exhibit of the P. and O. and British India Steam Navigation Companies will be found in the India Section at the southern entrance to the Madras Court, housed in a pavilion which has been designed by Messrs. White, Allom and Co. In this design palm trees and palm leaves are the chief motif. The pavilion, oblong in shape, is finished with an ornate frieze, each face bearing centrally on a medallion the company's arms.

The exhibit consists of models of the new P. and O. steamships assigned to that company's India or Australia mail and passenger services, and a model of the B.I. Company's Tairea, one of three vessels intended for that company's passenger line between Calcutta and China. While the models number only four, they represent no fewer than twelve vessels, each being one of a group of sister ships.

During the King's visit on May 14 His Majesty displayed much interest in this exhibit, particularly calling the attention of H.M. the King of Roumania to the beautiful model of the Rawalpindi.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Futures Quiet.

The Alexandria Commercial Company in their report for the week ended May 22 state :—

Since our last report the futures market has been quiet; the undertone is steady. There is no feature worthy of special notice. The May position closed to-day; there was a good deal of transferring of sales to July at about 150 points discount, which would seem to indicate a speculative short interest. The quoted difference May and July at the close is only 115 points, but this is very nominal, and little business has been put through at that difference. The third May tenders amount to 8,500 kantars; the total for the month is 10,000 kantars. New crops are firm, especially Sakel. There now seems to be a tendency to consider that the reduction of the acreage under Sakel has been overdone, and that the supplies of this growth will not be sufficient to meet trade requirements next season. The week's receipts amount to 27,354 kantars, against exports 102,262 kantars; the stock stands at 955,031 kantars.

Spot.—We have had another week of poor markets at Minet-el-Bassal and a very limited demand from abroad. Sales amount to about 5,800 bales, of which we estimate 4,600 bales Sakel, 1,200 bales Uppers, and a few bales of White.

Sakellarides.—The bulk of the business continues to be in the grades above Good Fair. A small inquiry has been met with for Fully Fair and Fully Fair to Good Fair, but the lower grades are completely neglected. Except for cotton above Good, which has been in fair request, prices of spot against contracts are generally rather easier.

Uppers.—Here also buyers have paid most attention to the medium and better grades, and the qualities below Good Fair have met with very little inquiry. Prices of spot against contracts are generally easier.

Brown and Pilion.—Are neglected, and no business has been reported. Spot prices are generally easier.

White.—Is also neglected, and only a few bales have been done. Prices of spot against contracts have eased somewhat.

New Crop.—The crop is progressing normally, and no complaints are heard. Temperature is regular, and the supply of water is sufficient for the needs of the plant.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Further Shrinkage in Inquiry.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended May 29 :—

Egyptian Spot.—A further shrinkage in the inquiry has been noticeable this week, and, pending further developments, business appears to have settled down more or less into the old hand-to-mouth groove. Instead of fifties and hundreds, spinners who still require cotton are now buying in quantities of ten and twenty-five. The discounts into new crop are, of course, mainly responsible for this state of affairs. At the commencement of the week there appeared to be a possibility that the Russian buyers might make their presence felt, but this hope has not materialised up to date.

The actual lines of the inquiry have altered very little. Sakellaridis at 300 on July has been in fair request, but the selection available appears to be only moderate. Rather less attention has been paid to the fine and extra fine cotton, and it cannot be said that any fresh amount of interest has been taken in the "off" varieties. It is somewhat surprising, considering the scarcity of the better grades, that this "off" cotton (we refer to cotton from about pass to 100 off) still hangs fire, and holders in general are inclined to be somewhat nervous as to the prospects of sale before the end of the season.

In Uppers, the inquiry has been almost entirely for fully good fair cotton, up to 100 on, and a moderate business has taken place. A steady trade has continued in Sudan cotton, chiefly, as was the case last week, for the white variety at prices ranging from 250 to 450 on American futures. Spinners of American and the Russian Syndicate have again been the chief buyers. Sudan Sakellaridis has remained quiet, and the same applies to the Tokar Sakellaridis market. Some sellers of the latter are inclined to reduce their basis slightly, but, generally speaking, prices for both the above remain firm. C.i.f. business, on the whole, remains quiet, but it is noticeable that any really reasonable offer from Egypt generally meets with some response. Forwardings to spinners for the week ending 23rd inst. were returned as 12,486 bales.

The Liverpool stock now stands at 50,000 bales, a figure which is generally found about the end of August, but seldom at the end of May! Estimated sales 1,700 bales Egyptian and 900 bales Sudan. Quotations of upper and brown are advanced 60 points for fair, 40 points for good fair, and 30 points for fully good fair. In Sakellaridis, fair is reduced 10 points, and all other grades 5 points. Fully good fair Sakellaridis to-day 23.10d.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

Market Depressed.

The Manchester cotton trade review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended May 31 states :—

No relief has come during the past week to the depression of this market, and trading continues to be confined to small lots for early delivery. Spinners and manufacturers endeavour to get what comfort they can from the fact that stocks of goods throughout the world are known to be low, and they believe a good American crop this year, with the lower prices which might be expected to result, would enable them to do a steady business with reasonable returns. Unfortunately, reports received from America recently have not been favourable, and the first Government Bureau report to be published on Monday next is awaited with much interest.

Yarn.—The state of things in this section is worse. Although raw cotton is dearer on the week, spinners of American have not been able to advance their rates proportionately, and, in fact, in some cases quotations are lower. Egyptian spinnings also have been quiet, although here prices are firm.

Cloth.—Inquiry has fallen away considerably, and business is very quiet. Neither India nor China seem disposed to enter into new transactions, and the same is true of practically all other markets abroad.

Raw Cotton.—The market has been somewhat erratic, but prices are higher on the poor reports from America; it is to be anticipated that fluctuations will continue so long as there is such uncertainty with regard to the new crop. Operations in Liverpool have been restricted.

Closing prices yesterday were as follows:—American Fully Middling, 18.49; Egyptian Fully Good Fair, 24.00.

SPECIAL MARKET REPORTS.

The following extracts are taken from a report received by the Imperial Ottoman Bank from Basrah, dated May 3:—

A slightly better feeling was noticed on the market, which, however, closed dull and depressed at the end of the week. No stock of grain exists in Basrah. Up country the stocks of the old crop are put at 15,000 tons. Reports on the new crop are not so favourable. It is said that although a larger area has been sown, the harvest will not exceed that of 1924. It is also reported that the date crop is likely to be less than last season on account of the shortness of this year's fruit bearing stems.

AGRICULTURAL OUTLOOK IN BULGARIA.

The following are extracts from the monthly report issued by the Bulgarska Banka, dated May 1:—

According to information from the Ministry of Agriculture, spring sowings are taking place everywhere in Bulgaria under excellent conditions. During the autumn the drought forced cultivators considerably to decrease the area sown. This spring being, by contrast, very favourable, spring sowings will be considerably more than those of last year.

During February the Bulgarian Customs figures were as follows:—Imports, 14,703 tons of goods, valued at 397,000,000 leva, and exports, 46,182 tons, valued at 342,000,000 leva. The figures for the corresponding month in 1923 were:—Imports. 15,744 tons (value 355,000,000 leva), and exports, 33,259 tons (value 352,000,000 leva).

The Ministers of Railways and Finance have examined the question of railway lines which must be constructed or finished shortly. It has been decided to include in this number the following lines:—Sarambey-Legéné-Névrokop, at a cost of 40 million leva; Haskovo-Mostynlé, 20 million leva; Yambol-Kazalagatch, 7 million leva; Bourgas-Anchialo, Karlovo-Plovdiv-Panagurichté, 6 million leva; Levsky-Lovetch (laying of rails), 32 million leva; Béla-Slatina-Rahovo, 20 million leva; Tétéven (central line), 5 million leva; Radomir-Gorna-Djoumaia, 5 million leva.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The Mosul Negotiations.

The breakdown of the Conference at Constantinople over the future of Mosul is to be regretted, not so much from the risk or difficulties attaching to non-settlement of the point at issue, as because the failure shows the Turks still in an intransigent mood and having learnt nothing from the experience of the last nine months. As far as the course of the negotiations can be gathered from the published reports, a fundamental difference of opinion would seem to have manifested itself over the actual purpose of the Conference. The Turks held that they had come to delimit an agreed frontier; Sir Percy Cox explained that the object of the negotiations was to decide where the frontier between Turkey and Irak should be placed. In the absence of a detailed report of the proceedings it would appear as if Fethi Bey, disappointed at finding the British delegation obdurate on the subject of the future status of Mosul, had tried to discover a technical point turning on an interpretation of the Treaty of Lausanne on which to base the breakdown of the Conference, and was willing to ignore the disadvantages accruing to Turkey from abortive negotiations, provided that he could justify his action by a quibble.

Where Turkey Fails.

In many quarters better things will have been hoped for of the Turks. While the Grand National Assembly was in session the difficulties of Mustapha Kemal Pasha were recognised; but it was anticipated that, as soon as he was relieved of the embarrassing attentions of his more extreme followers, who knew nothing about foreign affairs, and could not be expected to appreciate the necessity of placing Turkey's international relations on a more satisfactory footing, he would introduce an entirely new orientation in foreign policy. So far, however, the Turks continue to play into the hands of those —of whom there are many in every country in Europe—who are content to write them down as impossible in the past, and, therefore, impossible for all time. Every other European nation has long since accepted it as an axiom that, without reciprocity and good will, international relations can never run smoothly. The Turkish Government is either indifferent as to whether its relations with foreign countries run smoothly or otherwise, or imagines that, because it was a victor in a campaign against Greece two years ago, it can dispense with reciprocity and good will for ever in its dealings with all other nations.

Irak and the Treaty.

Reports from Baghdad hold out little hope of the Assembly's ratifying the Anglo-Iraki Treaty; but the position in the Assembly is so indeterminate that at the last moment anything may happen. A certain number of deputies appear to have been terrorised into withholding their support from the Treaty, and only the opposition to it is articulate. The Government, however, must be aware of the precarious nature of its own position if the Treaty fails to be ratified, and in spite of its silence at a critical period may prove to have been working on its own lines all the time. Unfortunately, the interpretation placed on the British Government's recent statement in connection with the reference of the subject to the Council of the League of Nations has failed to give pause to the opponents of the Treaty; but it has caused the advocates of ratification to think that rejection may after all not be such a bad thing, as it will lead to the restoration of mandatory control, which they would regard as a blessing for Irak. It is significant of the situation in Irak that there is very little anti-British feeling connected with the opposition to the Treaty. The chief spokesmen set out at first to challenge the wisdom of certain provisions of the supplementary agreements rather than to inveigh against the British connection. The failure of the Government to hold its own against them appears to have encouraged them to make the most of their opportunity to embarrass the present régime, and they have left no stone unturned in trading on the ignorance of the people, with a view to winning support for their campaign against the Government. The next phase in Anglo-Iraki relations is not likely to be decided upon until the fate of the Treaty is definitively known.

Greece and Bulgaria.

It is good news to hear that Greece, of her own initiative, has taken a step to meet Bulgaria's legitimate desire for an Ægean port. The actual offer that has been made is understood to be that Greece should accord to Bulgaria at one of her Ægean coast towns—Kavalla is clearly indicated—a free port and zone corresponding to the arrangement now in existence with Jugoslavia in regard to Salonika. The Sofia correspondent of The Times, in sending this information, adds that probably the League of Nations will be asked to use its good offices for controlling the transit of traffic across Greek territory. At the Lausanne Conference, it will be remembered, the Allied Powers proposed that Bulgaria should receive a narrow strip of territory at Dedeagatch on a ninety-nine years' lease, and that the railway traffic to this port should be under the control of a Commission of the League of Nations. The offer was rejected by Bulgaria on the ground that the actual territory to be leased by Greece was inadequate for the purpose of a port, that the development of Dedeagatch would in effect be undertaken by Bulgaria at her own expense for the benefit of Greece, and that League control offered no adequate security for Bulgarian traffic in the face of Greek opposition.

The Offer of an Outlet.

There are many points in Greece's present offer to Bulgaria which make it far more attractive than any previous proposal to meet the Bulgarian demand for an outlet on the Ægean Sea. First and foremost, it is a voluntary move on Greece's part, and, as such, bespeaks a Greek desire to make a success of any arrangement arrived at between the two countries. In the second place, Kavalla as a port is certainly a great improvement on Dedeagatch. It is to be hoped, therefore, that Bulgaria will accept the invitation to negotiate with Greece on the basis of the offer. The lease of a free zone in Kavalla may not be as satisfactory as a Bulgarian port on the Ægean with a Bulgarian corridor leading to it; but it goes a long way towards meeting the arguments that Bulgaria can put forward for a port and a corridor. If, as a substitute, it can be shown to be an economic failure, the Bulgarian case for a national port and corridor will be stronger than ever. Certainly acceptance of the Greek offer will place the coping-stone on the edifice of scrupulously correct behaviour that Bulgaria in the face of many difficulties has laboriously and successfully set herself to erect since the Armistice.

Roumania.

The wisdom of avoiding scare headings in connection with all information from the Balkans has again been exemplified in regard to recent events in Roumania. From reports of a crisis, the intensity of which varied with the imagination of the informant, it was easy to pass to "fighting in the streets of Bucharest" and to make the members of "the fallen Cabinet" flee from the capital merely added a picturesque touch of verisimilitude to an otherwise bald narrative. The Bratianu Government, however, still remains in power; General Averescu, head of the Popular Party, carried through his protest, but remained true to his promise not to attempt any challenge by force. The meeting of his party was held on the outskirts of the capital, in deference, it is stated, to the appeal of King Ferdinand, who was afraid of a political demonstration on a large scale in the heart of Bucharest, and at the end of it his followers dispersed quietly. This tame ending may not have suited the majority of the Opposition, but it was at once a more patriotic and a more constitutional method of procedure than any effort to force the situation. The Government communiqué betrays considerable relief at the peaceful issue of the Averescu movement, and it is to be hoped that it will profit by the opportunity to win a wider measure of support for its foreign policy.

The Albanian Insurrection.

There is no longer any room for doubt that the Albanians are seeking a solution of their political differences in civil war. Insurgent forces from the north and south continue to advance towards Tirana, but the Government has been able to fight delaying actions. Dissatisfaction seems to centre mainly in the person of Ahmed Bey Zogu, a former Prime Minister, who, although compelled to resign office, has contrived to retain power, and is recognised as the strong man of the party of the Beys. Liberal ideas have penetrated even into Albania, and the present struggle represents the inevitable clash of opinion as to the pace at which the country should traverse the path of progress. Two satisfactory features may be noted: religious differences have so far played no part in the controversy, and Albania appears this time to run no risk of having her domestic difficulties exploited by her neighbours. What is not clear is whether the distress prevailing in Northern Albania has had anything to do with the insurrection, and what effect the insurrection will have on the distress. Considerable sums have been subscribed for the relief of the starving population in Northern Albania, and appeals for further sums have been made, with the view of enabling the districts affected to make a fresh start after the serious famine. Civil war, however, is not an encouragement to foreign relief funds.

Protection for Indian Steel.

The debates on the Bill to protect the Indian steel industry, which has now been passed by the Assembly, have proved to be unexpectedly interesting, and to our mind they mark a distinct advance in practical politics, if not in economics. On the one hand we have a compromise amendment moved, with general approval, by the leader of the party which a few months ago entered the legislature with the declared object of wrecking it from within, and to wreck a legislature by effecting a working compromise is a more difficult task than choking a cat with cream. On the other hand, the decision to exempt some classes of agricultural implements from the protective duties, following, as it does, on the vigorous protests made by country members at an earlier stage, constitutes a formal recognition, almost the first of its kind, that town-bred legislators must take the peasant seriously into account. He may not benefit very largely by this particular decision, but, seeing that the legislature is committed to a general policy of high protection, great importance attaches to this affirmation of the principle that such a policy must be carried out on lines which shall not prejudice his interests.

Extremist Policies.

Outside the legislature, political interest centres just now in the struggle for control of the "National" Congress, which in plain English means the extremist party machine. Mr. Gandhi insists that the Committee of this body should be homogeneous, or, to speak English again, that it should consist of supporters of his policy of non-violent non-co-operation, but while one important section is "co-operating," or something like it, in the legislature, the Bengal wing, usually associated with the name of Mr. Das, has been paying homage to the patriotic devotion of a man who was recently hanged for murder, an attitude which seems to be inconsistent with the doctrine of "non-violence" as it has hitherto been preached. We take it that this pronouncement will set India thinking seriously, and that it may operate to prevent the maintenance of even the outward show of harmony which has hitherto been displayed. Un-happily, it is likely at the same time to encourage some excitable Bengali lads to qualify for similar homage, but that is apparently a small matter to irresponsible politicians busy in trying to get ahead of the competing factions. The outcome of the struggle is not a matter for prophecy at this stage, but its existence gives some ground for hoping that we are on the eve of another step towards reality in the field of Indian politics.

The Punjab.

The worst news from India is the failure of the latest attempt to bring the Sikh question in the Punjab within the sphere of reason, and everyone must be sorry that Sir Edward Maclagan has had to lay down his office with this miserable business unsettled. The failure, however, does not come entirely as a surprise, for the religious motive, which at first gave the movement strength and won for it sympathy, has now almost disappeared, and the militant section aims definitely at a Sikh despotism, a thing which is neither reasonable nor probable. This change in objective seems to be coming home gradually to the Hindus and Moslems, so that the militants can count on less support from outside than formerly, and we take it that the eventual liquidation will depend mainly on the attitude of the rest of India. Deprived of the support of other communities, the militants will probably be unable to overawe the rest of the Sikhs as they have hitherto succeeded in doing, and, when opposition becomes vocal at home, the process of disintegration is likely to operate rapidly, until Sir Malcolm Hailey may find it easy to effect what his predecessor could not accomplish.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Tuesday Morning.

The Whitsun Holiday.

Whitsun in London was, on the whole, a dull time, for the skies were grey and uncertain. The place itself, however, was enlivened—or, at least, had its monotony broken, by the presence of thousands of provincials. These hardy, strange folk from the North and Midlands have been steadily invading London for some weeks past, but the invasion reached its climax over the week-end holiday. The thing, apparently, was to "do" London on the Whit Monday morning, and then for the rest of the day and much of the night to disport oneself at the British Empire Exhibition.

At Wembley, according to all accounts, the crush was simply terrific. Not many Londoners were there, but over 300,000 provincials made the huge grounds of the Exhibition look small. This morning the place must indeed look awful, with paper and orange peel and cigarette ends bestrewing everything, but what of that? The provinces enjoyed themselves, the Exhibition authorities made money; and there's an end on't.

Parliament.

The ups and downs of the present Government grow less interesting as they become more regular, and as Mr. MacDonald survives one "crisis" after another, so his Press opponents moodily put off the approaching General Election. No sooner is the Cabinet faced with disaster over the Unemployment question, than it turns round on its opponents with Mr. Wheatley's Housing Scheme; and it is not probable that the attempt to exploit the Tube strike as an indication of the Government's weakness and partiality will succeed.

Opinion seems gradually to be growing that there will be no General Election at least until next November, and although the heart of the Government may, until that time, beat a little irregularly, its health is not really a matter for anxiety. The only large thing that could conceivably cause palpitation is the Irish question, which almost looks like becoming once more a factor in English politics. But all parties are praying Heaven to forbid this.

The Tube Strike.

The strike on the Tubes which so suddenly overtook London last week met with as sudden and as hurried condemnation by the public. It appeared, moreover, to take by surprise all the "official" people, who have consequently asserted that it is due to Communist influences.

Whether the strikers are justified or not, it is much wiser to refuse to say. Upon almost every strike the papers set up a chorus of the iniquitous, tyrannical methods of the men; but still these things go on. There does not seem to be much doubt that an increasing number of men are preferring organisation of purely economic character to the better-known and more "political" trade unions; in other words, that they are far keener on economic power than on political power.

The Government—we always, and so often in vain, look to the Government for the solution of our difficulties—did itself a strange disservice by declaring that, since the Tubes were not nationalised, this dislocation was none of its affair. This declaration, which will surely not be forgotten by its enemies, confirms too unhappily the gibe that Labour rule tends to be ruled in the interests of a class.

Liberalism.

It is claimed in earnest quarters that Liberalism is now making great strides in the country, but, curiously enough, just as that claim is most loudly being made, something happens which completely stultifies it. In the last few days Commander C. B. Fry has been beaten in the Oxford election by a Conservative candidate, the number of Liberal votes being greatly reduced; and, in the shape of Liberal comments by Mr. Lloyd George upon the Lausanne Treaty, we had one of the poorest and most unstatesmanlike utterances that have been heard in the House of Commons for some time.

With the constructive value of Mr. Lloyd George's Liberal speech I am not here concerned, but it appeared to the layman that what he wanted more than anything was to reduce Mr. Ronald McNeill to pulp. This increasing love of jocularity and indulgence in personalities are being widely noted, and are in strange contrast with the majestic and dignified remoteness of former Liberal leaders.

Votes for Maidens.

The time is not distant now when, in pursuance of the passion for "the equality of the sexes," so beloved of our Liberal and Socialist theoreticians, the vote will be bestowed on girls of the age of twenty-one. The Bill enabling this to be done nearly reached the end of its journey through the House of Commons last week, and the resistance which it encountered was incredibly poor. There was, it is true, a wise and common-sense amendment to make the voting age of women twenty-five, but it was easily defeated. The House is more easily than any assembly carried away by logic or by sentimentality—factors which, of course, weigh heavily on the side of the earlier voting age. But one need only appeal to experience to see how absurd this whole democratic trend is. Granted that there are some girls of twenty-one far more competent than, say, men of thirty-five, to form political opinions, but what of the majority? Its study of home affairs is confined to the reading of the domestic hints which appear on the Woman's

Digitized by Google

Page of our great newspapers, and of foreign affairs to the learning of which cinema or tennis stars are next coming over from France and America.

The Derby.

Although Lord Derby declared on the day before the race that his horse, Sansovino, had had no practice in swimming, people so far discarded his seasonable warning that they made his horse a hot favourite at 9 to 2. How Sansovino raced home well ahead of the field is now a matter of history. What was declared by all who pretended to any knowledge to be the openest Derby on record proved to be a secret most tightly shut in Sansovino's keeping. It was in despite of the rain and the mud (of which practically the whole "summer" has so far consisted) that great, welkin-cracking cheers were given to Lord Derby on his win, so that he became, perhaps even more than when he was War Minister, a great national figure.

The Need of Partiality.

One does not need to be a whole-hearted admirer of Mr. Rudyard Kipling's philosophy to appreciate the soundess of the advice, and particularly its immediate pertinence, which he has just given at Oxford. He was speaking of the Rhodes Scholarship Trust, and referred to the lamentable appearance of tolerance, impartiality, and broad-mindedness in youth. It is true that our youth has become so liberal and so tolerant as to have lost its convictions; it has no direction. No doubt, in complaining of this lack, one lays oneself open to the charge of arrogance and superiority, but it is possible to avoid it and at the same time to plead for more concentration and less circumspection in youthful actions.

The change from the Imperial ideas of, say, the early part of this century is, of course, a mental one: physical pluck is as great as ever it was. But one cannot help feeling that half our Imperial or foreign troubles are due to a lack of conviction on the part of those who are actually attempting to realise British conceptions in distant lands.

The British Legion.

On the occasion of the third annual conference of the British Legion one may note the immense progress that this fine institution has made. Apart from its main ideal—the conservation of that comradeship which was the finest and, in the long run, the most memorable product of the War—the Legion has been of very practical national value in the provision of employment and in the relief of distress.

To many men it is the best moulding influence possible, broadening yet intimate. All the attempts that have occasionally been made to introduce party politics into it have most happily failed, and it is now probably the best organised force for good that there is in the nation. Its link with the present time is so healthy precisely because it remembers so well of the past that which should be remembered.

The Indian Libel Case.

The libel action which Sir Michael O'Dwyer brought, and won, against Sir Sankaran Nair created a great deal of interest, and the attitude formed by the average Briton, not intimately acquainted with Indian affairs, was on the whole that justice had been done. It is true that there were here and there a few who apparently preferred that the possible consequences upon India should be the first and last consideration in the case, but, as I say, the majority, as far as I can make out, were in favour of justice being done though the heavens should fall. In particular, the public were pleased with the way in which the soldiers gave evidence.

Rodeo.

For some time an attempt has been persistently made to prevent the holding at the British Empire Exhibition of the entertainment known as "Rodeo," and last week the matter was raised in the House of Lords upon the alleged cruelty to animals incurred. By the "humanitarian" section of the Press war has been waged for many weeks past against the organisers of "Rodeo," who have been so much incensed by this as to refuse permission to officers of the R.S.P.C.A. to examine the entertainment.

It is impossible for one who has never seen this sport to have views on the question, and one has to be as non-committal as is the Government. I know people who have seen it in America and Canada who deny and assert, respectively, that it is cruel.

Alter Ego.

UNUSUAL MINIATURES.

The art of the miniature is a cultured and refined art, but it has tended recently towards sterility, owing to its preoccupation with the representation of living people. In the exhibition which Mrs. Winifred Brunton and Miss Violet Brunton are giving at the Arlington Gallery, however, this art is put to an unusual and most refreshing use.

This exhibition was declared open on June 3 by Sir Valentine Chirol, who was deputising for General Sir John Maxwell. He spoke of the way in which Mrs. Brunton had, in her miniatures of the Pharaohs and Queens of Egypt, made living personalities, and as instance of this art, pointed to the representation of the bronze statue of Pepy I., and underneath it, the conception by the artist of the King as a vital creature. One really, in looking at these miniatures, felt face to face with existing people. Of the work of Miss Brunton (in no way, incidentally, related to Mrs. Brunton) Sir Valentine was more diffident in speaking, for her pictures, which consisted for the most part of ironical or symbolical or allegorical commentaries on texts from "Ecclesiasticus," belonged more to the unfamiliar world of imagination. But they were extremely stimulating, and, for him, threw new light on the scriptural book.

It is, indeed, difficult to overpraise the work of these two artists, so perfect, and yet far from being precious, it is. There is extraordinary subtlety and wealth in such pictures as Mrs. Brunton's "The Nile," or in "Demeter Mourning, 1916," while, as instance of her power on a broader scale, a magnificent winter-study of "The Temple of Rameses III., Karnak—flood-time," may be mentioned. Alike in minutest detail and in strength of general conception, Mrs. Brunton excels, and it is, perhaps, when her imagination is most called upon that she mostly succeeds. Compare, for example, the potent suggestion of "Rameses II., XIXth Dynasty," with the somewhat missed opportunity of "Miss Jelly d'Aranyi."

With the delicate fantasies of Miss Brunton's work this is not so much the place to deal, but she, too, indulges occasionally in definitely Eastern subjects. She brings to life Tutankhamen and his bride, and some Roman Emperors. Her pictures, delightful frames for which she has carved herself, derive from that very pleasant ground somewhere between ingenuity and genius, but generally approximating the latter.

Altogether, this exhibition, which closes tomorrow (June 13), is one of the most fascinating now to be seen in London.

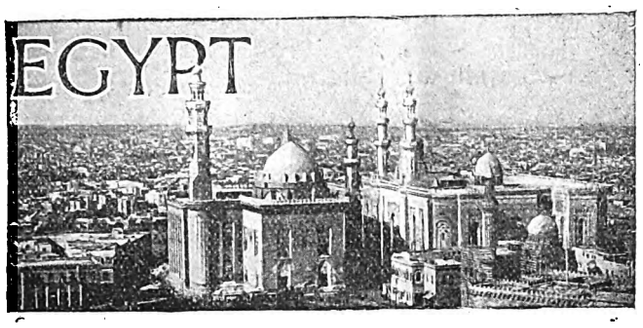
The Near and Middle East.*

From Our Own Correspondents.



Cairo, June 1.

Still Waiting.

There is no news yet of any definite step towards negotiations between the British and Egyptian Governments being taken by either side, and, in the absence of reliable information, rumours spring up and spread amazingly. The Premier's vague references to "obstacles in the path" are variously interpreted according to the political leanings of the person concerned. Meanwhile it is evident that the longer the Premier remains here the less probable does it become that he will ever go at all. The opposition is small and, for effective action of its own, almost powerless, but manages, nevertheless, to put a good many spokes in the wheel of the Ministry.

Scourging the Opposition.

The Government continues its work of showing the country what monsters of iniquity were the Ministers—and the officials who served under them—of former Cabinets. Scarcely a day passes without some new "horrible revelation" of corruption, and the Zaghloulist newspapers hint gleefully at the impending trial of numerous well-known non-Zaghloulists. So far, an Under Secretary of State for Agriculture, a Governor, and two inspectors of examination papers are all that have actually been referred to Councils of Discipline. With the present Government in power and political feeling as it is to-day, it may go hard with any Liberal Constitutional who has to stand his trial. In hundreds of cases of officials whose pre-parliamentary devotion to Zaghloulism was not very marked, there is no question of a trial; an administrative order relieves them of their posts, and that is an end of it. A hundred and ten omdas in Behera Province alone have been so served, and the purging process is going on throughout the country.

Communists on Trial.

The Communist scare which was caused by the recent Labour disputes in Alexandria has had its sequel in a Government inquiry into the doings of the local Communist Party. The inquiry is now ended, the party broken up, and eleven of its leaders are in prison awaiting trial on charges of conspiring against the security of the State.

From Prison to Parliament.

Abdel Rahman Bey Fahmy gained much publicity four years ago during the Vengeance Society trial, as a result of which he was sentenced to death, and to-day he has won fame of another sort, for on Thursday, in the Abdin bye-election, he defeated Hafez Bey Ramadan, leader of the Nationalist Party, by the crushing margin of 238 votes to 37. The result seems to show that the vigorous anti-Zaghloul campaign lately waged by the Opposition has not had much effect, at any rate, in the Abdin district.

Mahmoud Sidky Pasha.

The death on Friday night of Mahmoud Sidky Pasha deprives the Opposition in the Chamber of one of its leaders. He was a man of no great political distinction, but was valuable to the Liberal-Nationalist Opposition combine, for he had been elected as a Zaghloulist, and had gone over to the other side because of dissatisfaction with the Government's policy.

Egypt's Foreign Trade.

The foreign trade statistics for the first three months of the year, just published, show that Egypt continues to prosper. There is an increase in most categories, while exports, at £E19,003,596, are £E7,292,948 ahead of imports. Cotton exports are a million and a half higher than for the similar period of last year. On the other hand, the cigarette exports continue to decline, and have now reached the insignificant level of £E87,909 for the three months.

Power Generation in the Fayoum.

An interesting contract has just been secured by two Cairo firms—Messrs. Sulzer Frères, who handle turbines, and Messrs. Bruhlmann, electrical engineers—for the installation of a power generating plant on the Bahr Yousseff, the river of the Fayoum, which makes several falls on its way to discharge in Lake Karun. Egypt is almost devoid of sources of natural power, and the Fayoum venture will be watched with interest.

Promoting Tourism.

The annual general meeting of the Egypt Promotion Association last week revealed the fact that the past winter has been a record for Egypt where the number of visitors is concerned. It is estimated that 45 per cent. more tourists came to Egypt than in any previous winter. Less satisfactory was the chairman's statement that the Association is wilting for lack of support, and, if substantially increased subscriptions are not forthcoming this year, will have to curtail its invaluable work.

of the Mediterranean Fleet, under the command of Admiral Sir Osmond de B. Brock, who has been in Cairo staying as the guest of the High Commissioner.

A dinner of past and present members of the Turf Club, Cairo, is to be held at Oddenino's Restaurant, London, on July 2. Sir Henry McMahon will preside.

Shepheard's Hotel is closed for the first time in its history. The historic event, which occurred yesterday, has been made possible by the grouping of all Cairo's large hotels under one direction, thus eliminating competition. The Continental-Savoy and the National are the only two of the larger hotels now open.

ALBANIA.

Tirana, June 5.

The Recognition of Guraquki.

The hopes of a peaceful outcome of the events following the murder of Avli Rustem have not been realised. Ahmet Zogu's provocative speech, in which he practically appealed to the Mohammedan elements of Central Albania to rally round him to withstand the encroachments of the Christians, ended, as was expected, with the resignation of Louis Guraquki, the Catholic leader of the Liberal Party, who had only shortly before been persuaded to accept the post of Minister of Finance.

M. Guraquki's resignation stiffened again the attitude of the Southern deputies, assembled at Valona, many of whom, fearing that a really grave disturbance might mean throwing the country into the hands of its enemies, had been weakening in their intention of refusing to assemble at the capital after the Easter-cum-Ramadan vacation. A clear intimation, moreover, by Signor Mussolini that the Italian Government considered the troubles in Albania as a matter of purely Albanian concern, warranted the belief that Italy would not tolerate any interference by third parties. Consequently the overtures of Sami Bey Vrioni sent down by the Tirana Government to treat with the Southern deputies at Valona were rejected. Only on condition that Ahmet Zogu and certain other persons named quitted the country, and that a purely Nationalist (Liberal) Ministry were formed, would the Southern deputies consent to return to the capital.

North and South.

Meanwhile a manifesto was issued from Scutari above the signatures of Guraquki and Colonel Shala, Commandant of the Northern regiments, and other notables, inviting the whole of Parliament to meet at Scutari. The Southern deputies naturally accepted the invitation, but had no need to repair to Scutari; for the manifesto was met by a flat refusal on the part of the Tirana Government and the immediate convocation of the Government majority in the capital. Parliament was declared open. Orders were sent to dismiss Colonel Shala. Three classes of recruits were called up in the centre.

The reply of the North and South was the declaration of martial law, the constitution of a provisional administration—in the North under Guraquki, in the South under Suleiman Bey Delvine and Bishop Fan Noli. Colonel Shala was confirmed in his command of the Northern troops, while Colonel Kazim Kiagezezi took command in the South together with Major Shefqet Kortcha, Commander of the Gendarmerie. Contact was established by sea between Scutari and Valona, and it was determined to lose no time in marching on Tirana.

The Ministry Reconstituted.

Thereupon the central Ministry resigned, and was reconstituted under Elias Bey Vrioni, a man respected by all parties as above personal ambitions and a true patriot. He agreed to take up the burden of office at this critical moment, in the hope that his good name would induce the revolutionaries to consent to a compromise. His Cabinet contains the name of Mustaf Arinisi, the Minister of War in the former Ministry, and that of Abdurahman Dibra, one of Zogu's firmest supporters. Matters, however, had now gone too far. Fighting had become inevitable. If Elias Bey Vrioni had been charged with the formation of a Ministry a month ago, civil war might have been avoided. Now it was too late.

The greatest enthusiasm prevails in the South, which is practically solid on the side of the Nationalists. After sharp fighting, Piskope, on Lake Ochrida, Berat, and Fieri have been captured. It is rumoured that the River Skumbi has already been reached by the Southern troops; while in the North Shala has captured Alessio and has reached the River Mati. The old guerilla chieftain, Bairam Tsuri, is meanwhile leading a band of irregulars down the eastern frontier, with the object of cutting off Tirana from any communications with Kossovo.

The Situation at Tirana.

It looks as if the situation of the Tirana Government must be desperate. It represents nothing in Albania but the feudal interests of certain families loath to give up the privileged position they had acquired under the rule of the Turks, and backed by Ahmet Zogu, who despises the Liberals of the North and South, and seeks to make himself ruler of the country, or at least a part of it, even at the sacrifice of the rest.

Tirana, however, occupies a very strong strategical position. It is completely surrounded by high mountains except towards the sea. The passes through the mountains could be defended by a few hundreds of really resolute men, while the Revolutionaries, possessing no fleet, are unable to turn the position by capturing Durazzo from the sea. Zogu, too, is a man of the greatest energy with a gift for leadership. Nevertheless, given the undoubted fact that right and the best interests of Albania are all on the side of the Nationalists, and that the latter enjoy the support of the vast majority of the peasants and professional classes, the fall of Tirana may with fair confidence be predicted. The attitude of the Italian Government in insisting on a true neutrality has had the effect of losing for Zogu the support he hoped to obtain through Yugoslavia; for the latter has followed

Italy's lead, and has discountenanced any adventures over the border. It is true the British Minister, whose successful intervention at the time of the attempted revolution in March, 1922, no doubt constituted a very great service to Albania, is credited with making great efforts to bring about a compromise between the contending parties. It is to be hoped, however, that this rumour is untrue, for a compromise would in the present circumstances be undesirable. Albania is sick of Ahmet Zogu's rule, and is determined to end the power of the feudal Beys. Attempts to bring about a compromise now would only stiffen the Central Government in its resistance in the hope of a compromise being reached; whereas if this were out of the question, the collapse of the Central Government would be hastened. At the same time there is no doubt that a complete victory by the Nationalists would be the best solution in the interests of Albania.

TURKEY.

Constantinople, June 3.

A Period of Suspense.

For the past week the Press and the public have been going through a nervous crisis, which has reached an acute stage at the moment of writing. The component parts of the crisis are the reported deadlock in the Mosul pourparlers, and a reported concentration of Italian troops in the islands of the Dodecanese.

The Press reports on the Mosul negotiations appear to be thoroughly well organised, and no journalistic indiscretions of any significance have been perpetrated. The papers' main preoccupation has been to find a number of recondite reasons for what they are pleased to call the intransigent attitude of the British, and the present British Government is apostrophised more in sorrow than in anger for tamely allowing itself to follow the dreadful Curzon influence of the Foreign Office; incidentally, one phase of this attitude was shown in a number of criticisms of the personality of Sir Percy Cox, who was accused of being the political heir and representative of Lord Curzon, and of exerting an influence contrary to the spirit of the Labour Government.

Turkey and Italy.

The excitement of the past three days over the reported Italian concentrations in the Dodecanese appeared at first to be designed as a means of diverting public attention from the negotiations with the British, but this morning's leading articles show the affair in a new light. According to the writers of these articles, the recent visit of the Italian Sovereigns to London, the conclusion of the Italo-British agreement on the Jubaland question, and so on, demonstrate the active co-ordination of Italian and British foreign policy, and, ergo, the transference of four Italian regiments (sic) from the troops concentrated in Sicily to the islands of the Dodecanese in close proximity to the Southern Anatolian coast must have some connection with the difficult phase through which the Anglo-Turkish negotiations are passing. It is impossible to say whether any or all of this is true or false, but it is undoubted that such a unanimous Press clamour must be inspired by official milieux; in any case, the Italian diplomatic representatives are said to be protesting in their turn to Adnan Bey against this unjustifiable Press propaganda.

The Internal Situation.

These purple patches in the progress of Turkey's foreign relations are diverting attention from the internal situation, which is unchanged and unsatisfactory. The oysterlike silence of the Government departments and their refusal to give authoritative information on current events since the prorogation of the Assembly is adversely criticised, and people are beginning to long for the good old days when the Assembly could be depended upon for a regular supply of sensational disclosures. The last straw has been added by the new Director of the Police at Constantinople, who refused to give the newspaper reporters making their daily visit the usual police-court tit-bits concerning murders, highway robberies, and motor accidents, which have from time immemorial brightened the third page of the somewhat exiguous daily journals. This does seem a little hard and of doubtful wisdom, for the public here, as everywhere else, can be kept in a moderately cheerful state of mind as long as it is provided with its usual dose of horrors.

CYPRUS.

Nicosia, May 26.

The Present Outlook.

One of the principal causes that have retarded progress in Cyprus has always been found in the fact that it was not a British possession, but only administered conditionally by Britain for the Sultan of Turkey. So anomalous was the situation from 1878 to 1914 that the investment of foreign capital in the island could not be looked for. It has now been a British possession for nearly ten years, and if it is to remain one, it would seem high time that more attention should be given to its interests—to some extent admittedly neglected. Much is being written in the island Press on its more pressing needs, and praiseworthy efforts have been made in order that its products, so little known, might be worthily represented in the Cyprus Pavilion at Wembley. The year seems marked out as one in which a fresh start should be made in the development of the island's agricultural and industrial resources. The more so as in the present year a considerable failure of the cereal crops is threatened. The Greek Press frequently reproaches the Government for negligence in bringing about all kinds of reforms in the field of agriculture; but the tone adopted is generally somewhat unreasonable, as it is apt to ignore the Greek proverb that God helps those who help themselves. It is, therefore, satisfactory to note that the Nicosia paper, Phoné tes Kyprou ("Voice of Cyprus"), in a recent article, admits that the Cypriot peasant is just as much to blame as the Government, on account of his sluggishness and want of enterprise, in clinging to antiquated methods, and failure to adopt obviously needed improvements which are now within his reach.

Among the industries which undoubtedly call for development without loss of time is that of silk. The recent pronouncements in London as to the excellence of Cyprus cocoons and reeled silk have given great satisfaction in the island. But it is essential that the mulberry tree should be much more widely cultivated. It may be that the castor-oil tree, which grows luxuriantly when cultivated in Cyprus, could play an important part, as in Japan, and probably elsewhere. Of crops which are cultivated in the island, flax and cotton should be grown far more widely. The quality of both these products is excellent, and their exportation would add considerably to the wealth of Cyprus. But all these considerations bring one back to the one great and crying need of the island—that of increased irrigation. On this subject many articles are now being written, and resolutions passed by bodies of agriculturists.

The Need of Water.

Half of the cultivated land of Cyprus lies fallow every other year, the areas irrigated by perennial torrents being very few indeed. That is to say that if water could be adequately supplied by artificial means, the yield of cereals could be doubled; while an immense impulse would be given to other branches of agriculture, such as fruit cultivation and market gardening, besides those already mentioned. Cypriots have just been disheartened by the information that all idea of successful results from artesian borings must be abandoned, as geological evidence indicates that no supplies can be obtained from this source. The information does not appear to be official, and the Press is by no means satisfied that this is the case. The borings carried out so far were not, they say, undertaken in accordance with such expert advice as circumstances demanded, but only by the Public Works Department, which does not possess special knowledge. They hold, therefore, that this important problem should be put fully to the test, and the question set at rest, as far as it can be. Unfortunately, the storage works which were carried out in the east of the island, at a cost of £80,000, were not a success. They were executed under an official of experience from India; but, for reasons which it is needless to enter into here, they have proved a failure; and the collection of water in other parts of the island has consequently not been attempted. There is, accordingly, a strong opinion that, since the need of artificial irrigation is so absolutely necessary for increased production on any sufficient scale, either money should be provided for further exhaustive experiments, or an authoritative official pronouncement should be made on the subject. The Phoné, which is fertile in suggesting parables, observes that the Government is like a physician who, without sufficient examination, pronounces a patient to be incurable. Would the friends of such a patient rest satisfied with this or call in a specialist? Certainly the latter. So ought the Government to obtain the advice of the best (American) experts.

IRAK.

Baghdad, May 21.

The Anglo-Irak Treaty.

Little progress has been made with the Treaty. The committee appointed to study the terms, having exhausted its ingenuity in finding further pretexts for delay, has at last submitted a gigantic report containing, it is said, almost as many suggestions for emendation as the Treaty has clauses. Not to be outdone in the matter of procrastination, the Constituent Assembly has adjourned for ten days (until May 30), to give its members an opportunity of digesting the committee's recommendations—an unprofitable occupation, in view of the British Government's declaration that the only alternatives are ratification or rejection, amendments being inadmissible.

Among the British community in Baghdad are many who view these repeated postponements as intentional, and consider it undignified for Great Britain to remain in a country which thus slights its offer of alliance. They urge evacuation or withdrawal to Basra, on the grounds that any obligations which the British Government might have considered binding are now no longer so in the light of the Assembly's attitude to the Treaty. England would thus, they argue, be able to free herself from the embarrassment of a mandate which is unpopular at home, gives rise throughout the Near East to suspicions of ulterior motives, and is prejudicial to our friendship with Persia, Turkey, and the Muslims of India—a friendship already severely tried by our continued presence in this country. On the other hand, some are of opinion that the British demands made in the Treaty, while constituting an inadequate return for the services rendered to Irak, are nevertheless too heavy for so young a State to bear, and would result in stunting its growth at the very outset, while indefinitely retarding its growth by the severity of the financial clauses. Those who hold these views do not favour the "take it or leave it" attitude adopted by the British Government, fearing that a treaty accepted through sheer force of necessity can only be so accepted at the sacrifice of the existing friendship and good will between the two countries. But to the man in the street the aims of governments are inscrutable. Perhaps, like a surgeon who can save his patient's life by an operation for which he demands a high but not unreasonable fee, H.M.'s Government feels that the Treaty, though accepted with grumbling at the high price, will bring to Irak such benefits that gratitude will prevail over any other feeling. More likely, England is playing the rôle of a stern schoolmaster, bringing a pack of foolish boys to their senses. Her patience might well by this time be exhausted by the fulminations of the local Press and the puerile utterances of the leaders of the political factions in Baghdad.

It is difficult to understand the psychology of those who talk glibly of national aspirations and the "grievous bondage" with which the country will be afflicted under the Treaty, when at the same time they object to the stipulation that in future 25 per cent. of Irak's Budget must be devoted to the creation of an Arab Army to replace the British forces in the country—forces the maintenance of which costs England considerably more than the whole income of Irak. They have yet to learn that national aspirations can only be attained by national sacrifice. Strange, also, to hear the Treaty, which promises generous aid in the building up of the new State, referred to as one which "robs the country of its rights"; and those patriots are unwise who complain of slights to the national honour, when British officials are daily hampered in their work of leading Irak towards the desired goal of independence by the inefficiency and corruption of the native administration.

Perhaps, by insisting that the Treaty be ratified or rejected as it stands, Great Britain wishes to bring home to the people the source from which is derived that security which they have now enjoyed for years, and have come to regard almost as a matter of course. Such services can hardly be made the subject of petty bartering; and in any case, England has promised that if, after ratification time shows that the terms of the Treaty press with undue heaviness upon the country, she is prepared to modify them.

EGYPT AND LANCASHIRE.

The interdependence of Egypt and Lancashire was the keynote of the visit paid last week by Aziz Izzet Pasha, Egyptian Minister in London, to Manchester, where his Excellency was the guest, in turn, of the Manchester Cotton Association and of the Manchester Ship Canal. Whatever may be the political relations between Great Britain and Egypt, the importance of keeping on a friendly as well as a practical business footing the vital connection between the Lancashire cotton industry and the Egyptian producer of raw cotton is recognised on both sides, and accordingly the Manchester representatives of that industry took the first opportunity that presented itself of inviting the new Egyptian Minister to their city. Arriving in Manchester at midday on June 4, accompanied by Fikri Bey, Third Secretary of Legation, Aziz Izzet Pasha was the guest of the Cotton Association at luncheon at the Midland Hotel. On the conclusion of the luncheon a visit was paid to the new Exchange, the largest building of its kind in the world. From there the Minister was driven to the docks, and, boarding a tug, was taken for a short tour of the canal under the personal escort of Captain W. C. Bacon, chairman of the Ship Canal Company; Mr. Ernest Latimer, managing director; and Mr. Gibson, general superintendent. The large number of steamers in dock, loading or unloading, testified to the activities of Manchester to-day as a port; a warehouse containing a large shipment of Egyptian cotton, recently landed from a Prince Line steamer, was inspected, and the tour come to an end at the head of the huge No. 9 dock, flanked by its imposing half-mile of warehouses. Returning to the city, Aziz Izzet Pasha took tea with the Lord Mayor at the Town Hall, and in the evening was the guest of the Manchester Ship Canal Company at dinner in the Midland Hotel.

At the luncheon given by the Manchester Cotton Association Mr. Jesse Thorpe, President of the Association, was in the chair. The toast of the Egyptian Minister was proposed by Mr. John Peel, head of one of the largest and oldest firms of cotton merchants, and seconded by Mr. William Howarth, whose firm takes one-tenth of the total exports of Egyptian cotton. Both speakers touched upon matters of practical concern to the cotton industry. Mr. Peel spoke of Lancashire's need of long-stapled cotton suitable for the fine counts in which it had always been pre-eminent, and Mr. Howarth referred to signs of deterioration in Egyptian cotton, due apparently to carelessness and relaxation of supervision.

In his reply, Aziz Izzet Pasha said that, because he realised the necessity of Britain and Egypt remaining on good and friendly business terms, he wished to lay before his hearers quite frankly the Egyptian point of view concerning the questions that are agitating British and Egyptian minds at the present moment. He continued :—

We are drawn to one another by means of interests which are at once commercial and economical. It is necessary that Egypt should produce more and more cotton, and England must be in a position to buy our supplies. To this end Egypt, however, should be perfectly unhampered and unrestricted, within her own natural and rightful geographical limits. By the expression "natural geographical limits" I mean the whole Nile Valley, as that valley, from its sources to the Mediterranean, as you are aware, constitutes one whole and entire unit, geographical, economic and strategical, the vital interest of which organic unit opposes every and any separation of its component parts. Egypt does not claim anything outside these boundaries, nor can it dispense with any member or organ of its body politic and economic. In the recent past, before the reforming hand of the Great Mohamed Aly, the founder of the present dynasty, transformed the monumental system of irrigation from a natural to a perennial one, the water required was easily, but primitively, procurable for the purposes of summer or flood cultivation, which excluded cotton production. The production of this staple crop, which he so sagaciously introduced, consequent on this transformation of water supply, made Egypt rich and brought it more in touch with Lancashire, but it has also made it utterly dependent on the skill of the engineer, for the storing and regulating of its water supply, which is necessary for cotton production, from that time onward. Accordingly a huge system of reservoirs, barrages, and dams was resorted to, several of which have already been constructed and others are awaiting construction. This series of waterworks are scattered at intervals along the whole length of the Nile, but are all interdependent, interconnected, and must be watched, controlled, and directed by one and the same authority. It is evidently clear that this directing authority, considering the vital interests which it manipulates, can be the most omnipotent in the land. Any intentional or unintentional mishandling of its power of dispensing the life-giving fluid will have fatal results to the lives and properties of the people under its control. Egypt can be divided into three parts—the Sudan, Nubia, and Lower Egypt. If you forcibly interfere with any of these portions, you cripple us; but if you attempt, by any surgical operation, to deprive us of a vital portion, such as the Sudan, then our life is utterly destroyed.

Now I come to the question: "Are British interests and possessions in the Far East jeopardised by evacuating Egypt?" To that query I beg to submit the following answer—that such a step would not only contribute to the material interests and strength of England, but would also redound to her honour in having kept her word and redeemed her solemn pledges and obligations, and thereby re-establishing international morality at a moment when the world is in sore need of such a noble example. I maintain that the evacuation of Egypt cannot possibly injure British interests, nor can it lead to any strategic danger from any quarter whatsoever to British possessions in the Far East. You may be absolutely sure and certain that as long as you retain command of the seas, no earthly danger can ever interfere with your communications. But if by any misfortune you lose that mastery, then the retention, not only of Egypt, but of most of your real possessions, would be impossible, and these very islands would be in danger.

I ask you, as one friend to another, to give this matter your earnest and deep consideration, as it is a question of life and death to us. Egypt desires to be your best cotton producer and your true friend, on the basis of fair and honest business lines, which guarantee your commercial and economic interests. Egypt seeks no territorial aggrandisement, neither can she allow herself to yield any of her natural, legitimate, as well as vital rights—rights to which you have pledged the honour of Great Britain to respect. It is my fervent desire that you should thoroughly grasp the Egyptian aspect of the question, which I am sure must commend itself to your sound and right judgment, for it is well known that what Lancashire thinks to-day England will say to-morrow.

The dinner given in honour of the Egyptian Minister by the Manchester Ship Canal Company was presided over by Captain W. C. Bacon, chairman of the company, who in a felicitous speech proposed the toast of "The Prosperity of the Kingdom of Egypt." He was supported by Dr. Réa, President of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce. In replying, Aziz Izzet Pasha craved the indulgence of his audience if he wandered from the subjects which his hosts had touched upon and spoke of matters which, as an Egyptian, he had very near his heart at this time.

After a reference to the visit that he had paid that afternoon to the Ship Canal, he pointed out that Lancashire manufacturers and Egyptian growers were commercially inter-dependent one upon the other, and asked that adjustment of the interests of Great Britain and Egypt in the Nile Valley should be sought along lines of business honesty and friendship. It should not be beyond the power of statesmen and commercial men of both nations to devise some plan whereby the interests of both parties could be honourably and mutually safeguarded and secured by means of the usual economic and legal methods adopted between nations who respected one another and who mutually conceded adequate guarantees without seeking unfair advantages.

Explaining why Egyptians regarded the Sudan as an integral part of the kingdom, his Excellency pointed out that the agriculture and life of rainless Egypt depended upon the Nile and its sources. It was within the power of the controller of the Nile dams to give one province more water than its quota, and by so doing to increase its wealth and impoverish the rest. Those who held the control of water in Egypt controlled its politics, its military position, its economic activities, and in fact the very life of the nation.

Egypt was confident that the obvious nature of her sacred rights would put an end to all possible controversies respecting her absolute and effective sovereignty in the Sudan. There was a distinction between the positions of Great Britain and Egypt. British interests in the Nile Valley are only commercial and economical, but for Egypt the question is an essentially vital one. "It is a question of life and death."

Egypt also needed the Sudan as an outlet for surplus population. Izzet Pasha said that if Great Britain were prepared to consider not only its own interests but the vital interests of Egypt, adhering in reality to the great principles of Free Trade and free exchange which Manchester first promulgated to a world too often inclined to be selfish, he believed that the two countries would be able to adjust their respective interests along the accepted lines of business honesty and friendship. In the long run business only prospered when mutual interests were duly studied. This essential truth had always been looked upon as one of the principles proclaimed by the Manchester school of thought.

As a result of the exchange of views between the Cotton Association and the Egyptian Minister, it was arranged that a memorandum should be sent to the latter setting forth the various points connected with the growing and marketing of cotton, in regard to which the manufacturers hold that the Egyptians are neglecting their own interests by paying insufficient attention to Lancashire's requirements. This memorandum the Minister undertook to submit to the careful notice of the Egyptian Government.

In the morning of June 5 Aziz Izzet Pasha met the Egyptian students of Manchester University, and a photograph of the gathering was taken. His Excellency returned to London in the afternoon.

THE LEBANON HOSPITAL FOR MENTAL DISEASES.

The annual meeting of the Lebanon Mental Hospital at Asfuriyeh, Beyrout, Syria, was held on June 3 at the Caxton Hall, Westminster. The chairman, Dr. E. W. G. Masterman, in speaking on the outstanding points of the work of the year just passed, referred to the recent visit of the director, when they had been able to confer with him on many things. Dr. Watson Smith had been at Asfuriyeh fifteen years out of the twenty-five years the hospital has been going, and he had worked with extraordinary zeal and devotion.

The electric light installation has proved an unqualified success. The thing they most rejoiced in is that at last the boring for water has been accomplished, and, after going 300 ft., water had been reached, and had risen considerably in the borehole. There is every reason to believe there will not only be enough water for the hospital needs, but that now it is possible to have a steam laundry and to develop a home farm, with dairy and vegetable garden, which will go a considerable extent towards making the hospital self-supporting, and reduce the cost of maintenance.

The hospital work is on a scientific basis, and Dr. Watson Smith is anxious that the opportunities there should be used for research and the development of the pathological side and teaching. Already the director is giving instruction to students of the American University in Beyrout, who will in future be the prominent men of the profession in the Near East. This is a very important thing, because the work is not only philanthropic but educational.

Rev. E. M. Bickersteth, of Jerusalem and the East Mission, in moving the adoption of the report, said that he was at Asfuriyeh a little over two months ago, and spoke of the importance of the training of students, who would be scattered, and what an influence the hospital must have over these men. He had great pleasure in speaking because on all sides he had made inquiries about this hospital, and he saw it for himself, and not only would Syria and Palestine owe a debt to it, but all the Near East, because it is undoubtedly leading the way in the treatment of mental disease.

Mr. Herbert Catford, in seconding, said that he had just visited Beyrout, and referred to the work of the founder, the late Theophilus Waldmeier, that he had builded better than he knew in the site for the hospital. Beyrout, in an extraordinary way which no one could have foreseen, has become the starting-point for the overland road to Baghdad, and is now within ten or eleven hours' easy motor ride to Jerusalem; and, again, it has the only University in Palestine or Syria, and is now, owing to the increased easiness of transit, getting quite a large number of students from Mesopotamia.

Mr. Peter Bartleman, head attendant at Asfuriyeh, at home on furlough, spoke on the growth of the institution since he went to it five years ago, and of the variety of nationalities and religions represented in the patients treated. A service is held each Sunday in the John Cory Hall, at which all patients who are able attend. There is no longer, as formerly, any difficulty in getting male and female nurses from the country around..

A copy of the 1923-24 report will be sent to anyone on application to the Secretary, Lebanon Hospital Office, 35, Queen Victoria Street, E.C.4.

STUDIES OF THE NILE.

Among the water-colour drawings and paintings which Lady Swinburne is exhibiting at W. B. Paterson's Gallery, 5, Old Bond Street, W., are several studies of the Nile. Lady Swinburne tends, perhaps, a little towards the nebulous and the timid in her water-colours, but in at least one of her Eastern sketches, "The Nile, Sunset," she succeeds in capturing the delicate essence of the matter, and the flecking of the light in the sails of the dahabiyeh is nicely managed. Her oil paintings of the Nile are more robust, but possibly less satisfying. Her most ambitious picture is the "Temple of Medinet, Aban," in which she takes a bold architectural flight, and only just misses success. Other paintings include studies of Tangier, Luxor, and Cairo.

THE ARAB PROBLEM.

The appearance on public platforms in England of two or more British ex-officials who have recently vacated administrative posts in the Middle East and have returned with the avowed object of devoting themselves to "the Arab cause" may not attract much attention in this country, but will inevitably be used to serve the purpose of Arab agitators, and can hardly fail to place further difficulties in the way of those who are responsible for ordered government in the Middle East. It may be of interest, therefore, to examine the statements of these well-meaning individuals with a view to discovering what their actual charges against the present status are, and what are the remedies that they propose. At the outset they may be acquitted of mere self-seeking or of aiming at a cheap form of notoriety; their earnestness and sincerity can still be above question, even though they betray a not unnatural dissatisfaction at having failed to win for themselves and for the cause they have at heart the appreciation to which they consider both to be entitled. It is, perhaps, their single-minded devotion to their own point of view that has prevented them from realising how many people are favourably disposed to the Arab cause who could never allow themselves to be identified with the methods that these enthusiasts would adopt for promoting it. On whatever ground they urge their case, whether on that of justice, expediency, or national self-interest, they are confronted with innumerable difficulties which are so apparent to others, while they themselves affect to ignore them. It displays little respect for the intelligence of an audience to urge, as one speaker has, in one and the same breath that Irak and Palestine should be evacuated within four months or four weeks, and that simultaneously a force recruited abroad or officered from abroad should be left behind capable of defending Arabia against Turkey, who within the last two years has had 200,000 men in the field. It is inevitable that the native agitator should refuse to consider anything outside what are called the national aspirations; but the British public does expect some capacity for broadmindedness and a long-sighted view from those who have held positions of authority among the Arabs.

It is common ground that the Arab question has been handled by Great Britain in a most unfortunate way; on the other hand, any impartial observer will feel constrained to admit that good reasons can be adduced for every step taken at the time. Certainly is this the case with the promises made to King Hussein, and perhaps only in a lesser degree with the Balfour Declaration. That the problem presents a serious tangle goes without saying, and the more serious the tangle the less likelihood that the unravelling can be achieved by any one simple operation. The most foolish suggestion that can be made is that a solution of the Arab question can be found by Great Britain alone without reference to France. It is not clear what authority there is for the assertion that France is in Syria only because Great Britain is in Irak and Palestine, and that the French are prepared to withdraw as soon as the British surrender their mandates. There can be little doubt that the recognition accorded to British influence in certain parts of the Arab world followed merely as a corollary French insistence upon an exclusive paramountcy in Syria north of Palestine. It may be true that public opinion in France has been undergoing a change in regard to the advantages accruing from the attempt to hold Syria against the wishes of the majority of the inhabitants, but there is a large gulf between that stage and evacuation. The Anglo-French proclamation of November, 1918, originated with Great Britain, and was only grudgingly assented to by France; it is in French mandated territory alone that the promises which it held out have been so glaringly falsified. The agitation in Palestine is directed less against the British mandate than against the interpretation placed by extreme Zionists upon the Balfour Declaration; in Irak, if there was any prompting in the selection of King Faisal as ruler, it did no violence to any settled convictions of the inhabitants, who had no national candidate of their own to whom a majority was prepared to give its support. Because dissatisfaction is rife in Syria, Palestine, and Irak, it does not follow, as we are bidden to believe, that with the evacuation of the French and British these three countries would settle down into a peaceful existence, or that the first two, together with Transjordan, would merge into a united Greater Syria. Cultural differences between Syrians and Palestinians, and the inadequacy of communications that encourages the Arab weakness for local or tribal autonomy are among the many obstacles to the early establishment of settled conditions if the Arabs should be left at once entirely to themselves, and it is for those who inveigh against the admitted ills of the present situation to prove that we should not be flying to others far worse if their own special nostrum were adopted.

As far as we are aware, no attempt is made to work out the details of any scheme that is to provide an infallible remedy for Middle Eastern unrest. A certain glamour attaches to such a designation as Greater Syria, which is to take the place of the three separate units now under French and British mandates; but something more than glamour is required for the successful working of a modern State. The shortcomings of the present system are admitted. As far as Great Britain is concerned, a conscientious effort is being made to meet Arab aspirations. It is of little use to recommend an Arab patriot to hold out an olive branch to a Jew, when it is certain that the first result of British evacuation, if carried out to-morrow, as urged, would be a very different fate for the Jew. All that now keeps Great Britain in Palestine under existing conditions is the necessity of preventing Arab and Jew from flying at one another's throats. It matters not that responsibility for the antagonism between the two rests with Great Britain; the problem of to-day is to eliminate the antagonism, and there is no other way of effecting this than by Great Britain's remaining on the spot for the present to insure that neither side indulges its feelings of hostility. With patience goodwill can ultimately be established between the two sections of the community, and any real friend of the Arabs will urge them to show the confidence that they ought to have in their own cause by biding their time until they are ready for complete independence.

DAMASCUS.

By MAJOR E. W. POLSON NEWMAN.

Few Eastern cities have a personality like that of Damascus. It has been likened to a pearl with an emerald setting. As the sun sets over the mountains of the Lebanon, the picture of this ancient Syrian city from the high ground of Es-Sâlehîyeh is one of whitened Eastern architecture in the midst of fresh green foliage—a vivid contrast to the great dry country which surrounds it on every side.

Damascus from Es. Sâlehîyeh.

As one comes from the direction of Beyrouth one is astonished at the sudden plunge from the surroundings of arid hills and dried-up watercourses into refreshing little valleys, all thick with fresh green trees and cooled by running waters. From the south the road runs through a land of great attraction. To eastward lies the Syrian Desert, while to the west Mount Hermon and the heights of the Anti-Libanus flank this approach to the Great City of the Near East. To the north is the road to Aleppo.

Damascus is undoubtedly one of the most ancient and one of the most fascinating cities in the world. Christians, Jews, and Moslems each have their legends as to its foundation. In any case, civilisation must have been in an advanced stage in Damascus at a very early date, and the city was certainly an important manufacturing and commercial place many thousand years ago. It was the starting point of the great caravan route to the East—to Mesopotamia, Persia, and Baluchistan.

Yet the splendour of Damascus only began with the supremacy of the Ommayades, the most powerful princes who ever held sway in Arabia, and whose predecessor, Mu'âwiya, transferred the seat of the Khalifate there from Medina. In 1177 came the famous Saladin, in all of whose expeditions against the Crusaders Damascus was used as headquarters.

In 1399 Timur marched on the city, and, although immunity from plundering was purchased for one million pieces of gold, all the famous armourers were taken prisoner and removed from their home. But the industry of manufacturing Damascus blades was too valuable to die, and the experts in this trade transferred their art to Samarkand and Khorassan, where it flourishes to this day, while in Damascus itself it has fallen into complete oblivion.

Amongst the principal features of the city are the rivers Baradâ and Nahr el-A'waj (the Abana and Pharpar), which flow into the Meadow Lakes about 18 miles to the eastward. At the outlet of its gorge the Baradâ divides into seven branches, two of which are used for distributing water throughout the city, while the rest are employed in irrigating the numerous beautiful orchards which stretch to the very verge of the desert.

In accordance with the description given in the Koran, the Arab pictures Paradise as an orchard watered by flowing streams, and where the most luscious fruits are always ready to drop into his mouth. This ideal, so rarely even dreamed of in the arid lands of the Arabian peninsula, seems to be fully realised in the city of Damascus. That Arab poets sing its praises is, therefore, not to be wondered at. The orchards are exceedingly beautiful, especially in May, when the walnut tree is in full leaf and the vine climbs from tree to tree, or even later in the season, when the apricot trees in their rich green setting bear their golden fruits, and the pomegranates burst forth in their wonderful blossom.

Damascus is, moreover, full of peculiarities.

The Arab cafés are probably without exact parallel even in the entire East. These are to be found in gardens lighted with fairy lights, situated often on the banks of a swiftly flowing stream. Perhaps a rustic bridge divides the café from the road; perhaps a stream flows through the grounds themselves. But these cafés are no longer truly Arab. The atmosphere of France has had its effect upon Damascus. A little bit of "Araby" and a dash of the Parisian boulevard form the evening resort of the modern Damascene.

Courtyard of a Damascus House.

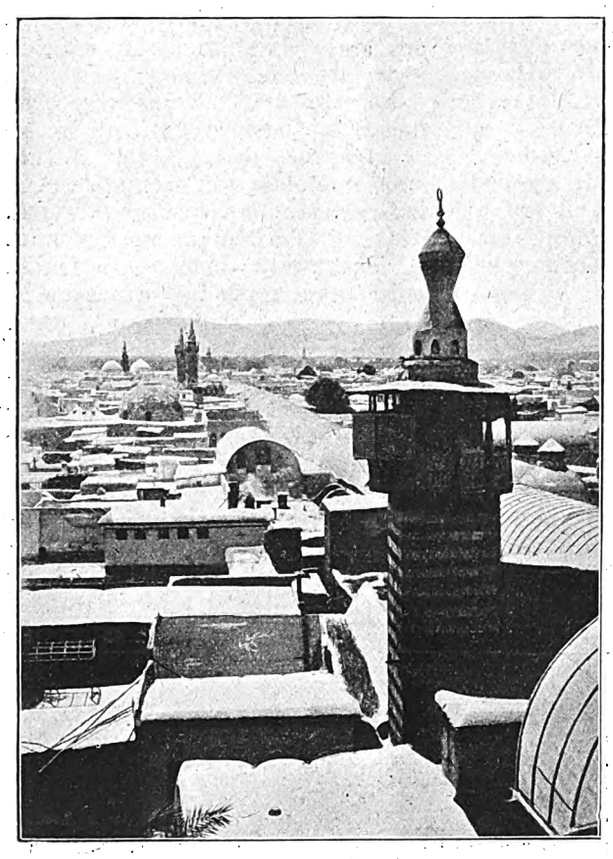
The houses of Damascus are famed throughout the world. Their spacious courts, with fountain in the centre, and bordered with flowers and groups of orange, lemon, and jasmine plant, face open colonnades, luxuriously furnished with soft couches and attractive lounges. These houses are a delight to the eye of the artist and a refreshment to the body of the weary traveller.

The streets are typically Syrian except in the modern quarters, where they are almost European. As one wanders along the narrow old byways, alive with people feverishly plying their various trades, one somehow cannot help feeling that on the "Eastern Trail" this is the last outpost—the great city standing on the verge of the desert which separates Syria from the great rivers of Irak.

The familiar "Street which is called straight," which is closely connected with the calling of St.



Straight Street.

Paul to the missionary cause, is now known as the "Rue Droite."

Interesting though these crooked and uneven streets may be, it is the sûks which mark Damascus as a great Oriental centre. These sûks are probably the finest in the East, and in them is concentrated the whole public life of the city. Sounds and cries of the most extraordinary nature meet the ear. The seller of lemonade yells at the top of his voice "Berrid 'alâ kalbak," meaning "Refresh the heart," as he rattles his brass cups together and shoulders a large jar surmounted with ornaments and crammed with ice and lemonade. The water-carrier is conspicuous by the wet-looking pig or goat skin which he carries on his back. The shouts and cries throughout the sûk are most amusing to those who know a little Arabic, and only a little knowledge is necessary to enable one to appreciate this simple people's ways. The natives of Syria are a very simple people, and the more one gets to know them, the more one appreciates their excellent and attractive qualities. A woman selling cress will politely inform you that "They come from the spring of Ed-Du'iyeh; if an old woman eats them she will be young again next morning." Hawkers of nosegays implore you to "Appease your mother-in-law," hoping that you will present her with a bouquet! Plausibility is an art amongst these people, and often Europeans have not a leg to stand on. Even for the sake of peace they have to buy. Yet, after all, a little "baksheesh" ruins no one, and is the custom of the East.

In the sûks of Damascus there is complete absence of squalor. There you can buy anything from a Persian carpet or an ivory inlaid cabinet to a camel bell or a packet of Gillette razor blades. Every conceivable thing which can possibly be wanted by the natives living within hundreds of miles, can be had in the sûks of Esh-Shâm, by which name the city is known by all Arabic-speaking people.

The brasswork has a world-wide reputation, and some of it is of very fine workmanship, but it must never be forgotten that, what catches the eye in the East does not necessarily remain a "joy for ever" in the mirky climate of London.

The Cloth Bazaar also contains many things which appeal to the European and have their own peculiar beauty. The prices are comparatively low, provided that the buyer has some knowledge of the art of bargaining.

Persian carpets and rugs are sold broadcast, and there are many good bargains to be made, but there is naturally also poor stuff about for those who are "pigeons," as the French say, "to be plucked."

To Damascus come the caravans from Baghdad, and with them many things of beauty and sometimes of intense value. Those who know the ways of the East may often strike a lucky bargain and take away a fine silk rug from Baluchistan or a really good "Persian" from Teheran for a very small sum of money.

The connection of Damascus with the Great War is too well known to need recapitulation here. Suffice it to say that it lived up to its reputation of forming picturesque events.

There are many who visit Palestine and Syria who never see Damascus. They do not know what they miss. Even those who positively dislike the East and all its ways cannot go there without afterwards urging others to do the same.

In conclusion, one may mention that in Syria, at the present moment things are cheap. Now is the opportunity for those who wish to explore this great city of ancient fame.

ARAB ART AND LITERATURE.

A paper on "The Position of the Arabs in Art and Literature," by Mrs. Arthur McGrath, was read before the Royal Society of Arts on May 28.

The lecturer, after explaining the immense versatility and wide range of Arab art, went into much detail concerning various artists and specimens of Arab art. It was strange, she said, that after the accomplishment of such marvels in art, nothing but literature should now be left to the Arabs. She affirmed that there was at the moment a second growth of Arab literature, used largely for the purpose of constructing the Arabian national movement.

General Sir Percy Sykes gave examples of the vast extent of Arab art (Arab saddlery was to be found in Mexico); and Mr. Kendrick, in his contribution to the discussion, suggested that Moslem art was a more accurate title than Arab art.

A CLASSIC OF WESTERN INDIA.

"Râs Mâlâ, or Hindoo Annals of Goozerat." By Alexander Kinloch Forbes. Edited by H. G. Rawlinson. (Oxford University Press, Humphrey Milford. 28s. net, or, India paper, 32s. net.)

Students of Indian history will be grateful to the Oxford University Press for allowing them a sight of Forbes' classical work in a new and convenient form. Those of them whose purses are slender—the majority in these days—would be still more grateful for a chance to purchase, but the price, while it is doubtless justified by producing costs, is, for them, almost prohibitive. In other respects the edition is satisfactory. There has been no tampering with the text, and the literary charm of the book is thus preserved, but the somewhat numerous errors of fact, inevitable in the circumstances, are indicated and corrected in additional notes, carefully distinguished from those supplied by Forbes himself, and references are given to help the reader in filling out some parts of the story which Forbes passed over lightly. The only difficulty we have noticed in the new matter is the use of the name Muhammad (i. 331) for the three Kings of Gujarat, usually known as Mahmud; if this is intentional, the departure from usage and tradition should have been explained, but since Mr. Rawlinson elsewhere uses the traditional form, it is possible that "Muhammad" is an oversight.

Of the book itself little need be said. It was correctly described by its author as annals—that is, something less than history in the modern sense, a compilation from Indian chronicles, supplemented largely, and delightfully, from the oral traditions preserved by family bards. Following, therefore, Indian usage, it deals mainly with the story of successive dynasties, and, except for the modern period, when Forbes could draw on English authorities, gives only incidental, or accidental, fragments of knowledge regarding the people, whether peasants, traders, or artisans, who lived and died in the stormy world which these dynasties dominated. And what a story it is! Dynastic or predatory wars, palace intrigues, treachery of vassals, revolts and their suppression, a romantic, sordid record, in itself, perhaps, no worse than that of contemporary Europe, but lacking the saving element of growth, which in fact lightens and sweetens the European story. During the centuries over which Forbes ranges Europe was working, however painfully, towards new political ideas, which held at least the promise of something better to come. In India there was nothing new. Moslems might subjugate Rajputs, and Marathas might displace Moslems, but the Indian polity remained unchanged, and, apart from Akbar's transient vision, we cannot detect even the dream of anything better than a larger kingdom, a more plentiful revenue, a more magnificent palace or temple, a more submissive proletariat. Dreams were for the next world, not for this, and India had at last to look beyond her borders for the new inspiration, which is now just beginning to display its influence. That, as it seems to us, is the lesson to be drawn from the materials of which Forbes made such admirable use; we wish there were more signs of its being grasped and realised by Indians themselves.

AN INDIAN ICONOCLAST.

"The Idiot and the Traitor in Indian Politics." By M. N. Tantree. (Bombay: The Author. Rs.2.)

We are familiar in this country with the efforts of the political iconoclast, who sets out armed with a knife or a duster, as the case may be, to take the paint off the idols of the moment and exhibit the stuff of which they are really made. The fashion is almost unknown in India, where the idol is usually regarded as sacrosanct while the paint lasts, and then deposited in the backyard without any formal ceremony; but Mr. Tantree has made a beginning, and thus brought us a stage nearer to the happy time when Indians shall try to tell the truth about each other. The author stands for the civilisation of individual freedom and equal opportunity; he judges his subjects from this standpoint, and he finds most of them to be idiots and traitors to their country. He speaks tolerably plainly. He depicts Dr. Tagore as perpetually "fouling the atmosphere" with "halderdash," Mrs. Besant as expounding "the rudimentary philosophy of the peasant who has just begun to think a little," Mr. C. R. Das as "propagating the ideal of hoodwinking," but the bulk of his book is devoted to an unsparing analysis of Mr. Gandhi, statesman and mahatma to his followers, but here one who has "deliberately stifled the political, economic, and moral development of India," and has "hopelessly muddled the political consciousness of the country." The reader must judge for himself how far the indictment is supported by the evidence which Mr. Tantree offers. He is obviously sincere. That he is also something of an artist is shown by the way he passes from invective to eulogy, and eulogy of Lord Curzon at that: in this section at least one can agree with him almost without reserve. His particular opinions are, however, less significant just now than the fact that at least one Indian holding unpopular views has found courage to speak out.

INDIAN ART.

A Conference upon Indian Art, arranged under the auspices of the India Society, was held at the British Empire Exhibition on June 2. Before the Conference itself began a visit was made to the Indian Pavilion, for upon the panels of the Bombay Court were some eighty or hundred Indian pictures, taken for the most part from the Johnson collection at the India Office (which bought these valuable specimens from Johnson at a ridiculously low price) and from that of Professor William Rothenstein. The examples (which, incidentally, appear to be hung too high upon the walls) represent work done between the sixteenth and the nineteenth centuries, and show quite adequately how, in spite of excessive deference for convention, these unknown Indian painters had so delicate a mastery over form. It is understood that a catalogue, containing about twenty-four reproductions in collotype, is to be issued of these exhibits.

Representative works of modern Indian artists are to be found in the Palace of Fine Arts.

The Conference itself, which was assembled in order that some fresh plans to further the development of Indian art might be outlined, was presided over by Sir Francis Younghusband. Sir George Lloyd, late Governor of Bombay, delivered the main address. After explaining his strong faith in the value and in the future of Indian art—he emphasised that it must be chiefly through the existing facility in decorative work that Indian art should be developed—he made a definite proposal on how best to stimulate Indian art. He suggested that the Government at Delhi should establish a prize, corresponding to the Prix de Rome, so that students qualifying in painting, sculpture, architecture, or the arts and crafts should gain admittance to a central institution for three or four years. The Indian was a true artist, content to work at his art for practically nothing, but such a step would prove an immense stimulus. This was a question which needed the prompt application of practicality.

Professor Rothenstein rejoiced to hear "the silver trumpet" from the lips of Sir George Lloyd, but uttered the warning that if the Government took a hand in the matter, that hand should be put forward not to acquire, but to help to create.

Among others who took part in the discussion were Mr. Gladstone Solomon, Mr. Diwan Bahardur Chariya, Mr. Yusuf Ali, and Mr. Lionel Heath. It was on the suggestion of Mr. Heath (who, by the way, complained that modern Indian artists sadly lacked their predecessors' mastery over form) and of Mr. Lanchester respectively that to the original resolution—which was one to urge the importance of promoting throughout the Empire the study and appreciation of the æsthetic culture of India, more particularly in the province of painting, sculpture, and music—the applied arts and architecture were added.

GREATER SYRIA.

"Greater Syria" was the subject of discussion at the meeting held at 63, Queen's Gate on June 5, by the courtesy of Sir Edward and Lady Boyle, under the auspices of the Near and Middle East Association, the principal speakers being Mrs. Arthur McGrath, Mr. St. John Philby, and Colonel Bramley.

Mrs. McGrath thought that the French had failed in Syria. She was sorry that Dr. Shahbender, the Syrian Nationalist, once imprisoned by the French for sedition, but now in America, was not present at this meeting of the Association, for in the East the personal touch meant so much more than it does in this country. Dr. Shahbender was the most prominent man in the Syrian Nationalist movement, and might one day become head of a Syrian Republic. But it was Ali, the eldest son of King Hussein, whom she favoured as head of a great Arab confederation.

Mr. St. John Philby explained his recent resignation from Government service as being due to a conviction that Britain was acting not so much unjustly as unwisely to the Arabs. The peoples of Syria and Mesopotamia looked upon the Anglo-French proclamation of November 8, 1918, as their Magna Charta, and, until the promises therein contained were fulfilled, would persist in refusing to co-operate in the institutions since provided for them by the Allies. If Britain were to evacuate Irak, France would do likewise in Syria, and arrangements could be made between Arab and Jew in Palestine. For the protection of a Greater Syria (under, possibly, the Emir Ali) the Arabs would have to rely on a mercenary army.

Lord Raglan, in the subsequent discussion, suggested that the situation in Palestine had now gone too far for there to be hope of reconciliation between Arab and Jew; and that the chances of adequate protection of a Greater Syria were remote—the only thing to do being to hand over Syria and Palestine to a Turkish mandate.

THE CENTRAL ASIAN SOCIETY.

To-day (June 12) a lecture will be given, under the auspices of the Central Asian Society, by Mr. H. St. John Philby, C.I.E., on "Transjordan." There will be lantern illustrations. The lecture, which is to be delivered at 5 p.m., will be preceded by the election of officers and members of Council for the ensuing session.

NOTES AND NEWS.

167, Strand, London, W.C.2,
Tuesday Morning.

The Cotton Position.

It cannot be said that the recent report of the Washington Bureau on this season's American cotton crop is at all encouraging. The condition figure is 65.6 per cent., which is well below the corresponding totals for the two previous years, which were respectively 71 per cent. and 69.6 per cent. Unfavourable weather is the chief factor responsible for this low estimate, and much will depend on climatic conditions in the next few months. There is, of course, ample time for the crop to recover, and this has, as a matter of fact, been the experience on more than one occasion. All the same the present figure is bound to cause no little anxiety, for the tendency is for the American crop to get gradually smaller while internal consumption increases, the margin for export thus becoming constantly less.

Empire Supplies of Cotton.

One effect of the report is naturally to direct renewed attention to the precarious character of Lancashire's supplies of cotton. As it happens, the position is all right at the moment simply because the effect of the war has been greatly to diminish the world's purchasing power, but if a normal demand was suddenly to develop it is difficult to see where adequate supplies of the raw commodity would come from. The phase is passing, and already there are significant signs of the recovery of demand, and it is quite possible that before very long the cotton position will become very difficult. The outlook would be serious were it not for the great strides that have already been made in the development of cotton growing within the Empire, and it may be hoped that the increasing realisation of the position will result in even greater efforts being made to utilise to the full the Empire's resources in this direction. The admirable cotton exhibits at Wembley give an excellent idea of what has already been accomplished, and if the reported statement of an American, after viewing the Exhibition, that the development of cotton cultivation in the Empire threatens American supremacy in this respect, may be regarded as very premature, the progress already made in the Sudan and elsewhere suggests that that is not at all an impossible outcome of the future.

The Suez Canal.

As will be seen from the report of the general meeting of the Suez Canal Company (which will be found elsewhere in this issue), very satisfactory results were obtained by this undertaking in 1923. The number of vessels transiting the Canal totalled 4,621 as compared with 4,345 in 1922, the gross tonnage being 31,329,236 as against 28,610,922, and the net tonnage being 22,730,162 as against 20,743,245. The total receipts amounted to 419,250,419.65 francs, an increase of 113,794,810.93 francs on the total of the previous year, and, after the deduction of expenses and various allocations and the addition of the amount brought forward, the disposable surplus was 287,797,319.21 francs, which has been utilised to pay a dividend of 468.71 francs per share (the net return per share being 430 francs, an increase of 110 francs on the yield of the previous year), leaving a balance of 23,735,347.38 francs, out of which 20,000,000 francs are allocated to the extraordinary reserve, leaving 3,735,347.38 francs to be carried forward. The progress made in 1923 promises to be continued in the present year, and it is evident that only a world-wide trade recovery is necessary for the company to be able to show returns far in advance of anything up to the present.

Mortgage Company of Egypt.

A very satisfactory report is forthcoming from the Mortgage Company of Egypt for the year ended March 31 last. The net profits, after providing for interest on debentures and temporary loans, and applying £1,500 to writing down the value of the company's premises in Cairo, amounted to £127,180, as compared with £122,790 for the previous year. Deducting the amount paid and accrued on the 5 per cent. preferred shares, £50,000, and adding the amount brought forward, £43,980, the balance is £121,160, out of which it is proposed to pay a dividend of 3s. per share on the ordinary shares, the same as before, absorbing £30,000, and to place £20,000 to the special reserve, bringing it up to £128,829, leaving £71,160 to be carried forward.

The Progress of Wembley.

Whether the attendances at the Wembley Exhibition fall short or not of the official estimates, there is no doubt whatever that most of the stallholders have little reason to be dissatisfied with results up to the present. Where articles are for sale—and this, one might almost say, is more generally the case than not—they are being purchased very freely, and in a number of cases it has been found necessary to send in succession several repeat orders for further supplies. That speaks for itself as to whether the Exhibition is likely to be a success or not.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Futures Steady.

The Alexandria Commercial Company, in their report for the week ended May 29, state :—

Since our last report our futures market has been quiet but steady. The June contract exceptionally has been very weak and shows a decline of over $3.00 since our last report, so that the difference between Sakel and Ashmouni is now $4.07 against $1.05 a week ago. The Ashmouni market has for a long time been very narrow and prices at parity with Sakel were the result of market manipulation; the big decline would seem to indicate that the June position has been, more or less, squared off. New crops are quite firm. The American crop advices have been poor and the market has been considerably influenced by these reports. The American Bureau report will be published on June 2; expectations are round about 67.00 as the figure of condition, against 71.00 last year, and anything higher will probably cause prices here to weaken. The demand from abroad has not improved, but the fact that cheap offers nearly always find a market may be taken as an indication that spinners require the cotton and that with them it is more a matter of price than anything else. The week's receipts amount to 21,726 krs., against exports 84,455 krs.; the stock stands at 892,302 krs.

Spot: We have again had a week of quiet markets with only a small demand from abroad. Sales amount to about 4,800 bales, of which we estimate 3,400 bales Sakel and 1,400 bales Uppers.

Sakellarides: The bulk of the demand is still centred on grades Fully Good Fair and above, and premiums for these cottons have somewhat stiffened during the week. The lower grades have been somewhat neglected and can be picked up on a fairly cheap basis. Staple cotton in all grades is difficult to find.

Uppers: As in the case of Sakel, buyers continue to show most interest in cotton Fully Good Fair and above. With the exception of a small business in Fully Fair, practically nothing has been done in the lower grades. The prices of spot as compared with contracts remain unchanged.

Pilion, Nubari, and White: Apart from high-grade White cotton very little of these varieties remain on the market, and business is accordingly practically nil.

Crop 1924: The crop news continues good. The period of growth through which the plant is now passing is not a very critical one; the one thing capable of influencing growth more than anything else at this period is the water supply and, up to the present, this has been sufficient for the needs of the plant.

SUPPLY OF CHEMICAL MANURE TO THE EGYPTIAN GOVERNMENT.

TENDERS are INVITED for the supply of different varieties of manure required by the Ministry of Agriculture (Egyptian Government), Cairo, viz. :—

21,000 tons Nitrate of Soda,
1,000 tons Nitrate of Lime,
5,000 tons Superphosphate,
1,000 tons Sulphate of Ammonia,

as shown in the specification to be obtained from the Royal Egyptian Legation, 7 Charles-street, Mayfair, London, W., from 10 to 1 and 3.30 to 5.30.

Tenders will be received by H.E. the Minister of Agriculture, at the said Ministry, Cairo, up to noon on Monday, the 16th June, 1924.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Market Still Dull.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended June 4 :—

Egyptian Spot.—The improvement recorded in the sales this week was confined entirely to the first two days, when the Russian Syndicate came into the market and purchased about 700 bales of Fine to Extra Fine Sakellaridis at prices which averaged about 500 points on July. Apart from this, the spot market has continued in a state of apathy, and with the holiday season approaching and our overseas customers apparently holding aloof for the time being, there is nothing in the present situation to warrant expectations of another buying movement on the part of the trade. Speculation (in the raw material) practically disappeared some weeks ago with the break in the Upper basis, but we should not be surprised to find it reappear in a mild form towards the close of the season. As regards stock figures, we seem to be marking time just at present, arrivals just about balancing with spinners' takings. The actual figures, as we have pointed out before, are very low for the time of the year, and over three months' consumption has still to be faced during a period which includes the critical weeks when the making or marring of the American crop is definitely decided. The strength of the situation was well exemplified at the end of last month, when, although the May position was forced to 90 points over July, the total tender was only 450 bales, nearly all of which was Fine cotton. The general inquiry shows little change. Fully Good Fair cotton is seldom asked for these days, for the same reason that spinners have ceased inquiring for "Best Upper." Rather more interest has been displayed in Good Fair Sakellaridis, but no purchases of weight have yet been made. At the opposite pole, the Fine cotton continues to command an increased attention.

The basis for the lower qualities has officially hardened, but actually, when tested, holders are inclined to meet buyers. A fair inquiry has again been in evidence for Uppers, pass to 100 points on, and one or two spinners have been nibbling at Brown cotton, without, however, any tangible result to date. White Sudan has continued to move off at previous rates; much of the stock held here now is rather unattractive, and it is the "best" lots which are chiefly in demand at about 450 to 500 points on American contracts. Sudan Sakel and Tokar Sakel have been in rather better request, but spinners are still very shy of paying the prices asked. Other growths have been neglected. C.i.f. business remains stagnant. Forwardings to spinners for the week ending the 30th ult. were returned as 6,411 bales. Estimated sales 2,500 Egyptian and 950 bales Sudan. Quotations of Brown and Upper show an advance of 65 points for Fair, Good Fair, and Fully Good Fair cotton, whilst Good is 50 points higher and Fine and Extra Fine 40 points higher. In Sakellaridis, Fair, Good Fair, and Fully Good Fair are advanced 80 points.

SUEZ CANAL COMPANY.

The annual general meeting of the Suez Canal Company was held in Paris on June 2.

The report presented by the board of directors stated that the development of the shipping traffic which they had recorded since 1919 continued in the past year, the net tonnage being 10 per cent. higher than in 1922. This steady improvement, taking place despite economic conditions of all kinds which had affected the years since the war, was a remarkable fact and a striking testimony to the soundness of the enterprise. Under the double influence of the growth of traffic and the increased proceeds of the transmission of funds from Egypt and England to France, the profits of the year were much larger than those of the previous year, enabling them to contemplate an important increase in the dividend. They proposed, therefore, to fix at 430 francs the net return on each share of the capital. That was a satisfactory result; but, as they pointed out last year, it should not be forgotten that the increased dividend, compared with the figure attained ten years ago, was only in reality the equivalent, and, it might be said, the expression, of the depreciation of the franc. Now that depreciation, the obvious excessiveness of which they all deplored, happily tended to grow less. So it was important to foresee the effect which the recovery of the franc would have on their nominal receipts. On this account they thought it necessary to suggest the addition to the extraordinary reserve established in 1920 of a sum of 20 millions; the future, even if the exchange rate of the pound sterling should become less, would thus be rendered much more secure.

In conformity with the liberal principles with which they had always been inspired, they had lowered the transit dues, in view of the increased traffic of the year, by 25 centimes as from January 1 last. They were, in fact, convinced that in contributing, to the extent to which they had, by the reduction of the charges which still weighed heavily on the maritime transport industry, thus favouring the development of navigation, they had served their own interests not less than those of the shipowners. Further, they submitted a proposal with regard to the division of the company's shares. That was, as they were aware, an operation frequently carried out by companies whose shares attained high prices on the Bourse. At their meetings it had been asked for on various occasions; it appeared to them that the time had come to carry it out. That division of the shares would have the effect of rendering more negotiable a security which had become, in reality, somewhat unwieldy, thus facilitating transactions and permitting partial realisation, and generally enlarging the market in a way advantageous for all. If, as they did not doubt, the proposal was approved, the exchange of one of the present shares, of the nominal value of 500 francs, against two new shares of the nominal value of 250 francs, would be carried out as soon as the Egyptian Government had ratified the modifications of the articles of association, rendered necessary by that measure.

The total receipts for the year 1923 amounted to 419,250,419.65 francs, showing, compared with those of the year 1922, an increase of 113,794,810.93 francs. The traffic receipts participated in that increase to the extent of 8,924,849.83 francs, and those of the financial service for 105,031,160.68 francs. That latter increase arose, for the most part, from the high rate of exchange attained by the pound sterling in 1923; their transactions, effected at a mean rate of exchange of 75.264 francs, had as a result the appearance under the heading of transmission of funds, a sum which exceeded by 101,998,133.21 francs that of the previous year. The disposable funds being thus notably increased, the revenue from investments showed an excess of 3,033,027.47 francs on the figures for 1922. The expenditure amounted to 58,478,995.75 francs. Although their material had been written down to a very great extent, they proposed to allocate to the depreciation account a sum of 15 million francs; it was necessary to consider that the progressive replacement of material could not now be effected except at prices much higher than those of former times.

In pursuance of the policy which was explained to the shareholders last year, they proposed to take advantage of the favourable results of the year 1923 to allocate a sum of 50 millions in connection with the improvements fund. The excess of receipts over expenses stood finally at 285,690,898.90 francs. Including the amount brought forward from 1922, 2,106,420.31 francs, they could dispose of a total of 287,797,319.21 francs. It was proposed to fix the profit for division at 264,061,971.83 francs, to deduct from the balance of 23,735,347.38 francs a sum of 20,000,000 francs to add to the extraordinary reserve, and to carry forward the balance of 3,735,347.38 francs. With a distributable profit of 264,061,971.83 francs the dividend on each share would be brought up to 468.71 francs. That dividend, increased by 25 francs of interest, represented a gross return of 493.71 francs and a net return of 430 francs, greater by 110 francs than that of the previous year.

The general shipping movement of 1923 was 4,621 transits, representing a net tonnage of 22,730,162 tons, a higher total than had ever been reached. Compared with 1922, the increase was 276 transits and 1,986,917 tons. Commercial navigation amounted to 21,302,406 net tons, or 93.7 per cent. of the total traffic of the Canal. It exceeded for the first time the highest total recorded before the war. The average tonnage of vessels using the Canal continued to increase. It amounted to 6,780 tons for gross tonnage and 4,919 tons for net tonnage. Compared with the year 1912 the increase was 30 per cent. Further, the proportion of transits carried out by vessels of a gross tonnage greater than 10,000 tons rose to 7.2 per cent., against 6.4 per cent. in 1922. The number of transits effected by vessels burning mazout continued to increase; it represented 22 per cent. of the total. The average duration of the stay of vessels in the Canal in 1923 was 15 hours 20 minutes. That was the shortest that had obtained up to the present. The number of passengers notably decreased, falling from 275,031 to 246,331. The division by flags of the tonnage transitted showed, as last year, the recovery of German shipping, which provided a tonnage of 1,213,691 tons against 735,129 in 1922, and thus passed from the sixth place to the fourth. The movement of the port of Port Said, comprising ships which had not carried out the transit of the Canal, amounted to 1,208,000 tons. The traffic of merchandise was still below what it was before the war, but the difference was being reduced progressively; the total weight of the cargoes that passed through the Canal amounted to 22,777.000 tons, and the difference, compared with 1912, was no more than two and a half million tons, instead of four millions in 1922. That progression was specially interesting, moreover, as it was accomplished despite a decrease of more than a million tons in the cargoes of oil.

The current year marked again an improvement on the results of the past year; the transit receipts showed, in fact, to May 15 an increase of 2,090,000 francs on the corresponding period of 1923. Further, indications were to be noted of an increasing activity in maritime transport; freight rates showed a tendency to rise again, and the total of tonnage laid aside showed a marked decrease on the previous year. It was, then, permissible to hope that the year 1924 would realise for the traffic of the Canal further progress.

BURMAH OIL COMPANY.

Record Volume of Crude Oil and Its Products Handled.

Sir John Cargill's Speech.

The annual general meeting of the Burmah Oil Company, Limited, was held on June 10 at the Merchants' Hall, George Square, Glasgow. There was a large attendance of shareholders.

The notice convening the meeting having been taken as read, the Secretary (Mr. F. G. Holdsworth) read the auditors' report.

Sir John T. Cargill, Bt. (the chairman of the company), who presided, said:—Ladies and Gentlemen,—The accounts before you closely realise the anticipations for 1923 which I ventured to put before you when last I had the pleasure of meeting you here. As our report says, the year established a fresh record volume of crude oil and its products handled by the company, and it is this fact, together with increased exchange profits and dividends from investments, which have carried us successfully through what has probably been one of the most difficult years encountered by the oil industry for a decade.

World's Oil Production.

The year 1923 witnessed abnormal over-production of crude oil in America, and when it is remembered that some 80 per cent. of the whole oil production of the world is handled there it will be appreciated how universal has been the effect of that unprecedented over-production. In this respect fortunately our own conservative policy in India for kerosene —representing over 60 per cent. of our marketed production —stood us in good stead, as the fact that our prices for this product have for many years past been considerably below the parity of world market values enabled us to regard the decline in the latter with comparative equanimity. I have dealt with that policy so fully on so many previous occasions that I am not going to weary you to-day with unnecessary repetition, except to repeat that, while it is not the intention of your board to depart from it in any way so long as it is possible to maintain it, its continuance depends on our general circumstances from time to time and particularly on securing values for our other products normally based on world market conditions. Apart altogether from our own case, any other policy would in the end be disastrous to India as a whole, for if we and the smaller struggling indigenous producers did not secure these normal prices for products other than kerosene they, at any rate, would undoubtedly be put out of business, and India would more than ever become generally dependent on imports of foreign oil, while the indigenous industry would be crippled in its capacity to keep prices at a reasonable level.

The Accounts.

Turning to the accounts, after charging income and corporation profits taxes (the latter now happily under sentence of death), contribution to employees' provident fund, directors' fees, etc.; writing off £50,000, being the final one-third of the cost of issue of the £3,000,000 8 per cent. preference shares; paying the dividends on 6 per cent. and 8 per cent. preference capital for the year and the interim dividend of 2s. per share, free of tax, on the ordinary capital; repaying £54,443 9s. 5d. of Dominion income-tax to preference shareholders—a quite exceptional and non-recurring item—and placing £200,000 to general reserve and £20,000 to insurance reserve, there is a disposable balance of £1,412,371 18s. 4d. Out of this the board has recommended the payment on 20th instant of a final dividend on the ordinary capital of 4s. per share, free of tax, absorbing £1,030,238 8s., and again making the total distribution 30 per cent., tax free, for the year. This leaves £382,133 10s. 4d. to be carried forward subject to corporation profits tax, estimated at £150,000.

Company's Conservative Policy.

Not only has all fields expenditure been written off as usual, but by also writing off £58,921 17s. 10d. expended on capital account during the year no addition has been made to fields block account. We have also made a substantial start with the writing down of the electrification capital account; have increased the writing down of the refinery; and have maintained at practically the same level as last year the writing down of tankers and installations and of the pipe line, thereby continuing the sound and conservative policy which has stood your company in such good stead in the past and established it on such a sure and solid foundation. Your board is satisfied that the value at which outside investments stand in the books is a very conservative one.

The addition to insurance reserve brings that account up to £420,000, and premia on risks carried internally credited to the fire and marine insurance account bring the total at the credit of that account to £613,106 10s. 6d.

Interest and dividend receipts, at £439,137 0s. 7d., are up by £81,271 14s. 4d., and the company's contribution to the employees' provident fund, which, as you know, gives everyone who elects to join it a direct share—based on the dividends paid—in the company's profits, amounts to £136,012 12s. 9d.

Tribute to Staff.

These, then, ladies and gentlemen, are the salient features of the accounts for the past year. I feel confident that they will be regarded as extremely satisfactory, and that you will wish to join with the Board and myself in conveying to the company's administrative and technical staff and employees generally, both in the East and on this side, your appreciation of this most gratifying result of their wholehearted efforts in the company's interest.

The labour troubles in the Burma fields which appeared to have settled down when last I addressed you were subsequently revived for a further short period, but finally all labour returned to its duties and conditions have since been practically normal. Our crude oil stocks were naturally heavily drawn upon during and for some time after the strike, but the position was gradually recovered and, as the report tells you, our production for the year eclipsed all previous records, and stocks have since been increased to the full extent of available storage.

The Yenangyoung Field.

Not the least satisfactory feature has been the way the older portion of our Burma concessions—the Yenangyoung field—has responded to the calls made on our resources, and the results obtained there in the period have added considerably to our existing confidence in the continued great potentialities of our properties. It has only been, however, by deeper and much more expensive drilling that we have attained these results, and in the meantime I can see no likelihood of the lightening to any material extent of our present very heavy expenditure in the fields.

Unfortunately we are still unable to report any developments of a promising nature outside the known productive areas of Burma or India. Our test wells in operation in Assam have not reached a stage where either success or failure can be spoken of. In the Punjaub, on the other hand, failure has been definitely met, and we have just recently decided that the areas we have been examining there have no possibilities of oil in commercial volume. They are consequently being abandoned after several years of patient, exhaustive, and expensive test drilling with merely the negative result that we need have no anxiety with regard to competition by others with oil from that source.

Assam Oil Company.

When recently addressing the shareholders of the Assam Oil Company, Limited—in which you hold a controlling interest—I was able to report a substantial improvement in their production in Upper Assam. Even thus, however, that company is still compelled again to pass its preference dividend, and this shows only too clearly the precarious existence of the smaller producing indigenous oil companies in India, and how if any steps were taken—as has been suggested in some quarters should be taken—to force indigenous companies to sell petrol and other products in India at prices lower than the world's parity it would undoubtedly mean that they and their production—so much needed in India—would, as I have said in my opening remarks, be swept out of existence. From the more energetic development of its fields assisted by the up-to-date refining and other plant being gradually substituted for out-of-date plant and methods it is hoped that the Assam Company may ere long be able to show improved and more encouraging results.

Results in our Badarpur field in Lower Assam have been far from satisfactory, and, if not yet definitely determined, it now seems fairly certain that neither considerable nor very profitable additional production can be expected. Large quantities of water with the oil and the poor quality of the oil itself are serious handicaps, and in all the circumstances you will be glad that I can tell you that our conservative policy of writing off year by year all expenditure in oil fields as incurred includes our operations at Badarpur.

Burma Electrification Scheme.

Our Burma electrification scheme—now embracing all the Yenangyoung area—is justifying to the full every claim originally made for it. It has completely eliminated from this area the consumption by us of crude oil as fuel for drilling and operating wells and all other purposes, and the power station itself is fuelled by natural gas from the wells. When I tell you that we had been burning in this way in this area every year crude oil equal to one month's throughput of our refineries, and that the older the field got the greater would have been its call for such fuel, you will readily appreciate the great saving and husbanding of resources this development means.

Out of the record refinery throughput we secured a new high record percentage of marketable products at a new low record cost of fuel and loss in refining. Good progress is being made with reconstruction and concentration, and the completion in the month of May of one of the new benches of stills contributed largely to this further improvement in results.

During the year we disposed of three of our oldest and now uneconomical smaller tankers. No replacement is meantime necessary. The remainder of the fleet was kept continually in commission without either serious delay or accident.

The Indian Kerosene Market.

In the Indian kerosene market, where our major interests lie, trade showed further satisfactory expansion, and our production went steadily and promptly into consumption at unchanged prices.

Lubricating, etc., oil production was mainly disposed of also in India at not materially different prices from 1922.

The expansion of the petrol trade in India was not so satisfactory. Growth there seems likely to be less vigorous than in the earlier years unless and until there is extended provision of more suitable roads. Our prices for this product in India during the year shared in the general world fall.

Last year, in referring at considerable length to the attacks made on us in certain directions in India in connection with our price for petrol there, I did so for the better and more accurate information of our customers as a whole and of others, and without any expectation of putting an end to such misinformed criticism, which has been continued. I have nothing to add or to retract. The price of our petrol in India—and, as I pointed out last year, it is not produced in India, but in Burma, from where it has got to be transported to India at considerable cost—still to-day compares very favourably with the price of petrol in any other country in the East, and stripped of the Excise duty is practically the same as it is in this country, and on a parity with world market values. The fact that I am again able to point out that not a gallon of foreign petrol has been imported into India for many years is the best evidence that we have not been charging unreasonable prices for ours. Memories are short—especially when it suits to forget—and a large number of Indian motorists seem for one thing to have found it convenient to forget that when, during the war, prices of all oil products in every country soared to three or more times pre-war rates and petrol in this country was selling at as high as 4s. 7½d. a gallon, the Burmah Oil Company resisted the opportunity and temptation to "profiteer" at the expense of the Indian consumer and advanced their prices relatively very little.

Petrol Duty Proposal.

In his financial proposals for the current year the Indian Finance Member put forward, inter alia, a reduction of the Excise Duty on petrol from six annas to four and a half annas per gallon, coupled with a reduction of the import duty on foreign petrol from eight and a half annas to four and a half annas per gallon—thus doing away with all protection of indigenous petrol production. Whether the indigenous industry generally could or could not have done without this protection had never been tested, for as I have just mentioned there have been no imports of foreign petrol into India for many years. In any case, but of course for other reasons than any unwillingness to have cheaper petrol, the Indian Government's proposals as a whole were rejected at Delhi, and in the subsequent certification by the Viceroy of the Government's essential taxation this proposed concession to the petrol consumer and foreign importer was automatically withdrawn. We regret very much that the proffered reduction of the Excise duty was thus made abortive, and trust that next year more reasonable and sensible counsels will prevail to secure this concession for the consumer. But Government should carefully examine the ability of the smaller producing companies to stand up to the competition of foreign petrol which the acceptance of proposals such as these might possibly bring about.

Again I should like to express our appreciation of the courtesy and helpfulness accorded to the company by the various departments of the Governments of India and Burma and other provinces, when and wherever we have had occasion to be brought into contact with them.

In his speech at the annual meeting of the Attock Oil Company, Limited, last year the chairman of that company referred to their advent on the Indian market and their recognition of the necessity for fitting themselves into the existing order of things there with as little disturbance of them as possible. I am pleased to be able to tell you that an arrangement has now been practically concluded with the Attock Oil Company under which we are marketing their products alongside of our own.

A New Industry.

Our friends the Tinplate Company of India, Ltd., got their tinplate plant at Golmuri on to the operation of the sixth and last mill in December—that is, in barely a year from their initial trial run on the first mill. This was undoubtedly a great technical achievement reflecting considerable credit on the consulting engineers, Messrs. Perin and Marshall and Estep, and on the American and Welsh staff and operatives associated with the enterprise. They have been delivering their product to us throughout the period, and in every respect we have found it equal to anything we have hitherto used. A new industry has thus been successfully established in India, with our assistance; by successfully I mean technically, for, unfortunately, the financial result so far has been far from satisfactory. I feel confident that the value to India as a whole of this important extension of her capacity of indigenous manufacture will be sympathetically recognised by the Indian Government affording it such fiscal assistance from time to time as may be necessary to at any rate establish it firmly and securely on its feet.

A circular was recently issued to a number of the shareholders by a concern called "Income-Tax Claims, Ltd., London," stating that they had recovered on behalf of a client who held 600 ordinary shares a sum of nearly £90 on a three years' claim in respect of Dominion income-tax relief. A number of the shareholders who received this circular communicated with the company, and a reply was sent informing them that this payment had been made in error by the income-tax authorities. The dividend on the ordinary shares being paid free of tax, shareholders are not entitled to any repayment of income-tax in respect of Dominion income-tax.

In computing liability, however, for super-tax, shareholders only require to add income-tax at the lower rates. In case any shareholder has by mistake since 1920 added the full British rate of tax, a slip will be sent out with the dividend warrants to be issued on 20th inst. showing the net rate of tax which should have been added for super-tax.

As to the current year there is every reason to anticipate that our results will be certainly not inferior to those now before you. Our crude oil production and refinery throughout have been well maintained to date. While our kerosene prices will not be advanced we see no immediate reason why they should decline. Petrol, too—even making all allowances—is a stronger market than existed during 1923, and so also is paraffin wax. Unless, therefore, there is some quite unexpected deevlopment in the industry as a whole. I look with confidence to satisfactory results for the year.

The Government's Anglo-Persian Interests.

I now wish to refer to the statement enclosed with copies of the annual report and accounts—the company's Press communiqué on the subject of our negotiations to acquire the Government's holding of ordinary shares in the Anglo-Persian Oil Company, Limited. The board felt it desirable that this should be circulated since possibly not all of you saw the statement in the Press. Our communiqué was issued to the Press with the object of letting the public fully understand our attitude to and position in the negotiations for the sale of the Government's shareholding in the Anglo-Persian Oil Company to the Burmah Oil Company, and the subsequent joining by the Burmah in a merger with the Royal Dutch and Shell Companies, in regard to which so many ill-informed and inaccurate statements had been appearing in the Press. The communiqué deals so fully and I think so clearly with the whole matter that I feel it calls for little in the way of explanation or elaboration.

The advantages that would undoubtedly have accrued to the nation had the scheme been carried through are set forth at the end of the communiqué, and I think I cannot do better than read these:—

"The assurance of naval supplies at all times and under all conditions would have been immeasurably increased.

"British economic interests in the oil businesses of the world would have been considerably strengthened.

"Great oil enterprises in every oilfield in the world would have been permanently settled in London, and, having regard to the vast expenditure involved in conducting an oil business, the importance to British industry in general of this change will be readily appreciated.

"The Government whilst retaining and strengthening their fuel oil contract would have realised their investment in the Anglo-Persian Oil Company at a profit far in excess of present market values, and would have been enabled to withdraw from the very speculative enterprise of oil development.

"The Government would have freed itself from the international embarrassment resulting from its large financial interest in a competitive international trade."

Defence of Proposals.

Surely, ladies and gentlemen, the attaining of these advantages was well worth careful examination and serious consideration—which, in point of fact, the late Government had been giving them for some time previous to their leaving office—but no sooner had the present Government assumed office than they turned our proposals down on the ground that they were "contrary to national and prejudicial to naval interests" without any of its members giving us even the opportunity of examining with them and endeavouring to satisfy them that the proposals prejudiced neither of these interests in any way.

So far as we ourselves were concerned, our interest in the matter—as of those who were to have been subsequntly associated with us—was exactly that of the Admiralty. Their advantage was the broadening of the basis of the security of their contract for fuel oil; ours was the broadening of the whole basis of our business—the spreading of our risks from a smaller to a greater number of oilfields, and these in every producing country of value or potential value elsewhere in the world.

It was, we considered, our duty to our shareholders to endeavour to avail ourselves of this opportunity of resting our business on this broader and larger basis and on the footing of the "Burmah" being given a fair share in the merger, but the action of the Government in refusing to consider our offer to purchase their holding of Anglo-Persian shares under a scheme which would in addition have given the other important and wider advantages I have mentioned precluded us from giving our shareholders that opportunity.

We consider we have performed our duty both to the nation and to our shareholders, and I would hope that the part we have played in these negotiations will meet not only with your approval but also with the approval of a large section of the general public.

I now beg to propose: "That the report of the directors and audited statement of accounts, including the balance-sheet and profit and loss account to December 31, 1923, presented to the meeting, be received, approved, and adopted," and I shall call on Mr. R. I. Watson to second this motion. After the motion has been seconded an opportunity will be given to the shareholders to ask questions or to make comments.

Mr. R. I. Watson.—I have much pleasure in seconding the motion.

The Chairman.—Ladies and gentlemen, if there are questions you would care to ask, or if any shareholder has any remarks to make, we shall be very pleased to hear them, and I shall answer them to the best of my ability.

Mr. James Smith.—I must congratulate you, Mr. Chairman, on your very able and business-like statement. There are only two items I would like a little enlightenment on. The first is, the credit balances are down £733,000, and the office salaries are up by fully £20,000.

The Chairman.—Are there any other questions?

No further questions being forthcoming, the Chairman said:—With regard to the former sum, I think in every large business items vary largely from year to year, and it is quite impossible to analyse them to any extent. It is the credit balance you refer to?

Mr. Smith.—It is to the "Sundry creditors and credit balances, amounting to £1,647,334," I refer.

The Chairman.— As I say, in a large business like ours there must be items which vary very materially from year to year, and I do not think I can attempt to analyse where the difference comes in. With regard to the office expenses, our business is increasing year by year, our salaries are going up from year to year, and I do not think the increase to which you refer is an unreasonable one at all, in view of the scope of our operations. (Cheers.) There being no other questions I will now put to the meeting the resolution I have formally proposed and which Mr. Watson has seconded.

The motion was carried unanimously.

The Dividend.

The Chairman.—I have now pleasure in moving: "That the dividend on the Ordinary shares recommended by the directors of 4s. per share, free of tax, making with the interim dividend paid in November last 30 per cent. for the year, be adopted, and that the same be hereby authorised to be paid on June 20, and that the balance of £382,133 10s. 4d., subject to corporation profits tax estimated at £150,000, be carried forward." Mr. Thomas Gibson.—I beg to second the motion. The Chairman.—I presume you are all quite in favour. (Cheers.) I have now pleasure in moving the re-election of Sir Campbell Kirkman Finlay as a director of the company. Mr. Edward Sharman.—I have much pleasure in seconding. The Chairman.—I am sure you will all be agreeable to Sir Campbell's re-election. (Cheers.) I also move that Mr. G. C. Whigham be re-elected a director of the company. Mr. Whigham unfortunately is unable to come north to-day, and asks me to express his great regret at his inability to be present.

Mr. J. Moncrieff Wright.—I beg to second the proposal.

The motion was unanimously carried.

The Chairman.—Lastly, I beg to propose: "That Mr. David McCowan be re-elected a director of the company."

Mr. A. M. Clydesdale.—I have much pleasure in seconding that.

The resolution was unanimously passed.

The Chairman.—The last motion is for the reappointment of the auditor, Mr. J. Herbert Wilson, C.A.

Mr. Gordon Miller.—I beg to propose the reappointment of Mr. James Herbert Wilson as auditor for the current year at a remuneration of 500 guineas.

Mr. Robert Clark.—I beg to second that.

The Chairman.—You all agree to the reappointment of the auditor? (Cheers.) Then that, ladies and gentlemen, is all the business.

Vote of Thanks to Chairman.

Sir Frederick C. Gardiner.—All the resolutions submitted have been passed unanimously, and I think that the resolution which I submit to you now, ladies and gentlemen, will also be passed unanimously. That is a vote of thanks to the chairman. We thank him, not only for his illuminating speech to-day and for his conduct in the chair to-day, but for his control and direction of this large company throughout the year. His speech has dealt with things of the past—the affairs of the company during the past year—and has given to all of us, I am sure, the utmost satisfaction. (Hear, hear.) He has dealt in his own careful way with the future, but perhaps with a little less caution than usual, and that inspires me with the hope that we shall not fare any worse next year than we have done this.

He has referred also to a question of large public policy which it would not be fitting that I should speak upon now, when I am merely moving a vote of thanks; but I desire to say this—I express the hope that the words he has uttered on that subject to-day may be read and studied, not only by the shareholders of the Burmah Oil Co., but by every member of the community, every citizen of this great Empire, who takes the long view. I cannot imagine any body of men dismissing a matter of this vast importance without giving it, not merely careful, but prolonged study, and I should like to express the hope that we may yet have a committee appointed, an impartial committee, if such a thing can be found, that will weigh this matter with the utmost care and will issue a recommendation, such a recommendation as they may think best in the national interest.

We thank the chairman, as I have said, not merely for his conduct in the chair to-day, for we cannot forget that the management of a large company like this requires very special qualifications in matters of policy. It requires wise judgment in matters of administration, it requires great business capacity. We have in our chairman one who is well equipped in both these directions, and we, or, rather, I should say the company are fortunate in having Sir John Cargill to look after our affairs—(hear, hear)—the company's affairs throughout the year—and we thank him for all that he has done for this company throughout the year and for his conduct in the chair to-day. I beg to move accordingly. (Cheers.)

Sir John Cargill's Reply.

The Chairman,—Sir Frederick Gardiner, ladies and gentlemen,—Once more you have given me a warm welcome, an attentive hearing, and, on Sir Frederick's very kind proposal, a very hearty vote of thanks. I would just like to say to you how sincerely I appreciate the confidence which you still repose in me, and also, I think I may say, that you are satisfied with last year's results and are looking forward with hope, which I have not to-day in any way damped, to possibly better results in the current year. (Hear, hear, and cheers.)

This is now the 20th annual meeting that I have presided over, and I have had the singular good fortune on every occasion, not only to propose handsome dividends, but also, what I think is much more important, much more vital, to submit to you thoroughly sound and conservative balance-sheets. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) And I say to-day with due deliberation that of the many splendid balance-sheets I have submitted to you in the past there is none which, in my opinion, could compare with the one I have submitted to you to-day. (Cheers.) When my able accountant, Mr. Eddington, brought in last year's balance-sheet and laid it before me, and I went over it carefully item by item, and when I had finished doing so, something like the immortal words of our old friend Ole Bill came into my mind: "If you know of a better whole"—with a "w," reporters—"show me it." (Laughter.) As I say, I do not think I have ever had the pleasure of submitting such a magnificent balance-sheet as I have done here to-day.

In conclusion, I would like to say that it is my intention towards the end of this year to make one of my periodical visits to India and Burma, and on this occasion I am to have the great pleasure and benefit of being accompanied by our managing director, Mr. R. I. Watson, on whose ability and great knowledge of oil matters undoubtedly much of the prosperity of the company during the last few years is due. We will, I hope, come back to lay before you at the next annual meeting our impressions formed on the spot of the great organisation in which both of us have served all our business career, and of whose phenomenal prosperity we are both, I think I may say, so pardonably proud. (Cheers.) I would again thank Sir Frederick very sincerely for what he has said of me, and I thank you all for the very hearty vote of thanks you have given me to-day.

This concluded the meeting.

SPECIAL MARKET REPORTS.

The following extracts are taken from the current issue of the monthly review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank:—

Constantinople.

There is no change worth mentioning in the situation of the market. The crisis is still intense and unabating; the same causes, lack of confidence, uncertainty, Customs restrictions, new taxes, either in operation or contemplated, etc., weigh heavily upon a market already lifeless, causing uneasiness, which affects all transactions unfavourably. The sudden rise of the French and Belgian currencies following the heavy fall of last month depressed the market further; importers who had passed orders when rates were very low are today in a difficult position owing to the considerable difference in the rates of exchange. Bills of lading are not taken up, and goods remain in Customs.

In the import trade the only activity has been in the piece goods line, notwithstanding the pause in the demand from Persia, where political uncertainty still prevails. The importation of artificial silk articles is forbidden. The trade in colonial products showed signs of indecision in sympathy with the tone of the sugar and coffee production markets. The importation of wheat and flours was normal. Although the needs of local consumption, estimated at about twelve thousand tons a month, can only be satisfied for the present by purchases in foreign countries, principally Russia, the Government contemplates raising the Customs duty on imported flour and cereals from 5 to 12 per cent. This measure would confirm, though prematurely, the optimistic news received from Anatolia with regard to the 1924 agricultural campaign.

The export trade is dull, with the exception of tobacco and carpets, which were very active and remunerative during April.

The failure of the attempts at solving the grave problems of maritime transit is not conducive to a revival in the transit trade. The recent order to ships to discharge all goods in transit on the day of arrival creates a new obstacle to transit operations owing to the present inadequate organisation of the port.

Palestine.

The cultivation of tobacco has received all possible encouragement from the Government, and has rapidly become popular. The estimated area planted in the present season is 20,000 dunams, whilst in 1921 it was 1,780 dunams. The average production per dunam is 65.70 kilos for Turkish tobacco and 120 kilos for Baladi. The varieties of tobacco grown include Macedonian, Anatolian, Kavalla, Seres, Samsuni, etc.

Considerable interest is being displayed throughout Palestine in two hitherto little practised branches of agriculture, namely, poultry-farming and bee-keeping. Many large incubators have been imported, and modern poultry houses are being erected; already more than five hundred bee swarms have been transferred from the old-fashioned skeps to modern hives, and a larger and better harvest of honey may be anticipated.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The Mosul Conference.

However regrettable in itself, the breakdown of the negotiations regarding Mosul has so far the appearance of being for Great Britain a blessing in disguise. The ratification of the Anglo-Iraki Treaty, which seemed so problematical a week ago, followed hard on the news of the failure of the Constantinople Conference, and there is certainly a strong sense of relief in many British circles that Sir Percy Cox, under instructions, presumably, of the Home Government, definitely broke with what was in danger of becoming a generally accepted tradition that in all negotiations in the East Great Britain can be relied upon to yield her ground. In most conferences a spirit of "give and take" is essential, and we should be sorry to see a British representative abandon that spirit on entering a conference chamber; but there must be occasions when principles are at stake and any surrender of them is out of the question. The very definite stand taken by Great Britain in the Mosul negotiations will not be without its effect in the Near and Middle East and will, it may be hoped, facilitate the progress of other negotiations that are pending, in regard to which there have been so many trumpet calls to the British Government to evacuate its position beforehand.

The Virtue of a "No."

There can be no doubt that the Turks are genuinely disappointed at finding themselves up against a British "No," and may even feel hurt at being selected as the victims of a sudden innovation. They found it necessary to take their time in formulating a fresh policy to meet an unexpected situation. It would be well if advantage were taken by the British Government of their dilemma to show that the failure of the Mosul Conference does not entail any diminution of the British desire to befriend and help the new Turkey. The Conference itself could not be utilised for this purpose, but there are other means of satisfying the Turkish Government that it has more to gain than to lose by maintaining close relations with Great Britain. This might even be the opportune moment for a decision to build a British Legation at Angora. If the Turks are convinced that the retention of Angora as their capital is the right policy, let us accept the decision, and as an earnest of our desire to keep in close friendly touch with them let a British representative be installed at Angora. This cannot be done until a residence has been built for him, and in regard to such a matter there is no need for Great Britain to wait for action on the part of other Powers. Even if the Legation had to be sold in a few years' time, British interests in the Middle East would amply justify the expense incurred. Unless a helping hand is held out to Turkey, there is a danger that her present mood will crystallise into an attitude of confirmed sullenness, to the prejudice of the whole of the Near and Middle East. On the other hand, she has had ample warnings of the risk that she runs by maintaining a policy of isolation in respect of the Western Powers.

The Anglo-Iraki Treaty.

The unwillingness, to which expression was given in these pages last week, to accept as final the pessimistic reports of the prospects of ratification for the Anglo-Iraki Treaty was justified by the event. During the night hours of the day which the British Government had stipulated must be the last for ratification or rejection, the Irak Constituent Assembly ratified the Treaty by 38 votes to 25. A rider, as it were, to the ratification was added in the form of a petition to the President of the Assembly, which stated that, as many of the clauses of the Treaty and subsidiary agreements were regarded as too severe, those who supported ratification relied on the honour of the British Government not to oppress the people of Irak through the Treaty; at the same time they stipulated that the validity of the Treaty should be conditional on the protection of the rights of Irak in their entirety in the Mosul vilayet. Great Britain has no reason to resent the desire of the deputies to "save face" by these caveats. They hardly go beyond what the British Government had already expressed its willingness to do, and although non-ratification would have proved more serious to Irak than to Great Britain, it would not have been without its embarrassment to the latter. This country would have preferred a more whole-hearted acceptance; but its best course now is to show that all the fears which gave strength to the opposition in the Assembly were groundless.

Digitized by Google

Greece and Bulgaria.

The Bulgarian Government has taken the view that the Greek offer of a free zone at an Ægean port, similar to that granted to Yugoslavia in Salonika, is less favourable to Bulgaria than the proposal made by the Powers at the Lausanne Conference. It is anxious, however, that it should not be regarded as rejecting the offer, tout court; Bulgaria, the semi-official communiqué on the subject adds, is ready to negotiate directly with Greece, "providing that the Greek Government submits a proposal approaching the Bulgarian view or, at any rate, a proposal more favourable than the offer made by the Powers." It is, perhaps, unfortunate that, when a zone at Dedeagatch was tentatively offered to Bulgaria as an Ægean outlet, Kavalla seemed a more attractive port; now when Kavalla is in question, it is realised that, although a much better harbour, it has no railway connection and entails much longer transport for Bulgarian goods than Dedeagatch. Undoubtedly both the Lausanne proposal and the present offer fall short of Bulgarian aspirations, which hanker after a completely Bulgarian port served by a railway entirely under Bulgarian control. There is little likelihood, however, of Bulgaria's receiving such a port in the immediate future, and it is to her interest to accept the best possible substitute that she can obtain. As a result of the reflection that she has been able to bring upon the Lausanne proposal, it may possibly be found that an outlet at Dedeagatch with the railway leading to it under the control of the League of Nations will be the best solution. In any case a conscientious attempt to work such a scheme would better enable the League to decide that Bulgaria must always be unduly handicapped without an Ægean outlet of her own.

The Greek Republic.

The first Greek Republican Government has not had long to wait for its first crisis. Differences of opinion broke out almost immediately between M. Papanastasiou and his Minister of War, Colonel Kondylis, and the latter promptly resigned, to head a somewhat bitter campaign against the Prime Minister. The cause of the trouble lay with the latter's alleged weakness in dealing with Greek Communists, which was attributed to the strength of his Socialist leanings. Other resignations from the Cabinet followed, and for a moment it looked as if the Greek Republic would have to fight for its existence against a Greek Fascist movement. Colonel Kondylis, however, has not secured in the Assembly the support on which he counted. A vote of confidence in the Government has been passed by a majority of seventy-eight after an all-night sitting; but it must be inferred that stormy times are still in store for the Republican ship of State.

Albania.

The only apparent obstacle remaining to the complete success of the Albanian revolution is the existence of Ahmed Zogu, who is still at large in the country. He would seem to have been deserted by all the members of the late Government, who are reported to have made good their escape; but so long as he is capable of holding his own against the insurgents he will form a rallying point against the new régime. Albania, however, wants peace and not civil war, and it is to be hoped that the new authorities will know how to placate all sections of the people and not leave the country with an open sore.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Tuesday Morning.

The Tube Strike.

The Tube strike, which for a week or so seriously inconvenienced London, collapsed badly, and, to all outward appearances, at any rate, the strikers have gone back to work on the employers' terms. These men—Communists as they are commonly asserted to be—failed not so much because of the injustice of their demands or the impolicy of their methods to obtain the realisation of those demands—for wrongness does not in industrial disputes always fail—but because they were not supported by the larger unions.

The conduct and result of this strike have led many people to believe that the great unions are turning more favourably to political and constitutional action as a means of getting what they want, and that the tendency towards State capitalism is, therefore, growing more marked. Observers who think thus are inclined to applaud the wisdom of Mr. Asquith in putting the Labour Party into office, so getting it familiarised with constitutional ways of procedure, although they are quite prepared for the submergence of the Liberal Party as a result of this wise measure. They say that it is no bad thing for the nation to be saved from Syndicalism and worse even at the expense of Liberalism.

Sunlight and the Body.

One sunny day in the first half of 1924 (how long ago it all seems!) a doctor remarked to me that this lack of sunlight from which we have mensally suffered is bad chiefly for two things—the nerves and the skin. It is a happy coincidence, therefore, that one of the fields in which medical research is being most vigorously carried out is that of the effect of sunlight upon the skin. Most people agree that he benefits most who "browns" most easily from the sunlight, but it is not the light, but the reaction to the light, which makes of man, through his skin, a healthy creature. The whole question, however, is complicated, for it is not true that those most exposed to the sun are the healthiest. In which last fact it appears as if this year we shall have to find much consolation.

The State of the Theatre.

When it is not one thing it is another, and theatre managers cannot live except in superfluities. The present slump in theatre-going, which appears to be fairly general, has caused Mr. C. B. Cochran, a versatile genius who may conceivably be better known to fame as having brought "Rodeo" to the British Empire Exhibition than as having intellectualised the British public with "Little Nellie Kelly," to declare that the very name of Shakespeare is sufficient to frighten the playgoing class.

This spontaneous assertion is the result of poor audiences at his theatre, the New Oxford, to hear the performances of the Old Vic company in Shakespeare. That there is a modicum of truth in it, however, need not be denied, for theatres have their peculiar atmosphere, and it takes time for such an institution as the New Oxford fitly to assume a Shakespearean mirth and profundity. Everyone knows how long it is before a church that becomes a barn and then a church again collects a worthy congregation. As for the rest of the theatres, it would appear that they are getting the audiences they deserve—at least in the case of the thinly attended.

Shop Signs.

A gay suggestion was made the other day, and one that had a touch of holiday freshness about it, that to relieve the drabness and vulgarity of our streets all shops should have a painted sign. It does not, however, appear that such a fixing is applicable to our modern buildings of ferro-concrete, and it would be much better if the enthusiastic supporters of this idea were to concentrate on the older and more practicable suggestion of getting signs outside all inns.

The possession by a mere shop of a sign is almost a forgotten idea, but it would come as no novelty if all inns were once more to have a sign. Even in these days of tied houses a variety of signs would stimulate health (and thirst), while artists would surely pour over each other for the honour of painting signs for free houses.

Golf.

This appears to be a season of wonderful golf, and the game seems temporarily to have taken on some of the brilliance which cricket has been denied by the weather. At Gleneagles on Saturday Scotland were most worthily on top of England, for though Mitchell played really and imperturbably well, Duncan, who is the professional at Hanger Hill, beat him over thirty-six holes by eight up and seven to play. Duncan did the first round in 66, was out again in 36, and played the twenty-nine holes of the match in seven under fours. There could be no standing up against that.

After the Rains.

June is with us at last, and now, after the long waiting through the rains, summer, by which one means wild roses and plenty of runs, has really come. The recent rains, which were general and heavy, have done infinite harm, and the slugs and the bowlers have done their damnedest, as every fruit-grower and batsman knows.

With such weather as we have recently had farming in this country has become more of a speculation than ever, and whether the farmer has dealt in corn, or in fruit, or in beasts, he has had an extremely anxious time. But hope, at least for all except the fruit farmers, is dawning once more on them, and if the sunny days continue the South Africans will not be more happy than the farmers in revelling in exercise.

The Near and Middle East.*

From Our Own Correspondents.

IRAK.

Baghdad, May 21.

The Kirkuk Outbreak.

A discussion was raised in the Constituent Assembly concerning the recent outbreak of the Assyrian Levies stationed at Kirkuk. An attempt to make the issue one between Christians and Muslims was stifled by the wiser of the Deputies. Complaints against the Government and the Levies, and a demand for the disbandment of the latter, led Ja'afar Pasha, the Prime Minister, to make an impassioned speech, in which he disclaimed against the futility of such a demand, when Irak possessed only six thousand troops of her own to defend her extensive frontiers. It was equally futile, he continued, to clamour for independence, when the country as a whole was content to be protected by the troops of a foreign Power, being apparently unwilling to make any effort or sacrifice to raise the forces which alone could give it the power and the right to claim complete national independence.

Official figures give the casualties as 56 Muslims killed and 44 wounded, 8 local Christians and 6 Assyrians killed.

May 28.

The Anglo-Irak Treaty.

The fickle opinion of the capital has again changed; desire for ratification is once more in the ascendant. The change is due largely to a series of outspoken, straight-from-the-shoulder articles in the Baghdad Times. These pointed out that, if the Irak nation considers that Great Britain is no longer under any obligation to remain in this country and to set up an efficient administration in place of the Ottoman one destroyed by her, strong political, economic, and strategic considerations exist in favour of a withdrawal to the head of the Persian Gulf. Strategically, this newspaper explains, England requires an Air base in the Middle East. This is at present situated at Baghdad, but its removal to Koweit would be no difficult task; it is true that the distance from Amman is about a hundred miles longer, but this disadvantage is compensated by the fact that such a base would be under the protection of the guns of the British Fleet. Basra also would form a suitable site, and it will probably be remembered that, on the formation of the Arab Government the inhabitants strongly urged that their province should be under direct British control, independent of the Central Administration.

In spite of the apprehension aroused in Irak by the possibility of an early evacuation, there are still a number of die-hards who insist on emendation before ratification. Most of these, however, simply desire to prolong the negotiations, hoping against hope that the Government will purchase their vote in favour of the Treaty by some valuable quid pro quo.

The Constituent Assembly.

The Constituent Assembly, its numbers now reduced to nearly one-half by resignations or by the return to their homes of disgusted or panic-stricken deputies—the latter recipients of anonymous threatening letters—still meets occasionally and talks a great deal, so far without arriving at the shadow of a decision. The committee's report on the Treaty is now before it, but discussion of the recommendations has so far been avoided by the discovery that it is necessary first to decide upon the method to be adopted by the Assembly for the passing of legislation. It is not surprising to learn that no decision was reached on this point, and that the suggested method was one which postponed as long as possible the evil day on which a definite conclusion has to be arrived at. That day, however, must soon come, for the Irak Government has been informed that if a decision one way or the other has not been reached by June 11, Great Britain's position vis à vis Irak will be referred to the League of Nations.

Attempted Lynching in Baghdad.

Coming as it did so soon after the outbreak of the Assyrian Levies at Kirkuk, it is not surprising that considerable excitement was caused by a quarrel between two Jews in the streets of Baghdad, in the course of which one drew a revolver and fired at the other. It was immediately assumed that the person who fired the shots was a Christian, and that his intention was to murder a Muslim. A crowd soon gathered and very roughly handled the supposed Christian, who would probably have been lynched but for the arrival of a strong body of police, who rescued him and removed him to the safety of the police station.

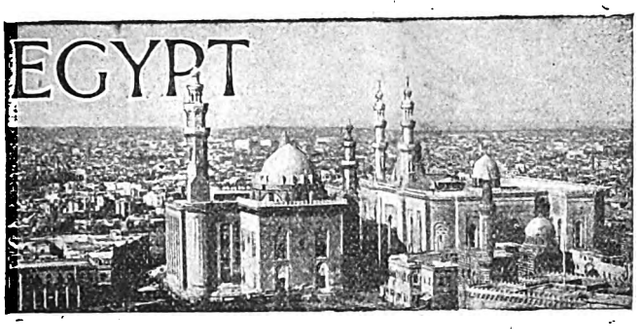
For the rest of the day, in view of the excitement occasioned by this affair, the streets of Baghdad were patrolled by police pickets—a precaution which was justified later in the day by an attack on an Armenian, who was set upon and wounded.



Cairo, June 7.

The King's Birthday.

The birthday of King George was celebrated by a garden party at the Residency, to which the whole of the British community was invited. There were over seven hundred guests, including General Weygand, who was de passage in Cairo on his way to Beyrout, and was accompanied by the French Minister, M. Gaillard. A picturesque touch was contributed by the Sultan of Lahej, who, with his staff, came in native costume. The day was glorious, the gardens were in perfect condition, and an ingenious arrangement had been made whereby everyone, without being under cover, was protected from the setting sun. Altogether it was a most brilliant and enjoyable function.

Honours.

No better merited honour could be conceived than the K.B.E. conferred in the last Honours List on Said Pasha Shoucair. Said Pasha entered the service of the Sudan Government in the early 'nineties, and has rendered most valuable services on the finance side to both the British and Sudan Governments. Indeed, so indispensable did he prove himself that, although he obtained permission to retire from the position of Director-General of Accounts early in 1921, this was only agreed to by the Sudan Government on condition that he continued to advise them on financial matters. And, although technically in retirement, he has for all practical purposes retained his position as chief adviser to the Financial Secretary. Said Pasha is most popular with both the native and the British side of the Sudan administration, and the honour he has just received has given great satisfaction to all who know him.

Mr. E. M. Dowson who has also received the K.B.E. in the same Honours List, is, of course, the late Financial Adviser. He succeeded Sir William Brunyate, and to him fell the ungrateful task of tiding over the political troubles of 1919-1922, and of arranging the transfer of the financial administration of the country from British to Egyptian hands, as a result of the abolition of the Protectorate in February, 1922. He was one of the four Advisers who backed Lord Allenby in his memorable fight with the Foreign Office in January, 1922, and this honour is undoubtedly a belated recognition of the loyal services he has rendered.

The Negotiations.

The political event of the week—one might almost say of the Parliamentary session—was the secret meeting held by both the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate on Monday last. After announcing, in reply to an interpellation from one of his own party, that all obstacles had been removed in a manner consistent with maintaining the dignity and safeguarding the rights of the nation, Zaghloul Pasha offered to impart to the members in strict confidence what those obstacles had been and how they had been overcome. The Chamber went into secret session, after which Said Pasha proceeded to the Senate, which followed the example of the Lower House.

From the very circumstantial accounts of what transpired at those meetings, that have been in circulation during the week, nothing of really vital importance appears to have been at stake, but the interpellation gave the Prime Minister an admirable opportunity for obtaining a vote of confidence, in which, it is important to note, the Opposition joined with but one dissentient voice.

This would seem to make it practically certain that Saad Pasha will go to London to negotiate with the British Government this summer. But in Egypt the proverb, "There is many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip," applies probably more than in any other country, and while this vote of confidence may be taken as indicating that the way is clear for the proposed negotiations, it would be unwise to count on his going to London until Zaghloul Pasha has definitely accepted the British Government's invitation.

The Manchester Speeches.

Considerable excitement has been aroused by the speeches made at Manchester by Aziz Izzet Pasha, the Egyptian Minister in London. They have been reproduced in extenso by practically every paper in the country, and appear to have given intense satisfaction to all classes of Egyptians. Certainly Izzet Pasha is valiantly sustaining the cause of his country, and has most courageously carried the attack right into the enemy camp, so to speak, for Lancashire is understood to be the most determined opponent to any change in régime in the Sudan, and the latter is for the moment the dominating question in the minds of the Egyptian public. But, as a very shrewd Egyptian remarked to me the other day, all this is but an exchange of courtesies and means little.

trace their source. The first was that Russia was on the point of crossing the Dniester; the second that General Averescu was in action as a revolutionary leader at the head of 30,000 men.

With regard to the former, I understand certain British papers have already sent their war correspondents to Bessarabia, and, if this be so, they must be hard put to justify the expense of their journey. There is no more danger of a war with Russia to-day than there has been any day during the past twelve months—no more and no less. That Russia will seek to recapture Bessarabia some day is quite certain, but that the ammunition explosion of last week can be taken as the preface to Russia's declaring war is certainly not an hypothesis which is causing any immediate alarm in Bucharest to-day.

With regard to the second rumour, it is sufficient to say that the idea of Averescu's acting as revolutionary leader most certainly never entered the General's head until he read it in a British paper, for his party cannot be considered in any light as a revolutionary party nor General Averescu as a revolutionary-minded man.

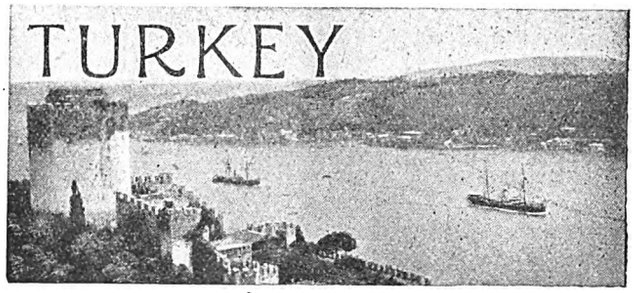
The Nationalist-Peasant Fusion.

A few weeks ago it was thought likely that the "Averescani" would unite either with the Nationalists or with the peasants. However, negotiations with this end in view came to nothing, and instead, to the general surprise, the Nationalists and the Peasant Party are joining hands. By the time these lines appear the fusion of these two parties will be complete, and the combined party will be so strong that it is probable the Liberals will before long be thrown from power and the "Nationalist-Tsaranist" bloc will be in their place.

The programme of the new party has not yet been drawn up, as at the moment of writing the two original parties are not yet officially united; it is probable, however, that this programme will include both a levy on capital and a further expropriation of agricultural lands.

At all events, General Averescu is, for the moment, completely isolated, and it would be very difficult for him to organise a revolution even should he wish to do so.

It is unfortunate that rumours of the sort mentioned should be allowed to flood the British Press and spread unfounded alarm.



Constantinople, June 10.

Mosul and the Dodecanese.

The Mosul Conference, which is generally called the Conference of the Golden Horn by the local Press, appears to have come to an untimely end, and both sides have agreed to differ. It is curious that, notwithstanding the prominence given to the negotiations in the papers and the suggestions in the various comments that perfidious Albion is still perfidious, the whole Press discussion has been very cold and formal. The "indignation" about the new and exaggerated British claims to the three cazas of the Vilayet of Hekkiari has rung hollow and false, and the trumpet calls of the unity of Turks and Kurds and the indispensability of the Mosul Vilayet have been faint and wobbly.

The scare news about the Italian menace from the Dodecanese seems to have served its turn, whatever it may have been, for Angora semi-officially announces that since the Turkish representative in Rome has received amicable assurances from Signor Mussolini it considers the incident as closed. While it was open it certainly excited ten times more interest than the Mosul Conference.

The Fear of Isolation.

The dominant feeling here at the moment is fear of isolation. In private conversation and in Press publications the thinking Turk harps on the one idea that nearly a year after the conclusion of the Treaty of Lausanne there is not the slightest sign that any Power, big or little, Eastern or Western, takes the smallest interest in the fate of Turkey or is ready to make any advances towards her. The immediate cause of worry is the economic isolation, but the more far-seeing of this people are also disturbed at the possible effect of political isolation some few years hence, when the more warlike of their neighbours have had the edge of their dislike of war blunted by the passage of time and the increase of prosperity. This attack of the blues has led to a fresh crop of discussions on the point as to whether Turkey and the Turks are suffering from an attack of xenophobia or not. The writers on this subject can find no better defence than platitudes on the sentimental side concerning the traditional hospitality and courtesy of the Turkish race, but they realise all the time that this does not go to the root of the matter, and that dozens of business men, with no sentimental leanings whatsover, come here ready to take on straightforward business in accordance with accepted civilised principles, and after hanging about for weeks, and perhaps months, during which time they are hampered and worried by every difficulty that a half-baked bureaucracy can devise, they go away in disgust, vowing not to return until the country comes to its senses and "settles down." That is the kernel of the matter: the politician is trying to show the foreigner in the crudest manner that he is not wanted, and the Turkish business man is plaintive because the foreigner is taking the hint and buttoning up his pocket.

Haidar Bey.

This is admittedly the Constantinople point of view, and maybe the capital has not yet perceived the wood for the trees. Nevertheless, the Constantinopolitan is "chortling" this morning because he has been officially informed that his bête noire, the Vali Haidar Bey, has been appointed Vali of Angora, and he is claiming this transmutation as a victory in the campaign of calumniation which has been proceeding for the past two months. He may be right; if so, one rejoices, because it seems to show that the influence of Constantinople is gaining ground; on the other hand, the transference to the capital may be promotion as a reward for services rendered, but it is hardly safe even to hint at such a thing locally while the present mood of enthusiastic soulagement is giving a touch of colour to the drab existence of the local pessimist.

WESTERN ASIAN ARCHITECTURE.

"ORIGIN OF CHRISTIAN CHURCH ART." By Josef Strzygowski. (Oxford: Clarendon Press. 42s. net.)

"EARLY ARCHITECTURE IN WESTERN ASIA." By Edward Bell, M.A., F.S.A. (London: G. Bell and Sons. 10s. net.)

Dr. Strzygowski has long been a recognised authority on the architecture and art of the Middle and Near East. His books have a special value in that they are based on careful and laborious researches made by himself on the spot, researches which his almost encyclopædic knowledge of his subject made unusually useful. In fact, originality and downright determination to write of nothing except at first hand form the main strength of his work. They also constitute its main weakness, for the temptation to find all his rivals wrong and to deduce from his facts far more than they can stand is too much for him. It is also unfortunate that this book is not a carefully written treatise, thoroughly planned out and tied down to intelligible sequence. On the contrary, it is a translation of a series of lectures, and bears on the face of it that the material has been thrown together with unusual carelessness. The learned author's style has never been his strong point, and, however much we may sympathise with the translators' difficult task, it cannot truthfully be said that the clarity of the dissertation has not lost much in the course of rendering into English.

The real value of the book lies in the undoubted proof that Christian Art, specially architecture, owes much to Mesopotamian and what may roughly be described as Armenian sources, mainly to the latter. As to this, the Professor throws a new light on many points, and his excellent and numerous illustrations help to make his meaning clear. What he apparently desires us to believe is that all early Christian architecture derives from these sources, and it is his attempt to do so that spoils an otherwise most interesting work. When we are asked to believe that Gothic architecture derives from the Armenian because the Goths came from the northern shores of the Black Sea, opposite Armenia, we can only regret that Dr. Strzygowski has allowed his zeal to run away with him.

This book is presented by the Clarendon Press in a very beautiful form.

Mr. Bell's book is of quite another kind. To begin with it deals with architecture dating from thousands of years before the period of the Austrian Professor (roughly 5000 to 500 B.C.). The light thrown on the very early origin of the dome and barrel-vault in Mesopotamia is, however, of special interest to one who has become interested in the Austrian work.

Mr. Bell's aim is a modest one. He sets out to give the ordinary reader some idea of the architecture of the various Sumerian, Semite, Assyrian, and Hittite empires, of course, with reference to excavation work in Mesopotamia and Anatolia, from which so much is still being learned. His narrative is clear and easily read, and is well documented by some 110 illustrations.

A FRANCISCAN CHURCH AT MOUNT TABOR.

A correspondent writes from Haifa:—

Cardinal Giorgi, the Ambassador of His Holiness the Pope, arrived in Haifa, via Kantara, on Ascension Day, May 29, on his way through to consecrate a new church which has been built by the Franciscans of the Holy Land on Mount Tabor, in the parish of Nazareth. He was met and welcomed at Haifa station by the District Governor of the Northern District of Palestine and many other important Government officials, together with the principal notables of the town and district. Crowds of people were present to witness his arrival. He proceeded direct to Mount Tabor by special car, accompanied by fifty cars carrying people to witness the opening ceremony.

It is expected that his Lordship will stay in Palestine for some time.

sible to reach an agreement on almost every question which came before them, and to present a scheme which all of them support as a whole. Here, at least, is a definite lead in the right direction, and one which we hope will be given all due prominence in the impending debates in the Legislature. We are not disposed to quarrel with the politicians who demand, or with the Government which is granting, facilities for full discussion of the report. The public service of India is still unhappily a political topic, and some such discussion is inevitable, but we ask that it shall be so conducted that it may be the last, or almost the last, of its kind. A rare opportunity is offered to the more responsible members of the Legislature, whatever their party colours may be, to concentrate on the essential point of taking the service out of politics. Let them follow the example of the Commission, let each of them sink the more extreme portion of his own demands, let them think of the needs of India rather than the claims of any section of Indians, and we believe they will find it possible to come together in support of the scheme which is now before them. It is perhaps too soon to hope for entire unanimity, but there is enough good sense in India to settle the whole question, if only its possessors will speak out.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE OF INDIA.

We have already indicated briefly our opinion of the report of the Royal Commission on the Superior Civil Services in India, which was made public at the end of last month. It is essentially a workmanlike document, concerned with the solution of practical problems, taking their genesis usually for granted, and attaining to results by compromise and good sense, rather than logical deduction from established principles. It is consequently so reasonable in itself that observers unacquainted with India may be pardoned for asking what is the difficulty in putting its recommendations promptly into force, and to-day we propose to examine the position from this point of view. The root of the trouble is that a matter of technical administration has been dragged into the field of practical politics. The business of the Public Service is to carry out the policy of the Sovereign, whether despot or democracy, and no political difficulty arises so long as it is organised with a single eye to this object. Difficulties begin when races, sections, or individuals advance claims to position without regard to this primary function. Then politicians take sides, duties are subordinated to rights, aptitudes become less important than pedigree, and a position arises such as we find in India, where the needs of the Sovereign are almost lost to sight. In one sense it may be said that the trouble dates back to Mogul days. It is true that there were then no politicians, for opposition was rebellion, but the huge rewards offered to the administration attracted the best brains, though unhappily not the finest characters, not only in India itself, but in a large part of Asia. The tradition so established that the public service was the best, or the only possible, career has survived up to the present day. On its first formation the National Congress concerned itself mainly with the claims of Indians to more posts and better pay. As each new community in turn awakes to corporate consciousness, it puts forward demands for the employment of its members. The various so-called compromises between Hindus and Moslems have this at least in common—that they distribute the public service proportionately between the two sides; and, while the best minds in India have risen above this level, we fear it is still true that the general trend of opinion is faithfully represented in the monumental volumes of the evidence recorded by the Islington Commission.

It is conceivable that this trend of opinion might have been modified if the framers of the new Constitution had taken a firm stand, and, while offering to India political opportunities far in advance of her then aspirations, had insisted that for the future means should be strictly adapted to ends, that the public service should be staffed solely with an eye to the new régime, and that lineage should yield to aptitude. The chance, if it was a chance, was missed. Indianisation of the services was treated as a political object, comparable in importance with the establishment of responsible government, the idea of adapting means to ends was discarded, and in the historic preamble to the Act of 1919 Parliament committed itself to a form of machinery which may retard, or conceivably may render impossible, the realisation of its declared purpose. The preamble, however, stands, and the practical question now is how to get the whole thing out of politics as quickly as possible, how to lead the way to unanimity among Indians such as prevails in this country, how to restore the public service to the position it held in the old régime as a noiseless and efficient machine for translating policy into fact. Such a change cannot be effected all at once, and it may take longer in India than elsewhere because of the habit of nursing stale issues which characterises her inexperienced politicians, but the amount of time required is in itself the strongest argument for setting quickly to work.

Judged from this standpoint, the report of Lord Lee's Commission has merits which far exceed its defects. There are weaknesses, indeed, such as the adherence to the percentage method of regulating recruitment, which must operate to prolong political clamour. To raise the proportion of places reserved for Indians from, say, 33 to 50 per cent. must provoke even the mildest politician to ask for 60 per cent. or more, and, speaking for ourselves, we wish the Commission had found it possible to define the minimum number of Englishmen required for the realisation of Parliament's primary object, and had reconstructed the system on this basis; but the practical difficulties in the way of this course are obviously great, and it is easy to believe that they could not have been surmounted by a unanimous agreement at the present juncture. Against such weaknesses as this must be set the insistence on the immediate establishment of a Public Service Commission, a reform already long overdue, and one which must initiate the change we desire. A body of this kind, strong enough to disregard all political interference short of a formal decision by a legislature, will not only perform the specific functions assigned to it, but will serve as a nucleus round which reasonable opinion can gradually crystallise, and, if it can survive the difficult early stages, will in time build up a tradition such as has long existed in England and is gathering force throughout the Dominions. The members of the Commission have, however, done more than merely recommend the creation of such a body, for they have shown by example that the conditions requisite for its ultimate success are not unattainable. Representing as they did various interests, and approaching their task from very different starting-points, they have found it pos-

The Royal Visit To The Palestine & Cyprus Pavilion, Wembley 1924

OF the hold and the fascination that the British Empire Exhibition has on the scores of thousands who visit it daily there can be no question; but it is equally certain that nothing in the Exhibition itself can claim the popularity of a Royal visit. The Wembley grounds are an epitome of the Empire, and there is something particularly appropriate in the personal homage that the vast crowd of sightseers seeks to pay to the Crown which is admittedly the most potent link in the chain of sentiment that binds the Empire together. No one gives a thought to the fact that a Royal visit means the temporary closing of so many buildings until the King and Queen have made their tour of inspection. The public is far more intent on securing a vantage point from which to see their Majesties than in adding to the number of countries "done" in a given time. And so the King and Queen pass from one pavilion to another through narrow avenues of their loyal subjects, whose demeanour leaves no doubt that they regard the kindly smile with which they have been rewarded for a long wait as the happiest experience of the day.

On May 28, when their Majesties visited the Palestine and Cyprus Pavilion, they were accompanied by the King and Queen of Italy, Prince Umberto, and the Princess Mafalda. It was a perfect day, and the fact that the Royal visit was to take place had exercised a marked effect on the attendance. A very spic and span building awaiting the Royal inspection. In the Palestine section a noticeable improvement had recently been introduced in the centre of the main section, where some rather rough-and-ready stalls had given place to a more artistic effort under festooned arches. Jaffa oranges, instead of being sold as from a street barrow, made a distinctly more pleasing appeal from baskets neatly arranged in tiers. A table and chairs suggested more leisure than those which usually throng the Pavilion can take advantage of owing to the numbers seeking admission behind them. On this day, however, a welcome restfulness prevailed, and the table, with at least one chair, fulfilled its purpose when the two Kings and Queens, a Prince and Princess signed in turn the Visitors' Book.

The Royal party was met at the entrance to the Palestine Pavilion by Sir Alfred Mond, representing the guarantors, Major R. T. Little, manager of the Pavilion, on behalf of the Palestine Government, Mr. W. S. Cohen, Hon. Secretary of the Economic Board for Palestine, and Mr. A. Sefi, the two latter representing the London Organisation Committee. After the signing of the Visitors' Book a leisurely tour of the building was made. Considerable interest was displayed by their Majesties in the various stalls, in particular in the Government exhibit, which in a small compass depicts the natural resources of Palestine, and indicates in some measure the progress made during the few years of British administration. Special attention had previously been paid at the entrance to the stall of the Pro-Jerusalem Society, displaying the artistic pottery made under its auspices and specimens of Hebron glassware, as well as to the Yemenite craftsmen, who are at work in the Pavilion. Queen Mary, having admired various exhibits of native arts and crafts, accepted two lace d'oyleys from the Jewish Women's League for Cultural Work in Palestine. The attractive stall of the Pardess Co-operative Society of Orange-Growers of Jaffa, as was to be expected, came in for very favourable notice, and some of the Jaffa oranges subsequently figured on the table at the British Government Pavilion, where the Royal visitors took luncheon.

Before passing to the Cyprus section of the Pavilion, their Majesties and their guests visited the Annexe, where the Pro-Jerusalem Society has installed models of the Jerusalem temples, and listened to a brief explanation of these very striking exhibits. The three models, constructed by the late Dr. Schick, of Jerusalem, represent the Tabernacle of the Desert, the Temples of Solomon, Zerubbabel, Herod, Hadrian and Justinian, and the Dome of the Rock (Mosque of Omar). A photograph of the Temple of Solomon appears on another page.

At the entrance to the Cyprus Section of the Pavilion the Royal party was met by the Commissioner for Cyprus, Mr. W. Bevan, who with Mrs. Bevan was presented by Lieut.-General Sir Herbert Miles, Chairman of the Mediterranean Group Committee. Here, in accordance with the native custom, the visitors were offered jam and water on a silver salver by a Cypriot lady in native costume, while a second sprinkled orange flower water. During the brief tour of the tastefully arranged exhibits King George recalled his visit to Cyprus in 1886. Queen Mary showed much interest in the beautiful Lefkara lace and other Cyprus embroideries displayed.

The authorities have tried to make up for the shortage of space at their disposal by depicting as much as they could of the island by means of pictures and photographs representative of Cyprus scenery and industries. Among these may be mentioned the reproductions of Othello's Tower (of Shakespeare fame), the glorious Gothic Abbey of Bella Pais, and the half-ruined former Gothic cathedral of St. Sophia, Famagusta, which is now a mosque. The Royal visitors also inspected the two survey maps of Cyprus—one of the island, the other of Nicosia—by the late Field-Marshal Lord Kitchener in 1878, when serving as a lieutenant in the island. These maps are the originals of the Ordnance Maps of the island still in use.

PALESTINE'S STEADY PROGRESS.

Co-operation of the Economic Board at Wembley.

The legend "Mandated Territory" on the Palestine Pavilion explains why Palestine, although not a part of the British Empire, is represented in the British Empire Exhibition. As the purpose of this splendid reproduction in miniature of the Empire was to give some indications of the achievements of the British race and the peoples associated with it, there was ample reason to accord in the Wembley enterprise recognition to the good work undertaken in Palestine in the name of the Empire. In the small space available in the Pavilion it has not been possible to trace in detail the recovery that has already been made by the country in the course of a few years from the stagnation in which centuries of misrule had left it. Before the War the only way of reaching Jerusalem was by camel from the Suez Canal, or by steamer from Alexandria or Port Said to Jaffa. If landing at the open roadstead of Jaffa was impracticable owing to weather conditions, passengers had to go on to Haifa or Beyrout. To-day the journey from Cairo to Jerusalem is accomplished within twenty hours; but there was no room in the Pavilion for an adequate tribute to the Palestine Railways. Similarly, the visitor will have to find out for himself the story of what has been accomplished by the British Administration in the matter of Public Health, Education, Posts and Telegraphs, road-making, and the development of trade and industry. A brief tour of the Pavilion, however, will convince him that Palestine is now launched on the progressive course of a civilised State, and he should come away from his visit with the certainty that in regard to the promotion of the material well-being of the country Great Britain has no need to fear comparison with her achievements elsewhere within the same limited period.

As the civil administration is not allowed to be a charge on Great Britain, the Palestine Government found itself prevented by the slenderness of its resources from shouldering the whole cost of the Pavilion. Participation in the Exhibition, therefore, became possible only when the Economic

Board for Palestine undertook to raise a guarantee fund to cover half the cost of the undertaking, the Government contributing the other half. As a result of the response to its appeal the Board has been able to increase its share of the fund to over £3,000, and the measure of support that it has received has been reflected in a notable improvement on the original scheme for Palestine's representation at Wembley.

The Economic Board for Palestine is now completing the fourth year of its activities. It stands for the practical interest of British Jewry in the economic development of Palestine, as distinct from all questions of politics. In this capacity it has created the Palestine Corporation as its financial instrument, which in its turn is identified with such undertakings as the Palestine Salt Company and the Portland Cement Company (Nesher), and makes loans to businesses requiring additional capital to extend their operations. The Portland Cement Company (Nesher), with a paid-up capital of £217,000, has been formed for the production of cement near Haifa; the Salt Company also deals with an article of general necessity which has hitherto been imported into the country. The Economic Board holds a quarter of the ordinary shares of the Central Bank of Co-operative Institutions in Palestine, an organisation, originating in the United States, which has been responsible for inaugurating a number of Credit Unions and Agricultural and Industrial Co-operative Societies in Palestine.

It is hoped that a further field for investment will be found in municipal loans for waterworks and possibly for drainage schemes. Such towns as Jerusalem and Haifa are still without a water supply answering to modern requirements. Loans have also been made to tobacco planters. Palestine has now been growing tobacco for four years under the stimulus of the Jewish Colonisation Association, with results that may well be regarded as most hopeful for the industry. The soil and climate of the country are regarded as eminently adapted for the cultivation of tobacco of excellent quality, and hopes are entertained of the possibility of a considerable export trade. So far, it is true, the general quality of the tobacco produced has not reached a sufficiently high standard to compete in the markets of the world; but efforts are being made to improve the quality, and it is in this direction that the help afforded by the Economic Board can be utilised.

Perhaps the most prominent among Palestine's needs to-day is that of a safe and adequate harbour. Great damage is inflicted on imports and exports, and the cost of living is appreciably higher owing to the loss in transit and the high rates which have to be paid both for freight and insurance. Accordingly, special attention is being directed to the question of a harbour adequate for the growing needs of Palestine. The two claimants for the honour of being the premier port are Haifa and Jaffa, which to-day account for practically all the overseas trade of the country. Jaffa serves at present the most populous and most wealthy portion of Palestine, but it has no hinterland beyond Jerusalem, and is badly handicapped by its unprotected state. Haifa calls for much less expenditure to make of it a first-class harbour, and has the additional advantage of serving a much larger area than Jaffa, through its connection with the Hejaz Railway. As a result of recent investigations, the proposal that now holds the field is that, in the place of any grandiose scheme for a port out of all proportion to the likely requirements of Palestine in the near future, moderate sums of money should be spent on both Jaffa and Haifa. For a million pounds sterling it is estimated that Jaffa could be provided with a harbour that would eliminate the heavy annual loss now caused by high freights due to demurrage of steamers delayed through bad weather, by loss of goods, and by high insurance rates. A similar sum would provide Haifa, owing to the facilities which it already possesses, with an equipment sufficient for the trade of to-day and for any extension which may reasonably be expected within the next few years.

Within the space at our disposal only a brief reference is possible to the potentialities of Palestine. The Pavilion will well have served its purpose if it enlists for the country the sympathetic interest of the many thousands who visit it daily.

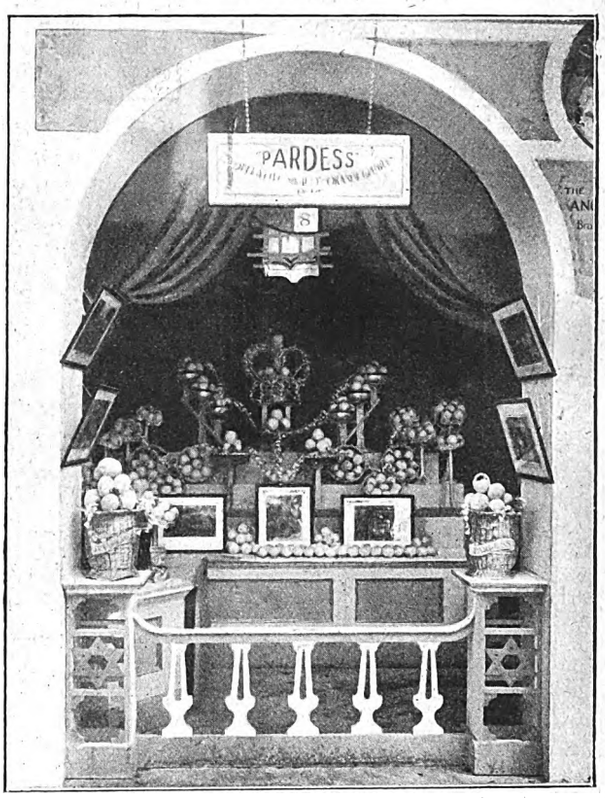
THE PALESTINE PAVILION.

Some Notable Exhibits.

Owing to the historical and sentimental associations which will always link Palestine closely to this country it was a foregone conclusion that the Palestine Pavilion would be one of the principal centres of attraction at Wembley, and it is certain that few visitors to the Exhibition will leave without finding their way to the site not far from the massive Stadium, where in rather small but not unimpressive buildings the exhibits of the Holy Land are on view. Of the contents of the pavilion there cannot be two opinions. It is a wonderful display of the possibilities of a land none too well favoured by natural resources, which only since the Armistice may be said to have had a real chance of making progress. Under the Turks the history of Palestine through long centuries was a record of stagnation, relieved in the last few decades before the War by the enterprise of little bands of Jewish settlers, who were able by their diligence to achieve outstanding success in various regions, and demonstrated what could be done in Palestine in favourable conditions. The country had one great agricultural industry—orange growing—but, broadly speaking, its resources were entirely undeveloped, industries were very largely absent, and communications were practically non-existent. In the few short years since the Armistice a wonderful change has come over the face of the country, and while undue optimism is to be deprecated, it is not too much to say that what has since been accomplished justly gives rise to substantial hopes for the future. As a result of the war operations, the country now possesses an excellent system of railways—the construction of which in the prevailing circumstances must surely be a feat unparalleled in the history of warfare—good roads now exist, agriculture is developing under the careful guidance of the authorities, who are sparing no pains to promote the utilisation of modern methods and to diversify the crops grown, and—most hopeful sign of all—many new industries are coming into existence. It has to be remembered, however, that Palestine's prosperity is so far entirely dependent on agriculture, for there are at present no indications that adequate supplies of oil or other minerals are likely to be found in the country, and in default of any such discovery developments must perforce be limited. But within the restrictions imposed by an entire dependence on agriculture, great scope exists for economic development; while Palestine, now that adequate facilities exist, can look forward confidently to the constant growth of a tourist traffic which will help to increase the wealth of the country, as it has in the case of Egypt. It is certain that there is no region in the world which could hold such an attraction for the tourist as Palestine, but before the War there was every inducement not to go, which provides an illuminating illustration of the way in which the Turks missed opportunities of furthering the prosperity of the lands under their rule. The Exhibition gives a most succinct survey of the country's potentialities in agriculture and in industries mainly associated with it, and of official and private activities. The products exhibited range from pottery to wine, from perfumes to mother-of-pearl goods, from wonderful needlework to the famous oranges to which Jaffa has given a name, and from wheat to olive soap. There is, in short, a very comprehensive display, and it is small wonder that the stalls in the pavilion are as busy as any at Wembley, and that sometimes it is almost impossible to move except at a snail's pace.

Every building at Wembley strikes a particular and quite distinct note, and the Palestine Pavilion gives a different impression from that obtained anywhere else in the Exhibition. Of somewhat bizarre appearance externally, within there is a simple but most pleasing scheme of decoration of grapes and vine leaves that affords a most admirable contrast to the stands, and sets off the centre of the pavilion to perfection. And what, after all, could be more suitable than a setting of grapes, since Palestine is the centre of a very important and growing wine industry, a fact to which some of the most imposing exhibits testify. Among the exhibitors are the Palestine Wine and Trading Company, who show a large variety of excellent wines and spirits. The stand of the Temple Society is of special interest. Here are to be seen pure olive oil soaps, mineral waters, etc.



The stand of the "Pardess" Co-operative Society of Orange Growers.

Weaving is one of the historical industries of the country, and exhibits of this industry and its associated crafts are to be seen at a number of stands. The "Hasoreg" Knitting Works show knitted goods of all kinds, and woollen and silk piece goods. There are on view wraps, woollen waistcoats in various and attractive colours, sweaters, pyjamas, neckties, and such things, and some exquisite table covers in gold and red. Then the Alliance Israelite Universelle show some admirable examples of gold and silver threadwork; the exhibits at this stand include table covers, curtains, and cushions. Finally the Women's International Zionist Organisation exhibit some wonderful lace hand-embroidered tapestries in blues and greens and other delightful colours, embroidered dresses, etc.

The production of glassware is another traditional Palestinian craft, and some magnificent specimens of glass are shown which should delight the heart of the connoisseur in such things. The glassware is peculiarly beautiful in appearance, and its delicate outlines are a special characteristic. The manufacture of mother-of-pearl objects is, of course, a famous industry of the country, and charming examples of these are to be seen at two stands. Issa Batarse, a photograph of whose exhibit appears in these columns, shows a most interesting collection of beads, rosaries, necklaces, pendants, bracelets, etc. Then Joseph Alonzo shows an admirable selection of necklaces, rosaries, charms and other objects, and this stand and the one mentioned above are never-failing sources of attraction in the pavilion.

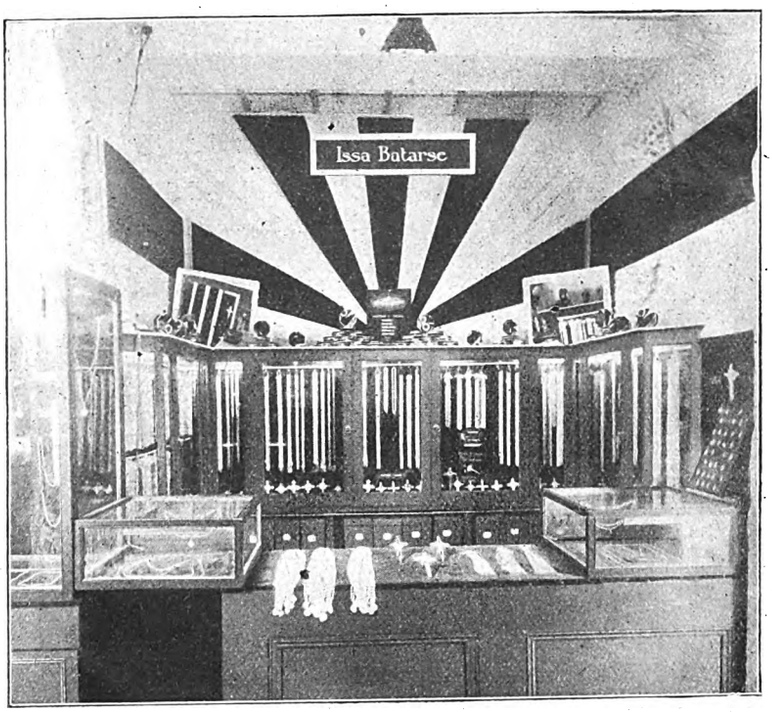
At another stand the agricultural products and by-products of Palestine form the predominant feature. Here are to be seen samples of wheat, flour, and maize, tomatoes which are to those grown here as a potato is to a pea, specimens of the egg-plant, sugar beet, and sweet potatoes. It is a most interesting display, and throws a most vivid light on the productivity of the country.

Elsewhere there is an opportunity of inspecting some of the finest examples of the craftsman's art in Palestine. Here are choice examples of hand-carved olive wood, hand-painted tiles and pottery in light colours in which yellows and blue predominate, exquisite cameos, and some delightful silver filigree work. The latter alone would make a visit to the pavilion worth while. A special feature of the stand is a wonderful model of brass inlaid with ivory and silver and precious stones which took twenty years to make. Other things that attract the attention at the pavilion are a series of etchings, and an altar hanging for a synagogue in gold on purple with gold edging. Mention must also be made of quaint models of a Jewish man and wife which are made entirely out of little rags.

There is a splendid display of Jaffa oranges by the "PARDESS" Co-operative Society of Orange Growers, and the piles of attractive golden fruit give a most welcome touch of colour to the pavilion. Orange-growing is perhaps the chief industry that people instinctively associate with the country. The fruit is believed to have been introduced to Palestine from Spain or Portugal, and its cultivation on a large scale dates from about the end of the 18th century. The present Jaffa orange, the Arabic name of which is "Shamuti," is, according to one authority, a hybrid of the Malta variety. During the last two or three decades before the War the industry developed at a great pace. In 1884-5 106,000 cases were exported, but in 1889-90 the number had risen to 200,000 cases. The increase steadily went on, until for 1913-14 the export amounted to 1,608,570 cases. The orange groves suffered as a result of war conditions, and the export trade for 1919-20 was on a relatively poor scale; but satisfactory progress has been made since then, and for 1922-3 the export reached 1,464,588 cases, and was thus not so very far below the pre-War record. The expansion of the trade in the future will depend very largely on the development of larger markets, but there is no ground for any anxiety on this score, for all who are familiar with them will agree that the Jaffa orange stands alone. It has a flavour of its own, while its seedlessness is not least among its qualities. It is considered that its seedlessness is the natural result of growing in the Holy Land. At any rate, attempts to graft the Jaffa on Spanish and Italian stocks have failed. It may be mentioned en passant that on the occasion of the Royal visit the Queen inspected the stand of the "PARDESS" Co-operative Society and remarked on the excellence of the Jaffa oranges. The business done at the "PARDESS" stand, incidentally, is on an excellent scale, some 2,000 to 7,000 oranges being sold each day.



The Exhibit of Issa Batarse

The Mother of Pearl Industry

These, then, are a few of the more outstanding features of one of the most interesting of the pavilions at the Exhibition. There are many other aspects which have not been touched on for lack of space; they must be left for visitors to find out for themselves, which, after all, is not a bad thing, for half the charm of Wembley is the spirit of discovery, which would be altogether lacking if a detailed description of every stand were to be given. Certain it is that in the Palestine Pavilion there is something to interest all, and if this branch of the Exhibition served no other purpose, it would be a wonderful educative force in informing people here and visitors from other parts of the Empire of the present state of Palestine, of its prospects and possibilities, its trades and industries. And, above all, it is invaluable for the light it throws on one of the most vivid chapters in the history of British administration.

The Palestine Pavilion is under the very able management of Major R. T. Little, whilst the official selling agents under the Palestine Organisation Committee are Messrs. H. T. King and Sons, to whom all trade inquiries should be addressed.

CYPRUS AT WEMBLEY.

A Fine Display.

While the Indian pavilion conjures up visions of the East and the romantic period of British colonisation, and gives a vivid sidelight on the way in which the Orient is now changing rapidly through closer contact with Western civilisation, and the pavilions of Canada and Australia give the visitor an entrancing glimpse of the lands of the future, the Cyprus pavilion recalls one of the earliest periods "in this rough island's story," the times of the Crusades, with which the history of Cyprus is largely linked. It was at Cyprus, it may be recalled, that Richard Cœur de Lion was married to Berengaria of Navarre, while the association with Jerusalem of the long line of the sovereigns of the House of Lusignan is well known. It also, of course, brings back memories of the classical period, when, as was inevitable from its position, the island was affected by most of the movements in the dawn of civilisation in the Near East. From the Lusignan line Cyprus passed to Venice, and from then to the British Occupation in 1878 was under Turkish rule. In the forty-odd years that have elapsed since that date, Cyprus may be said to have had its first real opportunity of utilising the undoubted resources of the island. So much has had to be done in such directions as re-afforestation and the improvement of agricultural methods that the period has been none too long for the achievement of really substantial results. As regards afforestation, it may be pointed out that under the Turks the island had been so denuded of trees that the climate had changed to a considerable extent to the detriment of agriculture generally. The exhibits now shown enable some idea to be obtained of the progress that has been made during the last few decades —an advance which has been increasingly rapid in recent years—and illustrate the great possibilities that lie before the island in the economic sphere.

It will possibly come to many people as a great surprise that Cyprus produces such a bewildering variety of products, particularly those that come directly or indirectly from the soil. The island is, as a matter of fact, ideally constituted from the agricultural point of view in almost every respect save irrigation, which has been a perpetual problem for the authorities and still remains a difficulty. If irrigation facilities were such as obtain, say, in India, then there would be no reasonable limits to the productivity of the island. As it is it yields the fruits of the soil in abundance. Its cereal crops include barley, wheat, and oats; cotton, sesame, and linseed are among the other crops; while fruit of very many kinds is produced in profusion. Grapes, oranges, lemons, pomegranates, plums, apricots, cherries, peaches, and walnuts are among the fruits that are grown, and the list is by no means exhaustive. Vine-growing is one of the principal industries, and the excellent grapes are largely utilised for the production of wines, another important and growing industry. The wines made are of numerous kinds, and brandy of a superior quality is also produced. Cyprus is famous for its carob crop; it also produces olive oil and honey, to mention only two other products. Then the mineral resources of the island are considerable, and include asbestos, copper, gypsum, limestone and sandstone. There are also important salt lakes, one of them south-west of Larnaca, the other west of Limassol, while Cyprus is also noted for its sponge fisheries. As might be expected, the manufactures of a purely agricultural region like Cyprus are rather limited. They include the production of silk and cotton goods, cigarettes, tiles, leather, and jams. Consistent efforts are being made to develop this side of the island's activities, and to find larger markets for Cypriot products, and in the latter direction it is not too much to hope that the Exhibition will accomplish a great deal. Certainly the complaint cannot be made that the Cyprus pavilion has not come in for its fair share of attention. It has, as a matter of fact, been most uncomfortably crowded at times, and the business that has been done up to the present has been of the most gratifying description.

It is rather difficult to know where to start in indicating the outstanding features of interest in the pavilion, for it contains so much that is of commercial and artistic interest, ranging from elaborate lace to sponges, from sweetmeats to silk exhibits, from a collection of the minerals of the island to one of the cereals and grains of all kinds that are produced. There is, as a matter of fact, something to interest everyone, and one can only regret that more space was not available to enable the exhibits to be displayed to fuller advantage. One of the most imposing stands is that of the Cyprus Asbestos Company. The exhibits include samples of asbestos-bearing rock and of the fibre, a pipe-line made of Cyprus asbestos and cement, and various products manufactured from Cyprus asbestos fibre, such as roofing tiles, veneered panels, etc. The panels of asbestos, which are extremely attractive in appearance, are suggested as an alternative to other forms now in use. Particularly interesting are the silk exhibits. There are on view two wonderful pieces of silk, one a magnificent fabric in green which has this year been woven from Cyprus cocoons expressly for Buckingham Palace. For sheer beauty and artistic merit this piece of craftsmanship must take a very high place. At the same stand are some excellent examples of lacework, which came in for special attention on the occasion of the Royal visit. Cyprus cigarettes are prominent in the pavilion. Judging by the number of orders that have been received, these cigarettes are assured of a permanently increasing market here. In this connection it is interesting to note that within a short space of time it has been found necessary to send three messages to Cyprus for more supplies. That speaks for itself. It must be emphasised, however, that this kind of experience is not confined to commodities so readily disposable as cigarettes. Practically throughout the Exhibition there is the same story of good business, and in a few cases it has even been found necessary to preserve supplies, such is the ready demand, so that it can readily be imagined that there is sound foundation for the belief that only organisation is required to provide Cyprus with an increasing share of the British market in the future.

There is a very good display of wines, spirits, and liqueurs. There are white and red wines, mastic, sherries, vermouth, mandarin and citrus liqueurs, and a choice selection of the Cyprus speciality, Commanderia which dates from the times of the Knights Templar. There are vintages of this renowned wine to make the connoisseur's mouth water. Three bottles of 1789 are on view—needless to say, very highly priced—while other years represented are 1819 and 1833. The exhibition of dried and candied fruits, jams, sweetmeats, and such things is most interesting, and throws a most vivid light on the potentialities of the island. To the school children who pass through the pavilion all day in seemingly endless procession the series of glass jars which permit the fullest glimpse of the luscious contents within must be a perpetual temptation. The titles on the exhibits are quite enough to arouse the appetite of the most hardened epicure. Quince paste, candied apples, pears, and apricots—the very names are surely sufficient. Then there are preserved figs, nuts, raisins, and sultanas, and other fruits, all admirable in appearance and an indication of what the island can do in this direction. As regards sweetmeats, there is the original Turkish delight, alluring in its appearance, carob sugar candy, sugar almonds, and a whole host more. Cypriot mineral waters are also on view, and it is said that they compare very favourably with the home-made products.

From these things one turns to the staple products of the island, cereals and other grains and such things. The exhibits include wheat and other cereals, flax, cotton, and wool. A feature of special interest is the bearded wheat seven feet high, the straw from which is used for making basketware. There are also exhibits of the locust, or carob, bean, which enters largely into the composition of cattle foods, and forms an important item of export. Timber, of course, figures prominently in the exhibition; and some very interesting specimens are on view. It is interesting to note en passant that during the Great War Cyprus supplied Egypt and Syria with practically the whole of their fuel requirements. Many objects made of wood are on view, notably household utensils, and such commodities as heels for ladies' shoes, in which a considerable trade is being done. A large collection of sponges serves to draw attention to this side of Cypriot activities.

Reference has been made already to the exquisite silk exhibits. There is also a good display of fascinating cotton cloths, hangings of delightfully cheerful colour. A word must also be said with regard to the excellent carpets that are shown. One of these, an admirable example, is an exact copy of a Turkish banknote, all but the watermark. One wonders how many of the thousands of visitors will realise this as they pass the carpet suspended in the middle of the pavilion.

The exhibits tell much of the life of Cyprus. There are cases of wonderful glass of various kinds, 3,500 years old, as a reminder of the island's antiquity. This glass of itself would make a visit to the pavilion worth while. Then, turning to modern times, there are on the walls ornate candles, wreaths, and bouquets used in weddings. Elsewhere are to be seen a type of the ancient plough which is still in use in the island, and the old-fashioned thresher indicating that Cyprus, in the march of progress, has not yet passed the dividing line that separates modern from mediæval methods of agriculture.

Empire Conference Resolutions.

To-day will see the opening of the debate in the House of Commons on the Preference resolutions that were passed at the Imperial Economic Conference last year. The matter is to be left to the free vote of the House, and it is possible therefore that one or more of the series of resolutions standing in the name of Mr. Baldwin may be carried, for while the Liberal vote is certain to go very largely against the proposals, the Labour attitude is less certain. All the same it would be a surprising result in view of the attitude of the Government supporters in respect of questions of Free Trade, and the most that perhaps is to be hoped for is that the Opposition will be able to make their attitude on the matter absolutely clear, so that any disappointment in the Dominions may be mitigated by the knowledge that it is merely a question of postponed hopes. What is essential, however, is that an impasse such as has arisen over the proposals must not be allowed to occur again, and it is to be hoped tht all parties will devote themselves wholeheartedly to devising some suitable machinery which will prevent this happening.

A Yugoslav Loan?

The interesting report is forthcoming from Belgrade that an agreement has been reached in regard to a short-dated loan for an amount of £300,000 by a London banking group to the Yugoslav Government. Further details with regard to this deal will be awaited with interest.

Two Promising Markets.

The Supplement dealing with the Palestine and Cyprus exhibits at Wembley which is included in this issue does not, of course, deal with the prospects of these regions as outlets for British products, but it will, all the same, serve the extremely useful purpose of bringing prominently before the notice of the business community at home two territories whose resources promise considerable development, and where there will be in the future, therefore, increased scope for trade. It would be interesting to know what special steps British firms have taken in the last few years to cater for these markets. As regards Palestine, the position, according to recent statistics, is none too promising. Here our trade rivals have been gaining ground in certain lines. What we are justified in hoping is that we shall obtain a fair share of the trade that is going. The only way to bring that about is by a greater display of enterprise by British firms—activity, it must be emphasised, which is on the right lines, dictated by a knowledge of the market and a determination to meet its requirements.

Phœnix Oil and Transport.

Sir Edward Manville, chairman of the Phœnix Oil and Transport Company, Ltd., recently visited the company's fields and refineries in Roumania, and last week a circular was issued to the shareholders summarising his report on the company's position. The account it gives of the company's activities and progress is of the most satisfactory character. Dealing with the question of crude oil production, Sir Edward states that the company's progress has been considerably increased. The intensified drilling programme, it is pointed out, which only became possible last autumn, is now on at least as extensive a scale as that of any oil company in Roumania. It is the aim of the directors to have always sixty wells in drilling, and at present the number in drilling is only one short of that number, and Sir Edward is able to state that during the current year the company will bring into production thirty new wells. The refineries are in first-class working condition, and the company is now experiencing the benefit of having acquired the refinery of the Roumanian Consolidated Oilfields Company owing to the large increase in the production of crude oil. The chairman further points out that the development of the marketing side of the company's business is proceeding satisfactorily, and that markets have been established in various parts of the Continent, and he is convinced that the company is now established as a successful commercial undertaking.

Anglo-Egyptian Oilfields.

At the meeting of the Anglo-Egyptian Oilfields the chairman, Sir Reginald MacLeod, dealt at length with the company's exploration work, and said that the net result of the year in this respect was to indicate a northerly extension of the main field. The importance of this extension, he added, could be definitely estimated only after further drilling had been done. The company's efforts to develop productive areas outside the Hurghada field had so far not been successful, but he expressed hope that the company would eventually obtain an adequate reward for its enterprise in this direction.

LIVERPOOL COTTON REPORT.

Business Restricted.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended June 11 :—

Egyptian Spot.—A week marked by a considerable drop in the American markets and intercepted by holidays was hardly one calculated to attract fresh business, and interest in the raw material has, in fact, been sadly lacking. Prices, however, have been fairly well maintained under the circumstances, and in this they have undoubtedly been helped by the steadiness of the Alexandria market. The only feature has been a slight widening in the difference between Sakel and Uppers. The Upper situation continues to be somewhat vague, and prices are very irregular. Numerous offers of Uppers for shipment from the Continent to Liverpool have been received this week, but the lots offered have been of only moderate size, and, generally speaking, the prices asked have been altogether too high to attract spinners in this country. Boston also continues to offer an occasional line of this cotton, but the offtake here at the moment is practically non-existent. In Egypt, the strength of the current Upper contract has been most marked, and this is reflected in the high quotations received from there for c.i.f. cotton.

With regard to Sakellaridis, the small inquiry here has been chiefly concerned with the better class cotton at from 350 to 400 on July, and here again owing to the small amount of actual business passing prices have shown a tendency towards irregularity. Sudan cotton of the White variety found favour on one occasion, and a line of about 700 bales changed hands at from 450 to 500 on American contracts. Sudan Sakellaridis and Tokar Sakel have been neglected, and holders of the latter are showing a disposition to press their cotton for sale. Other growths have been entirely neglected. C.i.f. business has been very quiet, which was only to be expected with the Manchester Exchange closed for the better part of the week. Forwardings to spinners for the week ending 6th instant were returned as 11,132 bales (includes Sudan cotton). Estimated sales 1,000 bales Egyptians, and 750 bales Sudan. Quotations for Brown and Upper are reduced 45 points, and those of Sakellaridis 30 points. F.G.F. Sakellaridis to-day 23.60d.

FORTHCOMING SAILINGS.

Company Meeting.

ANGLO-EGYPTIAN OILFIELDS.

Future of Oil Industry in Egypt.

The thirteenth ordinary general meeting of the Anglo-Egyptian Oilfields, Ltd., was held on June 13, at Winchester House, E.C. Sir Reginald Macleod, K.C.B., chairman of the company, presided.

The secretary (Mr. W. A. Turner, F.C.I.S.) having read the notice convening the meeting and the report of the auditors,

The Chairman said: Gentlemen, this is the fourth year I have had the honour of meeting you, and I am glad to present to you a report which, though chequered, is, on the whole, satisfactory.

The total estimated production, that is, production of crude oil after separation of water, for 1923, was 150,423 tons. This is the second year in succession we have had to report a reduction in the tonnage of oil secured; a reduction in 1922 of 11,918 tons and, in 1923, of 18,890 tons. If, however, the result of 1923 be contrasted with that for 1920, when the gross production before separation of water was 155,719 tons, the net result is not unsatisfactory.

Dehydration Problem.

I referred both last year and the year before to the difficulties which have been experienced in dealing with the wet crude which is produced from many of our wells. The production contains salt water in a state of emulsification with the crude. It is of the first importance to eliminate, or, at least, to reduce. the quantity of salt and water by a system of dehydration on the spot before transport to the refinery. Not only does this operation reduce the cost of transport through removal of water before shipment, but it also effects an important saving at the refinery by reason of accelerated throughput. While our efforts in this direction have been to a large extent successful, it has been found necessary greatly to improve and expand our dehydration plant. The emulsified crude in our Egyptian fields has proved peculiarly obdurate and intractable. The technical staff of the Royal Dutch Shell group have been actively engaged in experimental work on the fields and elsewhere by a special engineer lent by them for the purpose, and under his direction a new plant specially adapted for our fields is now almost completed. We are very hopeful that this difficult dehydration problem will then be solved. Our production has been materially checked by the frequent necessity to suspend pumping some of the wet wells in order to avoid overloading the dehydration plant. But for this, the year's production would certainly have equalled that of 1922.

The Accounts.

Turning to our profit and loss account, you will notice that the balance carried to the balance-sheet varies but little from the figures shown in 1922, £234,077, as compared with £229,719, but the items constituting this result vary materially. The working, drilling and general expenses stand out at £169,061, as compared with £202,813, a reduction of £33,752; the refinery working costs, which include transport from the fields, £64,896, as compared with £98,004, a reduction of £33,108, while the oil proceeds and value of oil stocks show a reduction of £72,980 from £604,325 to £531,345.

It is interesting, and, I think, encouraging, to note that more than half of the gross refinery working costs is paid by receipts for refining imported oil, and I would again remind you of the very great importance to this company of its possession of a refinery able to handle oil for other companies with which it is associated.

Referring to the balance-sheet, you will see that with the carry forward the sum at our disposal is £470,202, about £400 in excess of the figure for 1922. After payment of the dividend now recommended, the balance carried forward to next year's account is £236,702, almost identically the same as that brought in. The board attach great importance to the maintenance of a strong cash position, and can, I am sure, fully rely on the support of the shareholders to maintain this position. . Investments stand in the balance-sheet at £530,334, compared with £475,794 in the previous year. It is satisfactory to note that the outstanding balance of preliminary expenses has been written off, and this item will no longer appear.

Exploration Work.

I was able to inform you last year that all the new wells on the Hurghada field had given production. At the time I spoke, two wells were in course of drilling to the north of the main field. One of these wells, about two kilometres to the north, has given production, while the other proved to be a dry-hole and has been abandoned. Another well in an intermediate position was brought in early this year and is still giving a satisfactory production. Two wells drilled to the east and west of the main field have not found oil, and have thus made it practically certain that no extension of the main field to the east and west can be hoped for. The net result of the year's exploration work is, therefore, to indicate a northerly extension of the main field, but the importance of this extension can be definitely estimated only after further drilling has been done. We are, however, hopeful that the further wells to be drilled in this area will confirm the good results already obtained.

Our efforts to develop productive areas outside Hurghada have continued, but still without success. We completed one well on a licence in the Suez area and, though located on a favourable structure, no oil-bearing strata were encountered.

We are continuing to drill a new well at Ras Gharib and another at Gemsah, but the results so far obtained have been disappointing. In spite of the non-success of our efforts in this direction we have continued our geological exploration, making use of the most modern methods, and I am still hopeful that we shall eventually obtain an adequate reward for our enterprise in these outside areas.

Government and Oil Industry.

It must be realised, however, that the proved area at the disposal of this company is distinctly limited, and that, notwithstanding the very large sums of money which have been spent in testing new areas, the company's entire production to-day is derived from the comparatively small field of Hurghada. The whole future of the company, and, in fact, the future of the oil industry in Egypt, depends largely upon the facilities which the Government of Egypt are prepared to give to those who have the requisite technical knowledge and resources at their disposal as well as the serious intention which is necessary if fresh sources of production are to be found. Petroleum production in Egypt has had to face peculiar difficulties, many of which have still to be overcome, and; if the Government are prepared to give practical encouragement to those who are making real efforts to overcome these difficulties, I feel sure that the shareholders will be quite ready to support the board in continuing their endeavours. It must be a matter of considerable satisfaction to the shareholders of this company to know that, out of all the many petroleum ventures started in Egypt, this is the only one which has succeeded in obtaining regular production, or in giving any return on the moneys spent.

The report was unanimously adopted.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The Mosul Negotiations.

Questions in the House of Commons elicited from the Prime Minister the information that the British Government was still in negotiation with Turkey with a view "to smooth over any difficulties" resulting from the breakdown of the Constantinople conference on the subject of the frontier between Turkey and Irak. The British delegate to the Council of the League of Nations reported last week the failure of the negotiations, but the further discussion of the matter was left until the next session. Consequently, there is still an opportunity for Turkey to come to an agreement with Great Britain in regard to the future status of Mosul before the League of Nations is invited to give its decision on the question. It is to be hoped that every effort will be made by the two Governments to reach a settlement without recourse to the League. In the latter case dissatisfaction is bound to be caused to one or other of the parties; whereas by mutual agreement a solution can be found which will provide compensating advantages for whichever country has to give way on the main issue.

High-handed Action.

If it be the case that the Turkish Government has closed all the offices of the Eastern Telegraph Company in Turkey because the company is asking the Turkish and Greek Governments to come to an agreement as to the ownership of certain funds in its possession claimed by both, its action would seem to be unnecessarily high-handed, as well as detrimental to Turkish interests. The dispute has arisen over certain terminal charges collected at Smyrna during the Greek occupation, which the company paid into a suspense account and is now anxious to hand over in order to be rid of its obligation. In view of the Greek claim to the whole amount, the company has asked the Turkish Government to settle the question with Greece before it pays over the amount involved; but the Government, being unable to come to an agreement with the Greeks, has sought to bend the company to its will by arbitrarily closing the cable offices on Turkish soil. Unless there is more in the dispute than has been stated, it is difficult to find any excuse for Turkey's action. The Turkish right to the funds may be above challenge, but the company's desire to have the matter properly settled is natural and legitimate. The stronger Turkey's belief in her own case, the more readily can she claim to have the question settled by arbitration, and certainly Greece could not refuse. Her action against the company would seem, in the absence of rebutting evidence, further proof that Angora methods are still in many ways at variance with the practice of civilised States of the present day.

Refugees in Greece.

The reports of strained relations between the Refugee Settlement Commission and the Greek Government have, fortunately, been followed almost at once by a statement to the effect that a satisfactory understanding between the two parties has been reached. Under the Geneva Protocol Greece was to transfer a certain extent of territory in Macedonia and Thrace to the Commission for development as a settlement for refugees and as a guarantee for the loan. So far, however, out of the million and a quarter acres stipulated, the Greek Government had transferred less than seventy thousand, and the Commission, knowing that there was some opposition in Greece to the scheme, was afraid lest the delay might imply a desire on the part of the Government to go back upon the undertaking. It has now been explained that the delay is due to the non-completion of the formalities for the exchange of populations. The Greek Government has declared that it has no intention of evading the Geneva Protocol, and that it will continue to deliver territory in accordance with the agreement. It should have been possible to obtain this assurance without recourse to any public protest.

M. Raditch in Russia.

The decision of M. Raditch to pay a visit to Moscow is not likely to increase his influence with his own party or to add to his popularity in Yugoslavia. He may be able to adduce a variety of reasons why he should wish to inform himself in regard to conditions in Russia; but, in view of his strong advocacy of republicanism in

Digitized by Google

Croatia, he will be regarded by most of his compatriots, and probably by some of his followers, as seeking from Bolshevist sources the support that he has failed to find elsewhere. It may have been advisable for him to leave Yugoslavia when he did, and in the hurried, clandestine way which he adopted, and no one can require him to return to his country, if he is convinced that conviction on one charge or another awaits him. If, however, he aspires to be a leader of the Yugoslav State, and is trusting to his advantage in years in his political duel with M. Pashitch, he cannot be too careful in regard to the company that he keeps during his term of exile. The Russian visit may ultimately simplify the course of Yugoslav politics; for if the Croatian Peasant Party repudiates M. Raditch's action in going to Moscow without authorisation from, or even consulting, his followers, it may find it easier to take the next step required to give solidarity to the Opposition bloc in the Yugoslav Parliament.

Macedonia.

The Bolshevist tendency to fish in troubled waters is likely to find encouragement from M. Raditch's visit to Moscow. His interest in Macedonia is well known, and it seems to be very generally agreed that some at least of the Macedonians have, in the absence of help from other quarters, tried to get into touch with the apparently bottomless propaganda coffers of the Soviet Government. For the moment comparative calm reigns in Macedonia. M. Todor Alexandroff has been in France, and it is to be hoped that his foreign tour will convince him that sympathy with the Macedonian cause among the Great Powers cannot take any practical shape until the movement is based on constitutional methods. Instead of trying to further Macedonian interests by exploiting M. Raditch's visit to Moscow, he will be well advised to demonstrate to the satisfaction of the Allied Governments that, whatever policy may be adopted in Balkan territory to secure the ends in view, Macedonia aspires to play a civilised rôle in Europe.

The Pilgrimage to Mecca.

The dispute between the Hejaz and Egyptian Governments, which interfered last year with the despatch of the Holy Carpet from Cairo to Mecca, has been settled just in time for this year's pilgrimage. It had been the custom of the Egyptian Government to send a medical mission with the Egyptian pilgrims, but last year King Hussein discovered in this practice some encroachment upon his newly won sovereignty, and refused to allow the mission to land. The Egyptian Government retaliated by withdrawing the Mahmal, and King Hussein had hastily to provide a substitute. A year's reflection has engendered wiser counsels in Mecca. Egyptian doctors will accompany the Holy Carpet, not as a special mission, but as physicians in attendance on the Egyptian pilgrims, and Hejaz sovereignty will remain unimpaired.

Indian Politics.

There have been no sensational developments in Indian politics since we last reviewed the situation, and such attention as can be spared from the leisurely progress of the monsoon is being given to the struggle between the various extremist leaders for the control of the party machine. To observers in this country it seems as if the gentlemen in question, though they belong to the fine flower of the intelligentsia, have as yet learned very little of practical politics. It would perhaps be unfair to say that they are still obsessed by the autocracy-complex, the only live idea in the political history of India, but at any rate they do not recognise the need for the continuous interaction of leaders and parties which other countries have found to be essential. To them the machine is a gramophone, and each of them wants it to play his own tune. The change will come when the machine finds that it has a voice of its own, and quite possibly the present contest may result in a marked advance in this direction. India will have taken a definite step forward when the rank and file decide to say what they want, instead of echoing complacently the phrases of this leader or the other.

The Unionists and India.

At the present juncture much interest attaches to what the Unionists have to say about India in the re-statement of their principles and aspirations which has at last been issued. So far as we can see, it discloses no alteration in the attitude adopted during the last seven years. India's path, we are told, leads to self-government within the Empire, movement along it is to be gradual, and the grant of constitutional liberties is to be in proportion to, but not in advance of, the loyalty and capacity of the people. It is in the word capacity that the real difficulty lies hidden, for Indian politicians of nearly all shades have agreed to assert that they alone are competent to judge of their own capacity, while the Unionists, who in this particular matter represent the great majority of the nation, will want evidence and facts, rather than assertions, however vociferous. Up to the present time there is evidence of practically no qualification except parliamentary capacity; on the other side there is an array of ugly facts—communal differences, untouchability, ignorant electorates, incompetent candidates, and all the other commonplaces of the situation—and what England is looking for is some sign that Indians are setting to work in earnest to get those facts out of the way.

The Cost of Living in India.

The Bombay Labour Office, which has already done so much to extend our knowledge of how India really lives, has broken new ground by the preparation of a "Living Index" for people in Bombay who live in European style on round about Rs. 1,000 a month. The general result is to show an increase in necessary expenditure of 65 per cent. over the middle of 1914, a time when the high cost of living was already the subject of complaint, and this accords closely with the conclusions accepted by the Lee Commission for India as a whole. Private employers have, of course, raised salaries to a corresponding extent, but the Government has not, and there, in a nutshell, is one side of the case for prompt action on the Commission's recommendations. To Anglo-Indians of the older generation, the most surprising feature of the index will be that it provides nothing for the stable. A motor is a necessary of life in this grade, but the pony, once the indispensable servant, doctor, and friend, has clearly become a luxury or an extravagance. The change was doubtless inevitable, but one hears people asking whether the new life suits the liver as well as the old.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Tuesday Morning.

Imperial Preference.

Party ties take longer than might have been thought to dissolve, but there were signs in the debate upon Preference in the House last week that the old and now almost meaningless shibboleths are losing much of their force. It is true that the very mild proposals—at least the first four resolutions were mild—that Mr. Baldwin brought forward were all defeated, although the majority in one case was as low as six; but enough was said to show that a few Liberals and Labour men are convinced of the necessity of a fresh examination of the whole subject of England's tariff system.

Generally speaking, however, the debate on this very important topic was conducted on party lines, with the Conservatives the best disciplined party. This was a pity, for there can well be on Imperial problems a view that is neither strictly Conservative nor Liberal nor Labour. It was, perhaps, consciousness of this fact that made the Cabinet fail to take definite sides on the question. But having refrained from supporting any of Mr. Baldwin's resolutions, it could hardly be expected that the Government would persuade its adherents to vote for its most obvious opponent.

One does not care to prophesy, but it will at any rate be very surprising if, when next this question of Preference arises, more Labour men do not support it. They are learning now the A B C of Imperial politics, and it would be the height of illogicality if they did not apply to the Empire the fundamental principles of Trade Unionism.

The Tory Programme.

Sadness fell on us a day or two ago when we read in all the papers—at least in those papers which thought it worth printing—the Tory programme, which has presumably been drawn up in view of the forthcoming general election. For it contains little but beautiful sentiments, vague aspirations, and such harmless nebulosities as might come from a Liberal headquarters. One will be surprised, indeed, if the official Liberal programme, which must soon be published—because Mr. Asquith has just said that an election cannot now long be delayed—differs in any fundamental from it. The Daily News, in fact, at once claimed as Liberal all the more sensible parts of it, and, with some show of justification, stated that the rest of it was mere anti-Socialism.

To the outsider the most melancholy feature of this Tory programme is the desertion of the principle of Protection, for it is desertion when the Tory Party blandly accepts the last verdict of the British public as final. If the Party really believes in Protection, why does it not educate the public to better ways, instead of running away, for all the world as if it cared more for office than for the righteousness of its principles, and indulging in the most unattractive safety play? Would that there were more Sussexes in Parliament to-day to teach these dull Yorkshires how to play the game! It is not as if the Conservatives cannot bat and bowl a little, too; they put up an excellent show in the House last week. But they will never be victorious with their sitting-on-the-splice methods.

Rodeo.

The whole-hearted lovers of Rodeo suffered a rude shock last week when the British Empire Exhibition authorities finally forbade the performance known as steer-roping, which, owing to certain signs of disapproval by the public, had been going on in private. I have not seen the show Rodeo, so that it is not fair to express an opinion, but the evidence of people who have seen it is very conflicting.

The ordinary man, who certainly possesses in full degree the Englishman's love of animals, cannot see why, if the authorities are down on this sort of thing, fox and stag hunting and all the rest of it should not also be stopped. General comment is, therefore, one of wonder. The balance has to be struck, one supposes, between the degree of cruelty inflicted and the sportingness of the chance which the animal has against the man.

The Everest Tragedy.

Upon these splendid summer days and us bathing lazily in the midst of them, the news of the deaths, among the snows of Everest, of Mr. Leigh-Mallory and Mr. Irvine came with poignant touch. Nothing can be usefully said on occasions like this, for the feelings that are aroused come welling vaguely from an amorphous pride and sorrow. We do not ask to what end it all was. We know, as we knew when we heard Mr. Mallory lecture with the Mount Everest lantern slides, that these men have lived, and that we have not. People may prate to the end of their days of the futility of all adventurous enterprise; and we shall not listen to them. There is no failure in those who go down questing—the failure is with those who ask nothing of life and float comfortably down a meaningless course.

Sport.

Ascot Week was a perfect one, and everybody appeared to enjoy themselves except the backers. It seemed almost impossible for a reasonably backed horse to win, but, in spite of that, earth and heaven conspired to make gaiety pervade everything. The finest Ascot since the War, anyway.

Having more or less exhausted themselves in "Wembling," people are now occupying themselves in "Wimbling," and are exercising their acquisitive instincts at Wimbledon instead of at Wembley. Who will win the lawn tennis championships it is as yet rather early to guess. Of the women, Mlle. Lenglen seems an absolute certainty, for the much-boosted Miss Helen Wills, from America, is taking some time to find what was her game, according to all accounts, in her own country; and of the men, it is difficult to find anyone at the moment, unless it be Mr. Norman Brookes, who in pre-War years was the most attractive player I ever saw, to beat the Americans.

Mr. Baldwin's Homilies.

History may perhaps write down Mr. Baldwin as a political failure, but there is no doubt that he is a very charming English gentleman, the presence in political matters of whose type would considerably sweeten life. On politics pure and simple he never or seldom convinces—perhaps because politics cannot be pure and simple; but on semi-literary or social topics he always speaks words of sense. His latest effort, made at the City of London School a few days ago, was the extraordinary difficult one of persuading boys that there was good in Shakespeare. Shakespeare, he said, should be made compulsory, for even in its worst aspect the payment of such grinding would be a delightful old-age pension—or something to that effect.

In talking thus Mr. Baldwin unconsciously or deliberately touched on a point of importance in our educational system, namely, the prevalence of too great freedom in the teaching of things. No doubt in the old days "systems" and parrot learning were overdone, but one does find often that what the former generation learned mechanically they knew in later years how to apply vitally. The danger of our present system seems to be that in avoiding all unintelligent methods of learning nothing is being learned.

The Ethics of Cricket.

There is no more impetuous cricketer living than Parkin, the Lancashire bowler. We have become accustomed to his frenzied and impossible appeals for l.b.w. and his ridiculous endeavours to steal short runs. But we were decidedly not prepared for the extremely unsporting attack which he has just made, in a Sunday newspaper of all things, upon England's Test captain.

The truth about Parkin appears to be—at least it is the conviction, dawning in some cases more slowly than in others, of most expert judges—that he at all times is a poor field, and possesses bowling genius only when the wicket is against the batsman.

In any case, such an outburst as he has just permitted himself, is, of course, dead against the spirit of the game, and will arouse indignation even in the North of England.

A New Cathedral.

It may well be that future generations will say of this post-War period that the most notable thing it did was to build at Liverpool the largest cathedral in England. There is, Heaven knows, no place more than Liverpool which needs a cathedral, for in no town that I know do the clouds of industrialism hang more depressingly. The first portion of Mr. G. G. Scott's building is to be consecrated next month by the King and Queen. From the plans and designs that have been already published it would seem that this new cathedral will be a superb structure. Architecture is probably at its strongest at the moment, and one rejoices that this great opportunity of showing to posterity that this age was not wholly soaked in materialism and utilitarian ideas is not being lost.

In any case, it will remove the dread that seizes one when one enters upon a journey from London to Liverpool. And when the southern cathedrals have fallen into decay, this cathedral at Liverpool will be doubly valued.

The British Museum.

Not all the anti-Government "stunts" indulged in by the Press are worthy, or, indeed, have any real foundation, but the chorus of disapproval which greeted the Government's proposal last year to impose an entrance fee for the British Museum was universal, and, as now appears from the annual report for 1923, it was echoed by the public. Not for seventy years was the number of visitors to the Museum so high as it was in 1923, and the increase has been due not to more specialists, but to visitors of the "general" type. We can still lay claim to some culture, after all.

A BRITISH CONSUL FOR MONTENEGRO.

The appointment of a British Consul to reside at Cettigne may be expected to be announced shortly. More than three months ago the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs stated that the appointment of a British Consul to Montenegro had been decided upon, and that the necessary arrangements were being made. In answer to a question in the House of Commons, it was stated, on April 8, that the officer selected for the post was Mr. Parr, who had been British Vice-Consul at Durazzo since 1922. In May, Mr. Ponsonby said that some delay had arisen in the appointment, as it had been found necessary to retain Mr. Parr in his present post, but that steps were being taken to despatch a suitable officer to Cettigne, which would be his headquarters. A further selection was made, but again the actual appointment was delayed, this time owing to the ill-health of the officer to whom the post had been offered. Meanwhile it was reported that difficulties had arisen owing to the lack of suitable accommodation at Cettigne. The fears on this point, however, were shown to be groundless when Mr. Lunn, Secretary of the Department of Overseas Trade, declared that the former British Legation at Cettigne was still available, and though not suitable as a permanent consulate, could be used as temporary quarters, and added that it was hoped shortly to announce the name of the officer selected.

The Budget Debate.

The Chamber of Deputies has been occupied during the past ten days with the Budget for the current financial year. It has been a long business, and it looks as if the members will yet take some little time to finish it—they are doing the work very thoroughly.

When the Budget was first presented by the Government it was sent—following the practice in other countries—before the Parliamentary Finance Committee. The latter duly reported at great length to the House, but the Deputies, instead of relying on the expert knowledge of this Committee and dealing only with its remarks and recommendations. are insisting on going into the most minute details of the Budget itself, and in the course of the debate have asked questions and made suggestions which have laid bare how ignorant they are not only of financial matters, but also of the affairs of the world. No doubt in time they will gain experience and learn what are the really important matters with which Parliament should concern itself, the extent to which they must rely on the various Parliamentary Committees to investigate in detail and what discretion should be left to the responsible administrations; but in the meantime much valuable time is being wasted.

The Government and the Opposition Press.

A sensation was created this week by the closing by the Parquet of the printing office of Al Siassa, the organ of the Constitutional Liberals and the chief Opposition paper, and by the arrest of the editor and proprietor of Al Kashkoul, a humorous political weekly, which was founded only three years ago, and has attained great popularity and an enormous circulation. The management of Al Siassa had for some time been undergoing examination by the native Parquet in connection with articles attacking both Houses of Parliament, and the Government, which had been appearing in it, and the administrative closing of its offices was prompted by the publication in the paper of the details of the inquiry to which its editor and manager had been subjected. When the case came up on Thursday before the Assize Court, however, the latter declared the action of the Government in sealing up the printing works to be illegal, and ordered the immediate removal of the seals pending the regular hearing of the case against the management, which has been fixed for Sunday next.

The editor-proprietor of Al Kashkoul has been arrested—and, incidentally, put in chains and prison clothes, although no sentence has been passed on him nor his case been heard by any court—because of the appearance in his paper of cartoons and articles which the Zaghloulist Cabinet has regarded as offensive. On the subject of the justification of the Government's action and the degree of offensiveness of what Al Kashkoul has published, it is difficult for a foreigner to express an opinion, but, judging by what one has seen oneself of this publication, there does certainly seem to be an absence of a sense of humour on the part of the present powers that be. Al Kashkoul has provided amusement during the past three years for hundreds of thousands of Egyptians of all classes and parties, as well as Europeans—it is related that during his exile in Gibraltar Saad Pasha Zaghloul himself took a special delight in its excellent cartoons—and its disappearance would be regrettable because it represents the first really successful effort to run a humorous paper in Egypt, and, thanks to the enterprise of its manager and the talent of its staff, it has provided a much needed lighter side to local politics.

Custodian of Enemy Property in Egypt.

Mr. L. S. Hargreaves, who received the C.B.E. in the recent Birthday Honours List, became Custodian of Enemy Property in Egypt when Mr. B. Hornsby, who had inaugurated the work on the outbreak of the War, reverted to the National Bank of Egypt in order to take up the Governorship left vacant by the retirement of Sir Frederick Rowlatt. He has most ably carried on the good work started by his predecessor, in addition to rendering innumerable valuable services to the British community in general, and he thoroughly deserves the distinction which has been awarded to him. Mr. Hargreaves, who is a chartered accountant by profession. having first come to Egypt in the firm of Russel Harris and Co., has now retired from the Public Custodianship, and has gone into partnership with the firm of Messrs. Hewat, Bridson, and Co., whose name now becomes Hewat, Bridson, and Hargreaves, and whom he will represent in Cairo.

The Ægean Outlet.

With the arrival at Sofia of Senor de la Barra, President of the Franco-Bulgarian and Græco-Bulgarian Arbitration Tribunals, the question of Bulgaria's outlet to the Ægean Sea has again been raised. Before coming to Sofia Senor de la Barra was in Athens, where the Greek Government requested him to undertake a mission whereby Bulgaria might receive a free zone at the port of Kavalla. At Sofia Senor de la Barra informed the Bulgarian Government of the Greek offer, but the latter, after due consideration, replied that this offer was less favourable than the one made by the Allies to Bulgaria at Lausanne. Then it was proposed to give Bulgaria a strip of territory between Makri and Dedegatch on a ninety-nine years' lease. To show its willingness to come to terms with Greece over this vexed question, however, the Bulgarian Government told Senor de la Barra that it was willing to consider offers made on a different basis.

As far as can be gathered, Bulgaria wants sovereignty over a strip of land stretching from her southern frontier to the Ægean Sea. On these conditions, and only on these conditions, is she likely to consider the construction of a port with a railway which will be linked up with existing lines. The Greek point of view is definitely opposed to any such concession, and in these circumstances there would seem to be little chance of a settlement being arrived at.

Relations with Turkey.

M. Simeon Radeff, the Bulgarian Diplomatic Representative in Constantinople, is at present at Angora negotiating the conclusion of a commercial treaty. This treaty is long overdue, as Bulgaria and Turkey are neighbours who have need of each other. Formerly Constantinople was a good market for Bulgarian flour, eggs, and other produce. Nowadays there is a very small volume of trade between the two countries, and it is to be hoped that the negotiations which are now taking place will cause an improvement. Politically speaking, there are not many questions between Turkey and Bulgaria. The most important one is that of refugees. Many Bulgarians living in Eastern Thrace left that country in 1922, and are now scattered about near the frontier, some of them desirous to return. On the other hand, the Turks assert that their nationals in Bulgaria, numbering between three and four hundred thousand, are not allowed to have their own schools. In general, Turko-Bulgarian relations are in a period of transition, but are likely to become cordial.

June 9.

A few days ago the first anniversary of the revolution which overthrew Stambolisky's Government was celebrated. No untoward events marked this anniversary, but the date provides a useful occasion for passing in review the Government situation. On the surface all is well, and the majority of critics seem to have come round to the opinion that M. Tsankoff has definitely consolidated his position. The recent departmental, communal, and municipal elections all gave favourable results for the Government, and the Opposition, which mainly comes from Agrarians and Communists, appears to be losing ground. But appearances are often deceptive, and there certainly is a good deal of discontent. This is partly due to the continued high cost of living, with which the Government have not been able to deal effectively. The Budget, which is on the point of being voted, does not yield very much hope of any improvement in this direction. The upkeep of the Army and the service of the Public Debt alone take more than one-third of the total Budget, and neither of these expenses can reduce the cost of living. But Rome cannot be built in a day, and if the Government seriously concentrate on economic questions they may remain in power for a long time to come.

The Macedonians.

Bolshevist intrigue still continues to make itself felt amongst Macedonians. It is reported on reliable authority that agents of the Third International recently made a more or less concrete offer to the Ilinden (the legal organisation) and the Supreme Macedonian Revolutionary Organisation, presided over by Todor Alexandroff. The Bolshevists wished the help of the Macedonians against the Tsankoff Government, whilst they also desired that they should generally trouble the peace in the Balkans. The price for their co-operation was money, munitions, and instructors. Both Ilinden and the S.M.R.O are reported to have rejected this offer. This is good news, but it does not altogether rule out any chance of Bolshevist-Macedonian collaboration. For there are certain Macedonians who, for personal or other causes, are dissatisfied with their chiefs and are willing to consider overtures from Russia. Especially Macedonians friendly with M. Raditch, the Croat Peasant leader, are prone to be friendly with the Russians. For M. Raditch is now in Moscow, and would seem to be inclined to throw in his lot with the Soviet.

Meanwhile Todor Alexandroff is announced as touring Europe with the object of obtaining moral support. His organisation is remaining notably quiet, and the much-dreaded spring has passed off much more calmly than usual. This is no doubt partly due to the political crisis in Yugoslavia, which shows no signs of ending.

Russian Refugees.

There are still about 30,000 Russian refugees in Bulgaria, but a considerable exodus has now begun. It is to France that the refugees are proceeding, and during June and July some 2,000 are expected to leave. For the most part they are Cossacks who are going to work in big factories. This exodus is very gratifying, as Bulgaria is overloaded with refugees of all kind and descriptions. Calculations recently made show that at least 12 per cent. of the total population are refugees. This works out at approximately 600,000 refugees, who are from Macedonia, Thrace, Dobruja, Russia, and Armenia. Thanks to the fertile soil, the great majority of these refugees have been able to become self-supporting, although some have received governmental assistance in building their houses.

GREECE.

Athens, June 12.

General Kondylis's Resignation.

M. Papanastasiou and his colleagues are in great difficulties. General Kondylis, Minister of War, resigned two days ago, while the resignation of M. Tsouderos, the Minister of Finance, was unexpectedly announced yesterday morning. In a statement made to the writer shortly after his resignation, General Kondylis explained that his action was a sign of protest against the pro-Labour policy pursued by the Government. Surely the General must think his countrymen all very naïve if he expects them to believe such a cock-and-bull story. It is an open secret that the ex-Minister of War's sole—and very natural—ambition is to step into M. Papanastasiou's shoes. He now declares that before the middle of next week he will be the Prime Minister of Greece, though how he is going to do it (without a coup d'état) it is hard to see.

Meanwhile, M. Papanastasiou, much alarmed by the sudden turn of events, has approached the Opposition leaders, MM. Kaphandaris, Michalacopoulos, and Sophoulis, with a view to reconstructing his Cabinet on a Coalition basis. It is too early yet to say whether these politicians will accept or reject the Prime Minister's offer, but it is generally believed that even in the former case their conditions would be so stiff that M. Papanastasiou would prefer to face a serious Ministerial crisis or even an uncertain vote of confidence in the Assembly.

The Seamen's Strike.

Greece is again in the throes of labour troubles, and unless M. Papanastasiou and his colleagues abandon without delay the neutral attitude which they have maintained throughout the movement, not only does there seem to be little prospect of an early settlement, but one could even go so far as to prophesy grave developments.

Although at one time it looked as if the strike would become general, it has, so far, confined itself to the seamen and the dockers at the Piræus and the other principal ports in the country. The bakers' hands came out on a sympathetic strike, but on being promised an advance in wages resumed their work after leaving the country without bread for twenty-four hours. The seamen's strike, which commenced nearly three weeks ago and is still in progress, was due to the categorical refusal of the shipowners to increase their wages. Obeying the Union's orders, the crews immediately abandoned their ships, while every Greek steamer which subsequently returned to port was tied up, their crews joining their comrades ashore. A few days later the dockers declared a sympathetic strike, which naturally aggravated matters, as many foreign ships were obliged to depart without discharging their cargo.

One of the most unpleasant consequences of the seamen's strike is the partial disappearance from the capital of foodstuffs. Most of the fish, also a considerable quantity of the vegetables and fresh fruit consumed by the Athenians and the Piræotes, come from the islands, which, however, were practically cut off from the mainland. The unfortunate islanders, on the other hand, were left without flour for over ten days, but eventually a few small sailing boats came to the rescue. Meanwhile, several shipowners have succeeded in recruiting a number of non-union seamen, and have now established a skeleton service with some of the larger islands.

The general belief is that the Government alone, and more especially its Socialist leader, M. Papanastasiou, is entirely responsible for this deplorable state of affairs. Had the Premier, instead of encouraging the strikers by his passive attitude, adopted certain of the measures which proved so efficacious during the strike of last August, namely, the mobilisation of the strikers and the requisitioning of the ships, the movement, it is said, would have collapsed in less than forty-eight hours.

ALBANIA.

Tirana, June 19.

The Victory over the Beys.

The end of the revolution has come about in the manner foreseen by all shrewd observers. The victory of the Liberals and Nationalists over the Party of the Beys and Ahmet Zogu, who had allied himself with the Beys to accomplish his own purposes, is complete. After some sharp fighting —in the north about the township of Alessio, and in the south at Fieri, and especially at Berat—the capital Tirana has been captured. The various members of the late Government have fled—some to Bari, others to Corfu (among whom is Elias Bey Vrioni and Shefqet Vlamasi, the last two Prime Ministers), while Ahmet Zogu, accompanied by Kotta, late Minister of Public Works, has retired to the mountains of the Upper Mati towards the frontier near Dibra with about 500 men, mostly composed of his own Mati tribesmen. It is not expected that he will be able to hold out for long there, and his next move may be to cross over to Yugoslavia. His friend the Mayor of Jakova, Tsenu by name, has returned to his native place, whence he had entered Albania on Zogu's invitation to keep an eye on Bairam Tsuri's band of guerilleros, who had sided with the Liberal Party.

The New Ministry.

The Liberal-Nationalist chiefs are now all assembled at Tirana, and Bishop Fan Noli has been called upon by the only remaining Regent, the Orthodox Dr. Petsi, to form a Ministry. M. Choba, the Catholic Regent, resigned his post about Easter time, before the outbreak of hostilities. The two Mussulman Regents (Toptani and Jafer Ypi) have fled abroad. The new Ministry is announced as follows :—

Prime Minister	BISHOP FAN NOLI
Minister of the Interior	COLONEL SHALA
Minister of Foreign Affairs	SULEIMAN DELVINA
Minister of Finance	LOUIS GURAKUQI
Minister of War	COL. KASSIM KIAFZEZI
Minister of Public Works	KIAZIM KOTSULI
Minister of Justice	VINYAU

The Minister of Public Instruction has yet to be appointed.

Bishop Fan Noli is Orthodox Bishop of Durazzo. Colonel Shala was Commandant of the northern regiments. He led the revolt from the north, and is a Mussulman. Colonel Kiafzezi, also a Mussulman, was Commandant of the southern regiments, and led the revolt from the south. Louis Gurakuqi is the Scutarene Catholic leader, at one time Minister of Public Instruction. Kiazim Kotsuli has been Prefect of Valona and Berat. He is a Mussulman, and one of the most prominent members of the Liberal Party. Vinyau is an able young Orthodox lawyer from Argyrocastro, who failed to be returned at the last elections. Suleiman Delvina, a Mussulman, is a former Prime Minister.

troubles, thanks in part to the existence of the Italo-Yugoslav pact and to Signor Mussolini's strong attitude from the outset in insisting that the disturbances should be treated as a purely domestic affair of the Albanians. The latter, by demonstrations before the Italian Embassy at Durazzo and before the Italian Consulate at Scutari and Valona, have shown marked appreciation of Italy's attitude. Moreover, one of the first acts of the new Government has been to address a letter of thanks to Signor Mussolini.

The Internal Situation.

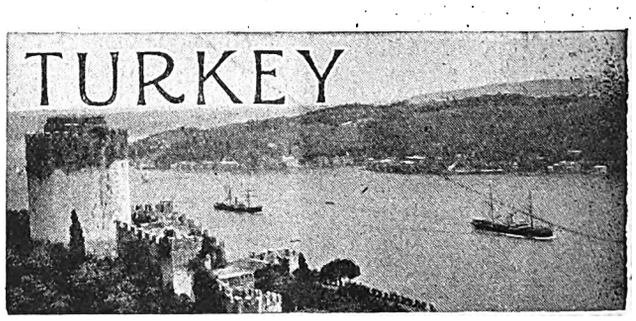
It is now sincerely to be hoped that the internal situation will be remedied. Under Zogu's arbitrary rule, and since the elections, which, in spite of Ministerial pressure, clearly pointed to the unpopularity of the Government, the country had more and more fallen into a state of anarchy. The murder of two American citizens, whatever may have been the motives of the crime, was the result of this anarchy, brought about by a Government entirely absorbed in the question of how to maintain office in the face of its unpopularity both among the people and in the army. The new men at the helm are unquestionably abler than their predecessors. They enjoy the confidence of the public, and can be said at least to approach questions with a Western outlook and mentality. They have yet to prove themselves capable administrators; but they can hardly fail to do better than the Turkish type of administrator who hitherto has mismanaged the country's affairs. Of these Zogu alone was a man of parts, and he quickly degenerated from the man he appeared to be in 1922, when he was raised to power as a Nationalist with the support of the Liberal Party and the "Clique," originally formed as a Patriotic Association. Personal ambition is the cause of his downfall. He soon alienated the support of all true patriots on this account. First he broke with the majority of the Clique. Thereupon the Clique split, and soon degenerated into a kind of Freemasonry aiming solely at the public advancement of its members. Zogu succeeded in playing off the Clique for some time against the party of the Beys, and finally allied himself with the latter. The Clique has counted for nothing in the revolution. The most that can be said of them is that the majority followed in its wake. Others of them, however, notably their chief exponents—Eshref Frasheri, late President of the Chamber, and Colonel Arinitasi, late Minister of War, stood firmly by Zogu. The chief leaders, on the other hand, of the revolutionaries, Fan Noli, Gurakuqi, Shala, Shefqet Kortcha (Commandant of the Gendarmerie), Kotsuli, Ali Klissura, and Kiafzezi, etc., have nothing whatever to do with the Clique.

M. Gurakuqi and Italy.

Louis Gurakuqi has been accused of being an Italian agent. It is true that M. Gurakuqi, as a fervent Catholic, has always been sceptical of the ability of the Albanian Beys, educated under Turkish and Mussulman auspices, of ever being able to give Albania a decent administration, and has constantly favoured the policy of a protectorate by a Catholic Power, under whose auspices Young Albania would be trained to govern itself. During the War he favoured Austria as the Power indicated. After the conclusion of hostilities he looked to Italy to take Austria's place. Events, however, made such a solution impossible. Any idea of an Italian mandate or protectorate would render the claims of Yugoslavia to Scutari practically unanswerable. M. Gurakuqi fully realised this ever since the events leading up to the recognition of Albania as an independent State by the Powers. He maintains his regard for Italy, but recognises that his original views are no longer practical politics. He has never disguised his willingness to co-operate with the best Mussulman elements, like Shala and Kotzuli; and his collaboration in the present crisis with Bishop Fan Noli, whose seat of influence is Valona, where Italy has never been popular, should be sufficient testimony to discredit the calumnies which his enemies bandy about, merely on the strength of his reasoned Italian sympathies.

Tasks of the Government.

The new Government will, no doubt, as one of its first acts, recall the exiles of 1922—Bishop Bumci, Dr. Tourtoli, Mustafa Kruja, and Pristina. The question remains as to what will be done with the Constituent Assembly. The probability is that new elections will be held in the autumn, after the passing of the new electoral law, instituting direct voting and reducing the numbers of members to forty or fifty. The danger of the Liberal advent to power lies in their belief in the efficacy of parliamentarism as the chief means of government in a country like Albania. Bishop Fan Noli, however, has learned a great deal since his return from America, where his youth and maturity were spent; and it is said he is well aware now that the conditions of Albania do not warrant the imitation of institutions evolved in Anglo-Saxon countries in totally different circumstances. The chief plank in the programme of the new Government remains the splitting up of the big estates of the Beys. Their chief difficulty will be finance, and Bishop Fan Noli and M. Gurakuqi are credited with the intention of asking Europe, through the League of Nations, to make themselves responsible for Albanian finances by means of a loan and a Commission of financial control on some such plan as succeeded in placing Austria on her feet and is now in course of execution for Hungary.



Constantinople, June 17.

Turkey's Foreign Relations.

The attack of nerves about the suspected aggressive intentions of several Great Powers against Turkey appears to have become less acute during the last few days. No official pronouncements have been made concerning the state of foreign relations except a bare communiqué of the statement made by Ismet Pasha at the meeting of the Executive of the People's Party on the 9th instant. According to this communiqué, he confined himself to remarking that the excitement over the Italian concentrations had calmed down, and that all was quiet on the Syrian frontier. The Executive also studied the report on the Mosul Conference and took note of the result; it also expressed its satisfaction that relations between Russia and Turkey were in a good state. If that was all that Ismet vouchsafed to them, they are easily satisfied, if they are satisfied; it is significant, however, that the familiar complaint about secret diplomacy is cropping up very frequently in the Press of late.

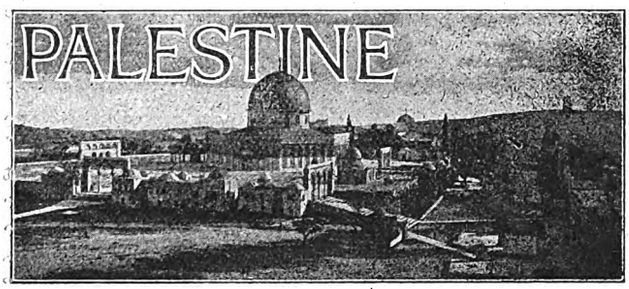
New Officials.

The new Minister of the Interior and the new Prefect of Constantinople have both entered upon their duties, and both have made the usual reassuring statements to the public about the salutary line of action they intend to pursue. They both have attempted to anticipate the justifiable criticism that any new administrative broom in this country sweeps so vigorously that for months afterwards there is not an experienced functionary left in the respective department. That particular evil has been especially rampant lately, since vigorous efforts have been made to weed out the politically or morally undesirable officials.

Improvements.

It may be a coincidence, but just at the moment when these highly applauded changes have been made, the Council of Commissaries has been showing signs of fruitful life in other departments of public life. A party of twenty odd Hungarian engineers have arrived for service on the railways and irrigation works; the Ministry of Commerce is at last preparing a Bill destined to improve the administration of the port of Constantinople; an Italian specialist has been engaged to supervise and improve the methods of cultivation of nuts on the Black Sea Littoral; and last, but not least, the Commissaries have finally made up their minds on the manner in which the "wet law" is to be applied. and their decisions are to be put into force on the 30th of this month.



Jerusalem, June 7.

The King's Birthday.

On Tuesday the King's Birthday was celebrated according to much the same programme followed in past years—a State service in the English Cathedral and a reception by the Governor of Jerusalem. For the past two years the observance has been utilised as a ground of grievance by disgruntled Arabs or Jews, owing to the falling of the date on either the Jewish Sabbath or the Christian Sunday, and necessitating a transference of the official ceremonies to a day or two earlier or later. Thus two years ago the Moslems refused to take part because the observance had been transferred from Saturday to Monday out of respect for Jewish susceptibilities (though the previous year no notice was taken of the fact that the day fell on Friday. the Moslem holy day), while last year the Jews —or most of them—abstained because the observance had been transferred from Sunday to the day preceding the Jewish Sabbath. This year, however, the calendar was kind, and nobody seems to have found it necessary to abstain from conscientious scruples, and the Governor, Sir Ronald Storrs, was able to go on English leave the following day with a feeling that he had left behind him a nicely behaving Jerusalem. Part of the Mediterranean Fleet is now off Jaffa, and many naval officers were able to celebrate June 3 in Jerusalem and add to the always remarkable miscellany of official and racial types gathered together for the occasion. The occasion was likewise distinguished by the presence of the Emir Abdullah's military band—a dozen bagpipes, four side-drums, and a big drum, the big-drummer doing fancy "stunts" with his sticks at the tail of the procession and a nervous person in front rather gingerly twirling the mace in regulation fashion—proof demonstrative of the growth of civilisation in Transjordan (if you shut your ears).

The Arab Congress.

The "Seventh Arab Congress," previously announced for June 15, has been put off until July 20, in order, apparently, to add some semblance of dignity and deliberation to the "election" of the representatives who are to take part. The Jerusalem "elections" took part a week ago, and what exactly they amount to may be seen from the following extracts from an "open letter" addressed to Musa Kazem Pasha, the President of the Congress Executive, by a certain Jerusalem notable, Shekib Effendi en-Nashashibi, who had been invited to be present at the opening of the ballot-boxes and to help in the counting of the votes. He washes his hands of the election as a piece of disreputable humbug, and points out five facts that came under his notice: "(1) Most of the addresses on the envelopes containing the voting-papers were in the same handwriting and couched in the same form; (2) in most cases the contents led off with an identical formula; (3) most of the voting-papers were filled up in the same handwriting as that found on the majority of the envelopes; (4) a large part of the voting-papers were unsigned . . .; (5) the total number of voting-papers taken from the boxes was only 918, but Musa Kazem Pasha was declared elected by 1,124 votes!" The writer refrains from asking if this is how the elections to the Seventh Arab Congress are carried out in the best-organised "constituency," what will they be like in the rest of the country?

Admittedly the "Arab Congress" is a body representing weighty Arab opinion in Palestine, but it obviously must not be taken quite seriously as the elected, representative body of Arab Palestine as a whole.

Moslem Holy Places.

What many have thought to be an unfortunate retrograde step was taken at the beginning of the present tourist season as regards admittance to the Haram Enclosure and the Dome of the Rock. In pre-War days it was a difficult thing for the non-Moslem tourist to gain admittance; he required a voucher from his Consul and a guard of Turkish soldiers. With the British Occupation, these restrictions were abolished: access was entirely free. and only during certain hours on Friday and certain days during the great Moslem Festivals were non-Moslems forbidden to visit the sacred area. A few months ago, on the plea of raising funds for the repair and upkeep of the Dome of the Rock and the Mosque of Aksa, visitors were required to buy a small booklet describing the attempts to raise funds and the condition of the Holy Places, at a charge of fifteen piastres (three shillings), and this has developed into a regular charge for admission. Al Ikbal (a Moslem paper) makes the following comments: "There is great indignation in Jerusalem against the Moslem Supreme Council's decision to charge fifteen piastres for non-Moslems to visit the Mosque of Omar. Though we are amazed at this unprecedented step, we abstain from discussing or criticising it, since we do not enjoy indulging in personal attacks. Yet we must point out that the Mosque of Omar is a holy place for all monotheistic religions, and that we have never heard of a charge to enter any house of worship. But it seems that the Moslem Supreme Council has invented this in the twentieth century, and applies its invention even to non-Moslem Arabs who have been for many years in the habit of visiting this holy spot. Certain Moslem religious scholars whose opinion we have consulted in the matter maintain that the religion forbids such a thing, and that never before in Moslem history has a fee been charged for entering into Moslem Holy Places."

A Blood Feud.

A touch, characteristic of Palestine's ability to combine the notions of modern times with those of the dark ages, is that the self-same day which saw in Jerusalem the above-mentioned exhibition of "voting by secret ballot," saw also, only a mile distant in the village of Silwan, a bad case of blood feud. The brother of a certain Ahmad Darwish had been murdered; the murderer escaped, but his family paid Ahmad the "blood-money," three hundred pounds, prescribed in such cases by fellah traditional law, to release the murderer from the death penalty at the hands of Ahmad, acting in his capacity of "blood redeemer." But Ahmad seems to have attached no value to this, and killed two brothers of the murderer.

IRAK.

Baghdad, June 2.

Demonstration Outside the Assembly.

On Thursday, May 29, while the deputies were discussing the Anglo-Irak Treaty, a crowd some three or four hundred strong collected outside the Assembly and made a demonstration against the Treaty, other cries inimical to the Arab administration being added later. Excitement gradually grew, stones were thrown, and some deputies were roughly handled. By this time a large number of onlookers had added to the size of the crowd, and Nuri Pasha, Minister of War, decided that it was advisable to call out a regiment of cavalry of the Arab Army. These troops, by firing over the people's heads, quickly dispersed the mob.

Some mystification is felt in Baghdad as to why it was necessary to call out troops to deal with so small and inoffensive a crowd. The Government had had warning that a demonstration was likely to take place, and as an anticipatory measure a large number of police had been drafted to the neighbourhood of the Assembly. The police, however, appear to have allowed the mob to gather, and to have been so dilatory in taking action to disperse it that the situation became beyond their control. This failure on the part of the very efficient police force is partly attributable to the fact that no British police officers were present—a measure taken in order to give the Arab officers an opportunity of displaying their capabilities in a time of crisis. As a result, the situation was too weakly handled at the beginning by the police, and perhaps too drastically at the end by the somewhat prolonged volleys of the troops. The indecision of the police commandant is said to be due to the large amount of contradictory advice he received from the Ministers present in the Assembly. Whether this is true or not, he has since been transferred elsewhere. There were some four or five casualties in all.

On the outbreak of the firing some panic occurred in the bazaars. Since the affair of the Assyrian Levies at Kirkuk, the mere sound of a rifle shot has been enough to raise the alarm that the Christians are setting upon the Mohammedans. It is, therefore, much to be hoped that the present political excitement will die down before the fanatical fear engendered by such events takes practical shape.

As a result of Thursday's demonstration, a quorum failed to assemble on Saturday to continue the discussion of the Anglo-Irak Treaty, and further deliberations were postponed until Monday. In the past the carrying of arms in Baghdad, if not strictly forbidden, was an unusual sight; to-day, however, one has grown accustomed to seeing the tribal deputies moving about the city followed by bodyguards of armed tribesmen, while the town deputies are provided with police escorts. Such sights intrigue the Baghdadi, and help to take his thoughts from the first blasts of the scorching winds of summer.

Murder of British Official.

Mr. Burton, a Permanent Way Inspector of the Irak Railways, while proceeding on duty by trolley along the Baghdad-Khanikin section of the railway, was suddenly attacked by tribesmen, who deliberately shot and stabbed him, and then took to their heels. One of the trolleymen ran in to Karaghan, only three miles distant, and raised the alarm, and the body was at once brought in.

This cold-blooded murder took place during the early morning of May 28. Later in the same day the body was sent down to Baghdad, where it was buried the following day in the British cemetery, the ceremony being performed by the Chaplain to the Royal Inniskilling Fusiliers. No reason is known for the crime, to which no political significance is attached.

THE CITY OF DAVID.

At the fifty-ninth annual general meeting of the Palestine Exploration Fund, which took place on June 13 at the Central Hall, Westminster, and over which Lord Burnham presided, Professor R. A. S. Macalister gave an account, illustrated with lantern slides, of the excavations which have been carried out at the site of the "City of David," Jerusalem. The lecturer began by saying that it was on the eastern, not, as tradition said, on the western, side of the Tyropœan Valley that the City of the Jebusites, captured by David, was re-discovered. Complete investigation of this eastern hill would probably take six or more years. Some of the discoveries, he continued, had been discouraging; but others aroused great expectations. From the photographs one could see how the successive occupations—Jebusite, Herodian, Byzantine, Crusader, and Arab—had used to their own purposes the older structures. Professor Macalister concluded his fascinating lecture with an account of a tunnel made fourteen years ago by a man who was searching for King Solomon's jewels. This tunnel leads to a cave, and, if funds permit, the P.E.F. are most anxious to find out what is in that cave.

EAST INDIA ASSOCIATION.

At the annual meeting of the East India Association on June 5, Lord Lamington, who was presiding, said he thought that, on the whole, there seemed to be greater reconciliation of views between the Indian and Englishmen than existed some time ago. A sad feature was that a number of the youths of Anglo-Indian families were ceasing to take service in either the civil or military services. It was to be hoped that if the advice of the recent Commission was taken, the reluctance of the youths to engage in the services could be overcome. He hoped that the views that obtained in India about the greater Indian nationalisation of the services might still be realised, and not made incompatible with the best Englishmen still being willing to go out to India and do their part in carrying on the work of the Government.

THE ALBANIAN REVOLUTION.

After a brief struggle, the revolutionaries in Albania have gained the day, and a new Government is installed in Tirana. Claiming to represent the triumph of liberalism over reaction, the new order starts under favourable auspices. The rapid success of the revolution, helped by the flight of the former Government and its principal supporters, suggests that a certain measure of unity has at last been achieved in the country, and it is to be hoped that nothing will happen to disturb this welcome innovation. It would be idle, however, to ignore the fact that the movement against the late Government started independently in the north and in the south. Both sections urged their claims to possess the seat of government in Scutari and Valona respectively: and if the subject were allowed to come up for discussion now it might bring the co-operation of the two parties to an untimely end. Fortunately, there is much to engage the attention of the Albanians on which agreement is possible. The unrest in the country was due far more to actual disabilities than to the influence of political theories, and if the new Government intends to live up to the claims of the revolution, it will have its hands full with land and financial reforms, apart from the introduction of a higher standard of efficiency into the administration. Its first concern will, doubtless, be to secure recognition abroad. As a revolutionary Government, it will realise that such recognition is not usually accorded as rapidly as in the case of ordinary constitutional changes. Foreign countries are inclined to require some evidence of stability and proof that the new Government takes its responsibilities seriously. It is greatly in the favour of the new order in Albania that the change has been effected with comparatively little bloodshed. With the flight of Ahmed Bey Zogu to Yugoslavia, all organised opposition has apparently disappeared; the chief adherents of the old régime have now all left the country, and there is, therefore, no occasion for the vindictive measures that too often sully the political pages of Balkan history. When it is seen that the Ministry of Bishop Fan Noli is capable of holding together, and does not propose to drive any section of the people to desperation by reprisals, foreign recognition may be expected to follow at once.

Disappointment will, perhaps, be avoided if the new Albanian Government does not look to be accepted immediately at its own valuation. It will have in the first place to show itself a definite improvement upon its predecessors, who contrived to prejudice their country in the esteem of Europe In view of the signal service rendered not very long ago to Albania by the League of Nations. when the country was rescued from the imminent danger of invasion, it was a churlish return on the part of the Albanians to dismiss abruptly the Financial Adviser provided for them by the Council of the League. The country that allowed one of its officials to take the post naturally resents the slight placed upon it, and is unlikely to find any special reason to defend the Albanian cause with the League of Nations. The Albanian Government may have persuaded itself that the services of the Dutch Adviser in question were no longer required; but it exposed itself to the retort that the reason for the dismissal was the stand taken by the Adviser against the corrupt practices that stultified all his efforts at financial reform. In the circumstances of the case it is probable that the Adviser's point of view will carry more weight with impartial observers than the Albanian excuses. Again, it would not commend Albania to the League if the latter found that its assistance had been invoked on entirely false grounds, as happened when complaint was laid against Greece's action in Northern Epirus, on the ground that Albanians were being expatriated as Turkish subjects, and investigation proved that the Greeks were merely carrying out the provisions of a law for the partition of large estates, of whatever nationality the owner might be.

The shortcomings of a previous Ministry, however, are apt to bespeak good will for any change in a country's government, and, accordingly, Bishop Fan Noli, the new Prime Minister of Albania, need have no misgivings as to the reception to be accorded to the new régime as soon as it has proved itself. There is nothing in his past record to suggest that he is likely to allow his devotion to Liberalism to outrun his discretion in regard to the antecedent conditions required for the success of constitutional government in a country such as Albania. Whether he will be able to carry the people with him to the extent necessary to place Albania on a sound economic footing remains to be seen. A loan is urgently needed, but there will be no eagerness on the part of foreign financial interests to advance money, ostensibly for State needs, but in reality for the enrichment of a few favoured persons. In an Albanian letter appearing on another page our Correspondent points out that at least one member of the new Government is, or has been, an advocate of foreign control for Albania. There may be difficulties at this stage in according to the country the status of a mandated territory under a single Power, but the need for financial help should at least enable Albania, while retaining her independence, to secure the services of a Commission, under the League of Nations, which would not only regulate her finances, but would also exercise tactfully sufficient supervision over the whole Albanian Civil Service to ensure the adoption of a higher standard of honesty and efficiency in the public administration. A great opportunity presents itself to the Albanians to-day. In no responsible quarter will there be any desire to belittle the potentialities of the movement which has brought Liberalism to power; but experience of the East in general and knowledge of Albania in particular justify a warning against undue optimism and the inculcation in a naturally elated people of the facile belief that their goal has been reached with the success of the revolution. Good government is not likely to be attained except by hard work and rigorous self-discipline, entailing some restrictions on self-government.

EDUCATION OF THE MODERN EGYPTIAN WOMAN.

By LADY DRUMMOND HAY.

The modern Egyptian fully realises the immense part to be played by women in the work of national regeneration, the necessity for and the influence of the education of women on the morals of a civilised society. Encouraged by King Fuad, and liberally supported by the State, during the last few years women's education in Egypt has received an eager response from all classes of the nation.

The education of children, though not yet compulsory, is freely offered to all girls and boys, who can enter Government schools at the age of five years to be educated until they reach the standard to be teachers themselves if they so wish.

The many elementary girls' schools in Egypt (some two hundred in all) provide the education for the masses. For the nominal fee of 15 piastres a month (approximately 3s.), girls between the ages of five and twelve years receive sound instruction in Arabic, arithmetic, needlework, Nature study, and domestic economy, the last two subjects being given special attention. The main object of these schools is not to educate the girls beyond their station in life, but rather to equip them to deal with such circumstances as will inevitably fall to their lot, and at the same time to broaden and refine their minds.

The girls who wish to continue their studies at the expense of the State pass from the elementary schools to a higher elementary school for examinations, and from the age of fourteen are eligible for admission to one of the training colleges.

The daughters of the bourgeoisie attend the numerous primary schools, where for from £9 to £12 per annum they can be educated from four to fourteen years. The kindergarten course (on the Montessori system) lasts two years. The primary school curriculum consists of Arabic, arithmetic, geography, Nature study (all classes), English (first year); history and domestic economy (third year); hygiene, baby culture, and first aid (fifth and sixth years). Many girls leave school at the age of fourteen, but aspirants to the profession of teacher pass from the various primary schools to the training colleges.

At the present time there is only one secondary girls' school in Egypt. It contains about eighty pupils, ranging from thirteen to twenty or twenty-one years of age, who are prepared for examinations, the final one of which corresponds to the London Matriculation. The girls, mostly of the upper middle class, pay £30 a year, a fee including instruction, books, and the midday meal. In this school it is a case of learning for learning's sake, and the girls are not prepared to be teachers; for that they must transfer at the age of fourteen to one of the training colleges, of which the two principal are the Boulac Training College and the Sanieh Training College. The former draws its pupils more from the elementary schools, and the latter from the primary schools, especially from the Sanieh Girls' School, but both offer free education, and during a three or four years' course they are provided with board, lodging, clothes, books, and a first-rate education. Christians and Moslems work side by side, religious instruction being provided for both without prejudice.

The boarding arrangements leave nothing to be desired. Large, clean, airy dormitories, wholesome food, the attention paid to personal hygiene, physical culture, and the high standard of several Swedish drill classes which I witnessed, made it difficult to realise for the moment that I was not in some important educational centre in Europe.

The Boulac Training College was established in 1912 under an English headmistress. At the time of writing there are some 222 boarders actually in the college, of whom some seventy or eighty finished teachers will this year pass out to other schools. The teachers for this training college are drawn mainly from the Sanieh Training College.

The Sanieh School was originally founded some thirty years ago by the wife of Ismail Pasha, and the present school and training college contains over 400 pupils, of whom a certain number are sent annually at the expense of the Egyptian Government to finish their education in England.

All the schools under the Ministry of Education are provided with circulating libraries of well-chosen text and story books in Arabic, French, and English, which may be taken home by the pupils. Each school has its first aid room, and a visiting woman doctor is in regular attendance to treat minor ailments and to watch over the general health of the girls. The training colleges have their own hospitals.

The school and college buildings are, without exception, large and airy; windows kept wide open allow the girls the maximum of fresh air, and, whenever practicable, lessons are conducted in the school grounds. Ample time is allowed for recreation, physical exercises, and the midday meal, provided by the school in most cases.

The demand for schoolmistresses exceeds the supply, as it is only within recent years that teaching has become a recognised career for Moslem or Coptic girls. But now they cannot train them fast enough to meet the requirements of girls' schools all over the country. Highly qualified English schoolmistresses are sought after by the Egyptian Government, who generously reward good service by liberal payment and every consideration; in the case of a headmistress, frequently providing a furnished flat on the school premises. The young Egyptian girls, after qualifying as teachers, receive high remuneration compared with other countries.

"Private" schools in Egypt there are without number, but for the most part they seem to furnish an inferior education, and not being subject to State surveillance, the healthy and hygienic conditions—such a feature of the Government schools—do not always prevail. There are also one or two "exclusive" schools for the daughters of the aristocracy, but the majority of these girls have private governesses, either English or French, and in some cases they finish their education in the boarding schools of England, France, or Switzerland.

There are, in addition to the Government and private schools, a fair number of "trade" schools for girls and women, founded by benevolent societies, supported by charity, and sometimes in receipt of a grant from the State.

These schools seek to benefit and uplift women and girls of the poorest and lowest classes by teaching them first the rudiments of education, then some trade by which they can subsequently earn sufficient money to keep themselves decently No praise can be too high for the founders and supporters of these institutions, amongst the most active of whom is King Fuad, for they do an immense amount of good in a practical way.

The trades taught are generally embroidery, lace-making, carpet-making, dressmaking, etc., which are not only profitable from a material point of view, but assist in developing an artistic sense of colour and harmony latent in the majority of Egyptian women, and as a rule remarkably expressed by the schoolchildren in their kindergarten work.

EGYPT AND THE SUDAN.

To the Editor of THE NEAR EAST.

Sir,—As you have allowed Coles Pasha, an old Egyptian official, to express his opinions in your valuable columns, I hope you will permit another old Egyptian resident of the commercial class to do likewise, though my opinions may be utterly at variance with his.

Coles Pasha gives us the following reasons why Britain should retain entire control of the Sudan :—

1. "England has special rights in the Sudan because of the preponderating help she gave in recovering it." Without going into actual figures, let me state that more Egyptian than British soldiers were employed in the reconquest of the Sudan, and all the expenses connected therewith were borne by the Egyptian Exchequer. I may add that the application of the principle laid down by Coles Pasha would land us into enormous responsibilities. We know Britain played a very preponderating part in securing Greek independence just 100 years ago, and a still more preponderating part in driving the Central Powers from France, Italy, and Serbia, but I have not heard anyone on the strength of that claiming our right to control the national destinies of those countries.

2. "Egyptians before governing others should prove they are able to govern themselves." This inference that the Egyptians cannot govern themselves ill becomes an old servant of the British Occupation that has done nothing to improve the social conditions of the workmen of this country. Look at the miserable slums of Cairo, covering fully one-third of the urban area, which are a perfect disgrace, and have earned for Cairo the distinction of being the dirtiest city in the world. What has the British Occupation done to put an end to these evils? It has acted like the dog in the manger; it has not only done nothing, but even opposed the creation of a municipality that might have done something.

Look at Menufia, the richest province in the kingdom. No express trains run to this province. Its capital, Shibin-el-Kom, is but fifty miles from Cairo, and a train journey between the two places takes 2½ hours.

The British Occupation has done much for the foreign bondholders and for European capitalists, but for on one else.

The new National Government will tackle all these knotty problems honestly, courageously, and ably, in the interests not of a privileged few, but of the whole community.

3. "Egypt is a small country, and other riverain countries have equal rights in the Sudan." I do not see the point raised here. Surely Britain is not a riverain country, and I fail to see what good might result in the intervention of, say, Abyssinia, in the affairs of the Sudan. Egypt is not a small and contemptible country. It has an area, exclusive of the Sudan, four times the size of the United Kingdom, and a population of well over 16 millions. Not one of the other riverain countries about which Coles Pasha evinces so much concern can compare to Egypt in territory and population.

4. "The population south of Fashoda are unlike the Egyptians in manners, customs, religion, and colour." Therefore, à fortiori, Britain should not have the control of the Sudan, for surely the British are more unlike those people in all those respects than the Egyptians.

5. "The Sudan wants British capital for its development." So do many other countries, to wit, Bolshevist Russia, Mexico, South America, Persia, and so on. We do not claim to rule over those countries, though far more British capital is invested in them than in the Sudan.

6. "All the useful works of the last thirty years would disappear with the disappearance of British control." This is begging the question with a vengeance, and would be difficult to prove. Let me begin by saying it is an indisputable fact that the Sudan cannot be colonised by Englishmen in the same sense that America and Australia have been colonised, on account of climatic conditions.

Not even the extremest Egyptians desire that from one day to another the present administration in the Sudan should be entirely changed. What all Egyptians claim, and, I believe, rightly, is that the Sudan must be an integral part of Egyptian dominions. Once the principle is admitted by Britain, the manner in which it must be governed and the safeguarding of British economic interests and even of British preference can be discussed in a friendly manner, and there is no doubt an agreement could be arrived at that would satisfy all parties. Egyptians have no interest in thwarting the economic development of the Sudan or the development of cotton grown there by British companies. On the contrary, the interests of the Sudan are identical with those of Egypt, and any measures likely to prove beneficial to the one must eventually redound to the benefit of the other.

Your correspondent, Coles Pasha, has not proved that the best form of government for the Sudan or any other country is a body of officials imported from a far-off country, who have no stake in the country.

We who have been born and reared in the principles of government of the people by the people and for the people look upon that as rank political heresy of the highest degree.—I am, etc.,

J. AMIGO.

SIR ERNEST DOWSON.

A correspondent writes to point out that justice was hardly done in our last letter from Cairo, contained in THE NEAR EAST of June 19, to the services rendered to the cause of Egypt by Sir Ernest Dowson. He remarks, further, that Sir Ernest did not succeed Sir William Brunyate as Financial Adviser in Egypt, for Sir William handed over the Acting Financial Advisership in April, 1915. and it was not until 1922 that Sir Ernest was appointed Financial Adviser. "He," our correspondent continues, "no doubt acted in the office from an earlier date, but I believe I am right in saying that he never acted until after the retirement of Sir Paul Harvey, who held the office substantively and held it well on into 1920 at least. . . . . A reference to your own files will show that during the intervening period Egyptian Government finance suffered a very serious check, the solvency of the reserve fund falling into some danger. . . .

"A CONSUL IN THE EAST." By A. C. Wratislaw. With Illustrations. (London: Wm. Blackwood and Sons. 15s. net.)

It would be an amusing, if difficult, task to make a scientific classification of writers on foreign affairs and events. We shall not attempt it here. But, omitting such horrors as propagandists, we may roughly distinguish between those who have nothing or but little worth telling to communicate and those who have knowledge worth communication. Most of the first and far too many of the second lack, however, the power of communication, and it is only a choice few who can "spin a yarn" really well.

Mr. Wratislaw is one of these choice spirits. And not only is his yarn well spun, but it is of the best material. For some forty years, beginning in 1883, he has lived and worked in Constantinople (twice), Salonica (twice), Erzeroum, Smyrna, Philippopolis, Basra, Tabriz, Crete, and Beyrout. Readers of THE NEAR EAST will remember his notes from Crete, and his name is a household word to those who served in the Great War in the Salonika area. He has always kept his eyes and ears open, and his value to his own Government can well be imagined. As a matter of fact, it is left to the imagination, for nowhere is this side of his career touched upon. But we get plenty to feast on. In page after page the surroundings are vividly brought before us, sketched in a few firm lines. We are spared sermonising. He has too keen a sense of humour to try to make us believe that any person or thing is totally bad. Stories (eminently not of the "chestnut" variety) are on almost every page, and Mr. Wratislaw is a born raconteur, and his whimsical humour adorns even the most gruesome of them and brings out to the full the comic side of the others. It is a grievous temptation to "lift" one or two, but we have resisted it, not only in order to avoid the sin of stealing, but also, we fear, because the choice is too great.

Where all is of value in one way or another we think perhaps that the most serious (if such a word can be used of so sparkling a narrative) contribution to history is contained in the Persian chapters, with their vivid account of the course of affairs in Tabriz during the "constitutional" revolution which ended in the late Shah's hurried departure. But the fact is that the best detective story is not more difficult to lay down unfinished than is this book once begun. We trust that the author intends to devote part of his retired leisure to future writing.

BURMA AND THE EMPIRE.

Lord Olivier, Secretary for India, presided over the forty-fourth annual Burma Dinner at Princes Restaurant, Piccadilly, on June 5.

Proposing the toast of "Prosperity to Burma," Lord Olivier said he wished to see it developed on the lines for which it was specially qualified. After visiting the British Empire Exhibition he had been more than ever impressed with the splendid forest and mineral resources of Burma. The Burma Pavilion, with the Indian Section, formed the most attractive exhibits at Wembley.

Mr. J. M. Symus, replying, said that to-day in Burma the prevailing cry was "Burma for the Burmans." It was owing to the great educational reforms initiated under the paternal régime of Sir Reginald Craddock, and to the sympathetic encouragement of that wise and virile Governor Sir Harcourt Butler that the young Burman was coming into his inheritance. There was astounding ignorance in Great Britain concerning Burmese affairs, and the place of Burma in the Empire. At Wembley they would see Burma as a separate and successful entity.

THE LOYALTY OF INDIA.

Lord Willingdon received the freedom of the borough of Hastings on June 6.

At a luncheon held in the Alexandra Park afterwards, Lord Willingdon, replying to the toast of "The New Freeman," spoke of India and the little which the people of England knew of that great country. India, he said, had 320,000,000 people of the 430,000,000 in the British Empire, but when they realised that, they realised none of the industrial and commercial possibilities of India. It was perfectly true that there were great difficulties in front of them. It was perfectly true that great misunderstandings had taken place. "But I do say with every confidence," he went on, "that if we here show imagination and sympathy for the legitimate hopes and aspirations of Indians in their own country, then I am perfectly certain that India will remain in the future, as she has proved in the past, a loyal and contented portion of the British Empire."

NOTES AND NEWS.

167, Strand, London, W.C.2,
Tuesday Morning.

Pending Loans.

Under favourable conditions more than one Near Eastern loan would probably have been negotiated by now. However, with the improving position it is probable that the next half-year will see one or two Near Eastern loans floated. Those on the tapis include, of course, one for Greece, and also one for Yugoslavia, while it is quite probable that there will be a loan for another Balkan country.

Egyptian Hotels.

The development of the tourist traffic in Egypt is reflected in the very satisfactory report forthcoming from the Egyptian Hotels for the year ended April 30. For that period the profits were £68,023, as compared with £47,374 for the previous year and £52,852 for 1922. It is proposed this time to pay a dividend of 35 per cent. on the ordinary shares, as against 30 per cent last year and 25 per cent. the year before, to place £15,000 to the special reserve, and to carry forward £8,583, as against £8,083. Reference was made in last year's report to the proposed sale of the company's undertaking to the Société des Grands Hotels d'Egypte. It is stated that this proposal is still under discussion, but no definite agreement has been concluded.

Attock Oil Company.

The report of the Attock Oil Company for 1923, which has just been issued, makes an excellent showing. The company was formed in 1913, and the results obtained for the past year have enabled the directors to propose an initial distribution of 6 per cent. The profit on the year, including profit on exchange and after charging up expenditure on well boring, was £149,226, and the allocation to depreciation is £58,000, and after payment of the dividend of 6 per cent. there will remain to be carried forward £3,051, as compared with £1,825. At the recent meeting of the Burmah Oil Company the chairman referred to an arrangement between that concern and the Attock Oil Company, under which the Burmah Company is marketing the products of the Attock Company, and the report states that the terms should ensure a steady off-take of products at satisfactory returns.

Thos. Cook and Son.

The formation of two Thos. Cook and Son private companies has just taken place. One of the new companies is Thos. Cook and Son, Ltd., with a nominal capital of £1,000,000 in £1 shares, which will acquire the business of tourist and shipping agents carried on by Thos. Cook and Son at Ludgate Circus and their various branches throughout the world. The other company is Thos. Cook and Son (Bankers), Ltd., with a nominal capital of £200,000 in £1 shares, which will acquire the business of bankers carried on by Thos. Cook and Son. The change has been made for family reasons, and will not involve any change in the direction and management of the business. The first directors of the general business will be Messrs. F. H. Cook (Chairman) and E. E. Cook, sole partners; Captain E. C. E. Smith, M.C., nephew of the partners; Messrs. G. E. Howse, general manager; H. H. Spiller, a manager; and H. W. Hill, chief accountant.

Development of the Firm.

The business of Thos. Cook and Son was established in Leicester in 1841—83 years ago—by the late Mr. Thomas Cook. The headquarters were removed to London in 1865, and a few years later the name of the firm became Thos. Cook and Son. The father and son were the founders of the organisation for travelling known all over the world as "Cooks Tours," which has become a great feature with so many of the travelling public who trust to meet at every corner of the globe an adviser and assistant in the difficult problems which confront the individual or collective traveller. The business, which first commenced with British railways, was subsequently extended to the Continent, and in course of time the huge organisation has so developed that at present the firm's offices number 150 or more, and are established in nearly every quarter of the world. The rapid development of the business was no doubt assisted by the introduction by Mr. John M. Cook of the international travel ticket and the establishment of the banking and exchange and shipping and forwarding sections of the business. Following the death of Mr. Thomas Cook, the founder of the firm, and Mr. John M. Cook, his son, the business has been in the hands of Mr. Frank Henry Cook and Mr. Ernest Edward Cook, the grandsons of the founder.

Wembley's Progress.

It is impossible not to be impressed by the growing success of the Exhibition. Each week sees an increase in the figures for admission, and if the tendency goes on—and it certainly will—Wembley is likely to be a rather crowded resort in August, to put it very mildly. Even now moving about in the extensive grounds is at certain periods not unlike progress in a crowded City street.

Imports During 1923.

According to unofficial figures, imports during 1923 were valued at 2,100,982,000 levas against exports of the value of 1,653,757,000 levas. The adverse trade balance is thus approximately 450 million levas (equivalent to £750,000 at to-day's rate of exchange). One of the main reasons why imports exceed exports was the sharp rise which took place in the value of the lev during the summer of 1923. This year prospects are brighter, as there are considerable exports of tobacco, while imports have declined.

TURKEY.

Constantinople, June 7.

The Financial Position.

The slow but steady depreciation of the Turkish money during the last fortnight is causing much apprehension in official circles, for it is recognised that the old cry of speculation is no longer applicable since stringent measures have been taken to put a stop to it. One facet of this uneasiness is seen in the suggestions in the papers that the internal loan is being deliberately boycotted in order to damage Turkish credit, and that banking houses should be forced to reserve a part of their portfolio for this loan, and that they should grant advances to clients on the security of this scrip on the same terms as they would on scrip of the Unified for example.

A Prohibition Modified.

A recent modification of a hasty piece of legislation, which prohibited the import of artificial silk and its use in manufacturing fabrics presumably for the benefit of the local silk industry, is a happy example of a return to common sense. The manufacture of jersey-knitted fabrics with artificial silk is exempted from the scope of this law, and this has afforded relief to a growing home industry, particularly in Constantinople, where it is estimated that about 1,500 persons are engaged in the manufacture of jersey-cloth, and thereby are enabled to supplement appreciably their scanty means. Home industries on a modest scale which do not require the installation of machinery, but which use to advantage the extraordinary manual deftness and patient industry of the women of this country are of considerable value in this country, and it is refreshing to see this fact recognised.

INDIA'S TRADE IN 1923-24.

Decline in Imports.

H.M. Senior Trade Commissioner in India, Mr. T. M. Ainscough, O.B.E., has forwarded to the Department of Overseas Trade the following survey of the import trade of India during the year April 1, 1923, to March 31, 1924.

The imports of private merchandise into India during the year showed a decrease in value of 2 per cent. from Rs. 233 crores to Rs. 228 crores. while exports, including re-exports, increased by 15 per cent. from Rs. 314 crores to the record figure of Rs. 362 crores. There was a visible balance of trade in favour of India to the extent of Rs. 62 crores as compared with a credit balance of Rs. 25 crores in 1922-23, and a debit balance of Rs. 32 crores in 1921-22. For the first time sterling purchases in India from exchange banks and firms and payments in India to local bodies, etc., against proceeds of sterling loans floated by them in London and taken over by the Secretary of State, have been taken into account in arriving at the balance of trade.

The total imports from the United Kingdom declined from 140 crores to 132 crores, and the British share of the total trade was reduced from 60 per cent. to 58 per cent. The shares of our principal foreign competitors, however, remained practically constant. The United States supplied 5½ per cent. of the total, Japan 6 per cent., and the German share was increased from 5 per cent. to 5¼ per cent. A notable feature of the year was the heavy import of sugar from Java, which brought Java's share of the total trade to over 6 per cent.

On the whole, the year was a colourless one, and the activities of most importers were directed towards the final clearance of old stocks, which are now practically exhausted, the settlement of outstanding accounts against dealers, and purchases on a most limited scale. It would appear that the statistics under review record the low-water mark of India's import trade for many years to come. A slow but distinct improvement is already noticeable, and it is to be hoped that the forthcoming year will show an increase, not only in the figures of the total imports into the country, but in the proportionate share of the United Kingdom.

Textiles.

The total imports of cotton yarns fell from 926 lakhs to 793 lakhs. British imports were reduced from 569 to 461 lakhs, and Japanese from 320 to 285 lakhs.

The total trade in piecegoods (unbleached) shrank from 931 million yards valued at 30½ crores to 704 million yards valued at 23 crores. A most noteworthy falling off is shown in the imports from Lancashire, which were reduced from 833 million yards, valued at 26½ crores, to 600 million yards valued at 19 crores. The Japanese share was slightly increased from 90 million yards, valued at 3.5 crores, to 96 million yards valued at 3.6 crores. This reduction in grey goods may be attributed almost entirely to the high prices ruling during the year. These were above the limits of Indian buyers, and caused a certain amount of substitution of the cheaper Indian mills goods and of the products of local hand looms.

There has been a satisfactory increase in the total trade in piecegoods (bleached) from 402 million yards, value at 15 crores, to 415 million yards, valued at 15½ crores, and Lancashire has obtained her fair share of this increase, the shipments advancing from 395 to 403 million yards and values from 14.6 to 14.62 crores. Imports from Switzerland show a noteworthy increase from 991 thousand yards, valued at 9½ lakhs, to 4¾ million yards valued at 43 lakhs. Dutch shipments rose from 18 to 22 lakhs.

A most satisfactory expansion is to be recorded in piecegoods (coloured, printed, or dyed) from 244 million yards, valued at 12½ crores, to 347 million yards, valued at 17½ crores. British shipments rose from 212 million yards, valued at 10½ crores, to 303 million yards valued at just over 15 crores. This was principally made up of dyed and coloured woven goods, and it is noteworthy that India has not yet resumed purchases of prints to any extent. The trade of our Continental competitors increased materially. Italian shipments rose from 15½ lakhs to 45¼ lakhs, those from Switzerland from 18½ to 27½ lakhs, but imports from the Netherlands fell from 67 to 44 lakhs. It is difficult to say to what extent imports from Switzerland represented cloth woven in Lancashire, but dyed and finished in that country. Italian competition is becoming more serious, and the returns for the forthcoming year will probably show an even greater advance.

The total imports of sewing cotton remain fairly constant at 1½ million lbs., valued at 71½ lakhs. The United Kingdom supplies were valued at 66 lakhs. The trade in haberdashery and millinery is still considerably below the normal, although the total imports advanced from 93 to 99 lakhs. The British share fell from 35 to 32½ lakhs, mainly owing to the competition from Germany, the imports from that country rising from 19½ to 27 lakhs. The shares of Switzerland and Japan remain fairly constant at 16½ and 11 lakhs respectively. A most satisfactory increase is to be recorded as regards woollen piecegoods. The total imports rose from 3 1-3 million yards, valued at 99 lakhs to 7½ million yards valued at 178 lakhs. The share of the United Kingdom rose from 1¾ million yards, valued at 67 lakhs, to almost 4 million yards valued at 108 lakhs. The shares of all competitors were increased, notably that of Germany, from 8 to 20 lakhs.

Machinery and Millwork.

There has been a steady reduction in the imports into India of machinery and millwork each year since the boom period of 1919-20 and 1920-21

The total imports of machinery and millwork fell from 23½ crores to 19 crores. British shipments were reduced from 20 to 16¼ crores, while those from the United States of America fell from 2¼ to 2 crores. Even shipments from Germany, in spite of the depreciated mark, shrank from 78 to 43 lakhs. The total imports under the various classifications of machinery were as follows in lakhs:—Cotton machinery, 560; jute machinery, 137; electrical machinery, 222; boilers, 99; mining machinery, 108; oil crushing and refining machinery, 38; paper-mill machinery, 6; refrigerating machinery, 9; rice and flour-mill machinery, 21; saw-mill and woodworking machinery, 10; sewing and knitting machines and parts thereof, 54; sugar machinery, 13; tea machinery, 39; metal-working machines (including and mainly consisting of machine tools), 52. American competition has been more keenly felt in electrical machinery, in which the share of the United States rose from 34 to 41 lakhs as contrasted with a reduction in the British imports from 199 to 164 lakhs. The British share of the total trade remained at approximately 85 per cent.

The total imports of railway plant and rolling stock rose from 11 to 11.72 crores. The British share advanced from 10.4 to 11 crores, and, as usual, there has been little competition. Imports from Australia and New Zealand amounted to 18 lakhs (mainly sleepers), those from Belgium to 21 lakhs, and those from the United States of America to 17½ lakhs.

Iron and Steel.

The total trade in iron bars and channels fell from 45 to 23 lakhs. The British share was reduced from 15 to 7 lakhs, the Belgian from 24 to 13 lakhs, and the German from 2½ lakhs to a negligible quantity. A slight increase is to be noted in the total trade in steel beams, pillars, girders, and bridge work from 126 to 130 lakhs. Imports from the United Kingdom remained steady at 74 lakhs, imports from Belgium rose from 42 to 49 lakhs, while those from Germany fell from 5 to 2 lakhs. The total trade in bolts and nuts diminished from 34 to 27 lakhs, the British share falling from 17½ to 15 lakhs. American shipments were reduced from 5 to 2½ lakhs, and German from 3 to 1½ lakhs. The trade with other countries remained constant at 8 lakhs.

The total imports of hoops and strips rose from 25 to 31 lakhs. The British share advanced from 17 to 34 lakhs, while the Belgian declined from 4½ to 3¾ lakhs, and the American rose from 1¾ to 2¼ lakhs. There was very little change in the total trade in nails, rivets, and washers (other than wire nails), which rose from 11 to 12 lakhs. The United Kingdom supplied 5½ lakhs, Norway 2½, Sweden 1, and Belgium 1½ lakhs. The total imports of cast pipes and fittings during the period fell from 27 to 15 lakhs, those from the United Kingdom from 21 to 14, and those from other countries from 3 to 1½ lakhs. The past two years have witnessed a most satisfactory and steady increase in the imports of galvanised sheets. During the period under review the total imports rose from 122,473 tons, valued at 366 lakhs, to 165,038 tons, valued at 517 lakhs. It is most encouraging to observe that the United Kingdom has regained her exclusive position in this trade, and during last year she supplied 159,134 tons, valued at 499 lakhs. The only slight competitor is the United States, which supplied 15 lakhs. Imports of tinned plates rose slightly from 43,621 tons, valued at 169 lakhs, to 44,090 tons, valued at 179 lakhs. The United Kingdom maintained its position fairly well, and although British quantities were reduced from 38,739 tons to 37,496 tons, the values increased from 149½ to 152 lakhs. The American share increased by 2,587 tons and Rs.11 lakhs.

Although the volume of imports of sheets and plates (not galvanised or tinned) rose from 96,622 tons to 108,142 tons, the value of the total imports fell from 187 to 181 lakhs. The United Kingdom improved its position from 83 to 112 lakhs, whereas the Belgian share fell from 55 to 39 lakhs, and the German fell from 41 to 26 lakhs. There has been a considerable contraction in the total import of wrought tubes, pipes, and fittings from 144 to 8 lakhs. Imports from the United Kingdom shrank from 69 to 59 lakhs, those from the United States of America from 52 to 10 lakhs, and those from Germany from 17 to 6 lakhs. The United Kingdom has improved her relative position in the trade. The total trade in wire nails fell from 37½ to 31 lakhs. Imports from Germany diminished from 20 to 13 lakhs, but those from Belgium increased from 12 to 13½ lakhs. Unfortunately, the United Kingdom only figures with an import of Rs.68,000. The total trade in wire rope expanded from 26 to 29 lakhs, and the share of the United Kingdom increased from 22 to 28 lakhs. It is satisfactory to note that during the year there was virtually no competition whatever, and that the United States only supplied a negligible Rs.60,000. The valuable trade in steel bars and channels shows a slight reduction from 295 to 246 lakhs. The Belgian share fell from 167 to 156 lakhs, the British portion from 41 to 32 lakhs, and the German from 58 to 37 lakhs. Luxemburg and France sent most of the remainder.

Hardware.

This is such a comprehensive heading that it may be of interest to examine the total imports in each item. The figures represent lakhs:—Agricultural implements, 21; builders' hardware, 24; domestic hardware, other than enamelled ironware, 9; enamelled ironware, 31; gas mantles, 5; implements and tools, other than agricultural implements and machine tools, 67; metal lamps, 60; parts of lamps other than glass, 9; safes and strong boxes of metal, 4; stoves, 7; other sorts, 203. The total imports of hardware fell from 515 to 442 lakhs. This reduction is particularly noticeable in the case of the United Kingdom, whose share fell from 254 to 207 lakhs. The German proportion was not reduced to quite such an extent, and fell from 112 to 93 lakhs. The United States of America fell from 77 to 72 lakhs, Japan from 33 to 26 lakhs, while other countries increased from 30 to 32 lakhs. While British manufacturers are retaining a fair share of the higher grade trade in articles used by Europeans and in industry, German makers are rapidly regaining their position in the bazaars of India in the cheapest forms of hardware and in novelties.

Electrical Instruments and Apparatus.

The imports under this large and comprehensive heading advanced from 216 to 226 lakhs. The United Kingdom more than maintained its position, the imports totalling 172 lakhs. Imports from Italy were reduced by 5 lakhs, and those from Germany by 5 lakhs. Supplies from the United States of America remained stationary at 18 lakhs. There was a reduction in the imports of wires and cables of some 7 lakhs, but the trade under the other headings was well maintained.

The total imports of motor-cars during the year rose from 4,323, valued at 138 lakhs, to 7,984, valued at 205 lakhs. This increase has been contributed to by most of the supplying countries. The number of British cars imported rose from 449, valued at 33 lakhs, to 1,005, valued at 45 lakhs The Canadian imports advanced from 1,846, valued at 37 lakhs, to no less than 3,290, valued at 65 lakhs. American shipments rose from 1,386, valued at 44 lakhs, to 2,865, valued at 69 lakhs. Although the import duty of 30 per cent. still handicaps this trade, it is somewhat difficult to demonstrate from the figures that the cheaper American and Canadian cars tend to be imported in preference to the more expensive British and European makes. The general impression, however, is that a high rate of duty depresses the sale of the higher-priced cars as compared with the cheaper American types. The number of motor-buses, vans, and lorries increased from 480, valued at 22 lakhs, to 1,044, valued at 25 lakhs. If these figures are correct they tend to show that there has been a very considerable reduction in the average price per lorry imported.

AGRICULTURE IN IRAK.

Proposed Irrigation Schemes.

The following particulars are taken from the Agricultural Bulletin of Irak for the month ended May 15 :—

The month was practically rainless except for thunderstorms in Upper Irak, which caused a certain amount of damage to the matured cereals. The rainy season has not been favourable to the winter crop of cereals. The early rains were deficient; late winter rains were normal and well distributed; but the early spring rains were again deficient. Large areas of late sown cereals on unirrigated land will barely return the seed. On irrigated lands the late sown crop is short in straw and the ears are stunted and shrivelled. A heavy attack of rust disease in cereals has been prevalent all over the country. Locusts have done considerable damage to the cereal crop in the Mosul and Arbil liwas. In general the season has been particularly adverse to the wheat and barley crops, with the result that both in quantity and quality the exportable surplus of these grains is likely to be well below the average for the previous two seasons.

As contrasted with the cereal crop the season has so far been particularly favourable to the cotton crop. The germination of the commercial crop has been higher than in any previous year. The absence of late spring rains has necessitated more frequent irrigation than is normal at this season. In the Upper Diala area a few hundred acres of cotton seedlings have been eaten up by locusts. Cultivators have been advised to re-sow these lands after the locusts have ceased to feed on the vegetation. A reasonably good crop can be expected from seed sown as late as mid-June. The British Cotton Growing Association have kindly agreed to supply the requirements of cotton seed free of charge to those cultivators whose crops have been destroyed by locusts.

The cotton seed issues up to the end of the period under review were 287,000 lb., which is sufficient to plant about 15,000 acres, as compared with 5,000 acres in 1923, and nil previous to 1919.

The prospects of the date crop, and particularly that of halawi, are very good. Palms have produced an average number of flowering shoots (talab) well in excess of that of last year. Up to the present the climatic conditions have been distinctly favourable to the date crop. The entomological staff has laid down comprehensive experiments to deal with various insect pests and diseases of dates and of the date palm. The Hills Brothers Co., Basrah, are giving considerable assistance in this work.

In the flax experiments at the Government Farm, Baghdad, the late October and early November sowings gave a heavier yield and better quality fibre than all other sowings. Sugar-cane varieties gratuitously supplied by the Department of Agriculture, Madras, are making good progress.

Sir Thomas Ward, the irrigation expert, on completing his investigation of the major irrigation schemes of Irak, recommended the adoption of two major schemes—namely, one on the River Diala, which will comprise the remodelling of existing canals, the construction of a permanent weir at Table Mountain, and of a dam at Tawilah where the Diala River cuts into the Jabal Hamrin; and one on the Euphrates, which will comprise the construction of a flood-spill canal into the Habbaniyah depression, an outlet canal from this reservoir back to the Euphrates, a barrage in the vicinity of Fallujah, and a large canal running parallel with the Euphrates, which will feed the existing canals as well as the Latifiyah, which will be the main new distributary. The Diala scheme comprises about two million acres of land now unproductive desert, and the Euphrates scheme about one and a-half million acres.

Negotiations are in train for the granting of a concession to complete these works and to develop the land. The preliminary projects will involve the cultivation of about 150,000 acres by pump irrigation on the Euphrates, and about 36,000 acres by flow irrigation on an existing canal in the Diala area. Provided political conditions improve there are strong indications that the development of at least one of the demonstration areas will be undertaken so as to produce a cotton crop next season.

The July to April exports of wheat from Irak were 80,833 tons, and of barley 102,542 tons—total 183,375 tons, as compared with 153,180 tons for the same period in 1922-1923. The total exports of the 1923 crop of dates to the end of April, 1924, was 122,367 tons, valued at Rs.15,502,840, as compared with 107,268 tons, valued at Rs. 13,024,364, for the corresponding season last year. The July to April exports of wool were 5,065 tons, as compared with 1,495 tons for the same period of 1922-1923.

SUDAN PRODUCE.

The following extracts are taken from the report of the Central Economic Board of the Sudan Government, dated May 26 :—

Gum.

The exports of gum during April were as follows, the value being given in parentheses :—2.1 tons of Bleached (£E146); 1,734.9 tons of Hashab (£E77,443); and 347.6 tons of Talh (£E8,509), viâ Port Sudan.

Kordofan Province.—20,426 kantars of gum were sold in El Obeid market during the month of April, as against 22,464 kantars during the same month last year. The average price was £E1.174 per kantar. The arrivals at El Obeid from Nahud were 7,346 kantars, as against 17,361 kantars during the same month last year. The amount sold at Nahud during the month was 24,013 kantars, as against 10,494 kantars during the same month last year, the average price being £E0.920 m/ms. the kantar. 6,318 kantars were sold at Um Ruaba at an average price of £E1.161 m/ms. the kantar, as against 4,596 kantars during the same month last year. At Rahad 2,091 kantars were sold at an average price of £E1.167 m/ms., as against 2,100 kantars during the same month last year.

Cotton.

Berber Province.—The amount of sakia cotton brought into Shendi up to April 30, 1924, was 1,232 kantars. Some 500 kantars of sakia cotton were sold by cultivators to outside buyers. These figures show a very satisfactory development of sakia-grown cotton, and further expansion is anticipated in 1924-1925. Bouga.—Area under cotton 750 feddans. Cotton received a final watering during the month. Owing to the extremely high temperature during the early part of the month a large proportion of bolls were shed, consequently the last picking will be much less than anticipated. 335 kantars of 315 rottles (unginned) of cotton were brought into store during the month, making a total of 3,484 kantars up to date. Kitiab.—Area under cotton 636 feddans. 91 kantars of 315 rottles (unginned) of cotton were weighed into store during the month, making a total up to date of 2,146 kantars, or 3.21 kantars per feddan. There are still 18-27 kantars to come in. Cotton is now being cut down and burned.

Blue Nile Province.—There is still a fair amount of cotton about, and it is estimated that the total export will reach 10,000 kantars, of which half should be American cotton.

Red Sea Province, April.—Tokar: There has been a steady increase in the price, which has ranged from P.T. 813 to P.T. 882 per kantar of 315 rottles of first-class cotton, and has averaged over P.T. 863. Second class prices ranged from P.T. 781 to P.T. 850, with an average of P.T. 828. The amounts brought into the market were (in kantars):—Special, 99; first class, 17,960: second class, 3,770; third class, 23—21,852; and the total value of the cotton sold during the month was £E185,551. The crop has been affected during the month by Asal, which has destroyed the younger bolls in some parts of the Delta.

Oriental Telephone.

The report of the Oriental Telephone and Electric Company for 1923 states that the net revenue was £44,996, plus £9,274 brought in, making £54,270. The directors recommend a final dividend of 6 per cent. (free of tax) on the old ordinary shares issued, making 10 per cent.; and a dividend at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum (free of tax) to December 31 on the new ordinary shares, calculated from the dates fixed for the payment of instalments due in 1923; carrying forward £16,388. Meeting, Great Eastern Hotel, E.C., July 1, 2.30 p.m.

Eastern Telegraph.

The revenue of the Eastern Telegraph Company for 1923 was £3,052,151, less £1,530,197 ordinary expenses, and £324,774 for the maintenance of cables, income-tax payable abroad, and temporary allowances to staff, leaving £1,197,179. After providing for income and corporation taxes payable in England, interest on mortgage debenture stock and dividends on preference stock, etc., there remains £806,166, plus £515,257 brought in, making £1,321,423. The directors have placed £300,000 to general reserve. Three interim dividends of 2½ per cent. each and a final dividend of 2½ per cent. have been paid on the ordinary stock, free of tax, leaving £521,423 to be carried forward.

Attock Oil.

The report of the Attock Oil Company for 1923 states that the profit, including profit on exchange and after charging up expenditure on well boring at the Khaur field, was £149,226, out of which there has been set aside for depreciation on field and refinery plant and expenditure accounts £58,000, leaving a net profit of £91,226. Adding the amount brought forward of £1,824 gives an available balance of £93,050. A dividend of 6 per cent., less tax, is proposed, leaving to be carried forward, subject to corporation tax, £3,050. The refinery has worked steadily and satisfactorily throughout the year. The average crude production and sales of refined products in 1923 both show an appreciable increase over the 1922 figures, but the volume of sales of products was less than the full possible production of these from the crude supplies available. An agreement wth the Burmah Oil Company has recently been entered into, under which the main products of the Attock Company will be marketed by the Burmah organisation on terms which should ensure a steady offtake of these products at satisfactory returns. This agreement has been running provisionally since October, 1923, and during 1924 there has been, under this arrangement, a considerable increase in the offtake of the company's products. The test well on the Dhulian field was abandoned at about 2,800 ft. owing to drilling difficulties. It is intended to persevere with the drilling of this area, and another site has been drilled to 635 ft., and will be carried down with a rotary outfit. The test well on the Gabhir area was carried to about 2,000 ft. Results at this site definitely condemned a large portion of the territory, but a reduced area is being held with the view to further testing.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

More Activity in Futures.

The Alexandria Commercial Company, in their report for the week ended June 12, state :—

The futures market since our last report has been moderately active. The net changes on the week are :—Sakellarides : $0.50 up for July, $0.07 down for November, $0.18 down for January. Ashmouni : $0.25 down for June, $0.50 up for August, $0.03 up for October, $0.02 down for December. There has been no outstanding feature during the week. Old crops are losing interest; in fact, Ashmouni old crop is hardly mentioned now. At the second June tender no dockets were issued. There has been a fair business passing in new crops, especially November Sakel, and quotations for these options are very steady. The market is distinctly a weather market, and governed to a large extent by American crop news. There has been a slight improvement in the demand from abroad, and we think that the trade would do well to watch Sakel new crops. On any appreciable decline November should, on the present outlook, be an attractive proposition. The week's receipts amount to 9,229 Krs. against exports 98,279 Krs.; the stock stands at 774,572 Krs.

Spot.—On Saturday last we started the summer régime, and the market was closed, and will continue to be closed on Saturdays until further notice. We were also closed on Monday for the Whitsun holidays. We have had a fair turnover of business during the week, total sales for the four days amounting to B/s 4,400, of which we estimate B/s 3,700 Sakellaridis and B/s 700 Uppers.

Sakellarides.—A certain amount of business has been done in good fair and good fair to fully good fair, with a consequent stiffening of prices as compared with contracts for these grades. The demand for the better grades continues, and with the gradual depletion of stocks holders are becoming daily more difficult to deal with. The low grades have been almost entirely neglected, and can be picked up at fairly reasonable prices.

Uppers.—All grades from fully fair and upwards have been dealt in. Below fully fair no business has been transacted, and holders of these cottons are getting anxious. The premiums paid for fully good fair and fully good fair to good continue to stiffen. The price of spot as compared with contracts for other grades remains about unchanged.

Crop, 1924.—Crop news continues to be good; the plant is strong and healthy and shows good progress. Climatic conditions are favourable. Water will soon become a much more important factor, but as long as we do not have any excessively hot spells, we think that the supply will be ample for the needs of the plant.

The report of the Ministry of Agriculture for the month of May reads :—Condition : Lower Egypt, 99; Middle Egypt, 91; Upper Egypt, 100; average, 97. Forecast yield in kantars per feddan. Lower Egypt, 3.49; Middle Egypt, 3.53; Upper Egypt, 4.88; average, 3.56. In the system of notation employed 100 is taken to represent an average condition of the crop reported on in each division of the country; this average is calculated from the crop results of the preceding ten years. The figures given above represent forecasts of the final condition of the cotton crop; they are liable to modification in future bulletins in the event of the occurrence of factors influencing the present crop prospects. The weather was, on the whole, favourable to germination and growth. Sowing of late crops was completed during the first week of May. Thinning, hoeing, watering, and manuring were taking place during the month. Slight attacks of cotton worm were reported from Teh el Barud, Tala, and Giza markazes, and were dealt with immediately. Flowers appeared in early sown crops.

The irrigation report of the Ministry of Public Works, April 21 to May 20, reads :—

Lower Egypt.—The water supply was sufficient for all requirements. Sowing of rice began in the last week of April, and demands increased as sowing progressed. No important difficulties were experienced in the distribution of water.

Upper Egypt.—Condition of irrigation was, on the whole, satisfactory. Some difficulty was experienced in Fourth and Giza circles owing to the increase of area under cotton and to encroachments for the purpose of watering bersim and sharaqi due principally to the existence of many unauthorised irrigation pipes in the Fourth circle.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

Improvement in Business.

The Manchester Cotton Trade Review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended June 14 states :—

There is little to report on this occasion, as, in consequence of the Whitsuntide holidays, most Manchester business houses have been closed for the entire week, and there is consequently nothing of interest to record regarding yarn or cloth.

Raw Cotton.—The weather reports from America have caused rather more fluctuation in raw cotton prices than during recent weeks. Operations in American "spot" cotton have been of an unimportant character. Egyptian qualities are steady, but with little business passing. Closing prices yesterday were as follows :—American fully middling, 17.48; Egyptian fully good fair, 23.60.

A further report, dated June 21, states :—

Either owing to an accumulation of demand during last week, when Manchester was virtually closed down, or to a feeling of greater confidence amongst merchants abroad, there has been a distinct improvement in business as compared with recent weeks. The volume of inquiry has been really substantial, but, as usual, ideas of buyers as to prices have been radically different from those of manufacturers.

Yarn.—Although orders for coarse counts of American are still on a very small scale, those for the medium counts have shown an improvement, but prices are not satisfactory. Business in Egyptian spinnings has been somewhat irregular; quotations remain firm. Shipments of yarn last month amounted to 18,029,100 lb., against 16,082,000 lb. in April, and 12,574,500 lb. in May last year.

Cloth.—A good inquiry has been experienced, but the result in actual orders booked has been somewhat disproportionate. On the whole, however, conditions are rather better. Demand from India has broadened, and the news regarding the monsoon being so far satisfactory, it is hoped that this is a forerunner of larger orders from that market. Small lines have been booked for China and other minor outlets. Shipments of cloth last month amounted to 394.513,000 square yards, against 377,718,000 sq. yards in April and 409,962,000 sq. yds. in May last year.

Raw Cotton.—A very steady market has been experienced, the day to day fluctuations during the week having never exceeded 21 points. Reports from America have been better than recently, and the outlook for the crop appears now to be brighter than at any time this season. Closing quotations yesterday were as follows:—American fully middling, 17.49; Egyptian fully good fair, 23.90.

LIVERPOOL COTTON REPORT.

Business on Small Scale.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended June 18:—

Egyptian Spot.—With the greater portion of the week given over to holidays in Manchester, business in both spot and forward cotton has been distinctly on the retail side; some slight improvement has been noticeable during the last few days, but even so the turnover leaves a good deal to be desired, and many holders show increased anxiety to liquidate their holding before the new crop discounts become a more pronounced factor. The general run of the small inquiry experienced has been for Fully Good Fair to Good Sakel, with occasional sales in the grades above. Cotton Good Fair and below has been neglected, as also all grades of Upper and the low and inferior qualities. Sudan and Tokar Sakel have only been occasionally asked for, and holders of the last-named quality especially have endeavoured to attract business by reducing their basis, but their efforts have only met with limited success. White Sudans do not appear to have been dealt in. Estimated sales, 1,000 bales Egyptians and 150 Sudan. Quotations for all grades of Sakellaridis are advanced 15 points, and those of Brown and Upper 5 points. Fully Good Fair Sakellaridis to-day 23.75d.

Company Meeting.

MORTGAGE COMPANY OF EGYPT.

Company's Satisfactory Position.

The Outlook in Egypt.

The sixteenth ordinary general meeting of the Mortgage Company of Egypt, Ltd., was held on June 24, at 6-7, King William Street, E.C. Colonel the Hon. Sidney Peel, D.S.O. (chairman of London Committee), presided.

The Secretary (Mr. S. R. Duncan) having read the notice convening the meeting and the report of the auditors.

The Chairman said: Before proceeding to the business of the day I wish to express our deep sense of the loss which we have sustained by the death of Sir Henry Babington Smith. He had had a most distinguished career in the Civil Service before he turned to business, in which he was no less distinguished. He was, as you know, at one time chairman of this company, and was chairman of the London Committee at the time of his death. No one ever spent his energies more freely in the public service during the war and the following years. Indeed, I feel no doubt that the extraordinary exertions which he put forth over and above his activities in the City did a very great deal to undermine his health. No more conscientious worker ever lived. I should like to add—what all his friends know very well—that he possessed a most lovable character. I do not think that in all his strenuous career he ever made an enemy.

The Dividend.

Turning to the report and accounts, which I have no doubt you will take as read, there is not a great deal to remark upon as compared with last year. Our net revenue is slightly less than last year; on the other hand, our profits are £4,000 or £5,000 higher, mainly owing to a diminution on the amount to be paid for corporation tax. We recommend a distribution of 12 per cent. to the ordinary shares, an allocation of £20,000 to the special reserve, which brings it up to £128,800, and we carry forward an increased amount.

I should mention here that it is especially necessary to carry forward an increased amount, because, in spite of the transfer of the conduct of our business to Egypt, mentioned in last year's report, the Inland Revenue authorities are claiming that we are still liable to income-tax. The case will shortly come on, and in spite of the fact that we were guided in our action by the best legal advice obtainable, the law with relation to income-tax is not so clearly laid down as to enable us to predict with any certainty what the result of the case may be.

The Balance-sheet.

Our balance-sheet, taken as a whole, discloses a rather stronger position than last year, but there is a certain shrinkage in the figures. The total amount which we have secured by first mortgage, including instalments in arrear and interest accrued but not due, is about £70,000 less than last year. On the other hand, property acquired by foreclosure has increased by about £100,000. This may seem a large increase, but it has really not much significance. It is, of course, no part of our policy to hold land, but we have no reason to part with the land we have been forced to acquire, except on reasonable terms. During the past year there has been no activity in land transactions, and buyers have been very cautious; but land has always been, and no doubt always will be, the principal field for investment in Egypt, and we do not anticipate any real difficulty in disposing of our holding.

There has at the same time been no great demand for new loans; this is a matter of general experience in Egypt. It may in part be due to the caution in buying land, to which I have alluded, but in the main it is caused by the abundant prosperity of Egypt for some years past. It is, in fact, a healthy sign; people have made so much money that they do not need to borrow.

There is only one other feature in the balance-sheet to which I need call attention. We have cancelled after repurchase just over £775,000 of our debentures; the book profit on these transactions, amounting to nearly £64,000, has hitherto been shown as debenture redemption reserve. As there is no need to retain this account, we have transferred £40,000 to general reserve, bringing it up to the very satisfactory figure of £250,000, equal to our paid-up capital, and the remainder to special reserve, which will then stand, as I have said, after this year's allocation at £128,800.

Cotton-Growing Developments.

The general commercial prospects in Egypt appear to be good. The cotton crop for 1923-24 will very nearly reach the figure of 6½ million kantars, which is well up to a satisfactory average. It is yet too early in the season to say much of the crop now in the ground; but a larger area has been sown, and there is at least a possibility of quite the largest crop for some years past. As regards the type of cotton cultivated, there are at the present time some interesting developments going on. In the last ten years Sakellarides, a long staple cotton, has been the dominant variety grown in the Delta. Though other varieties, such as Ashmouni and Zagora, mostly grown in Upper Egypt, might produce a higher yield per acre, the quality of Sakellarides was such that it commanded such a higher price as to more than compensate for any deficiency in bulk. In the last year or two, however, the demand for the somewhat inferior cottons has so much increased as to wipe out the difference that formerly existed in favour of Sakellarides. The Egyptian grower, exceedingly acute in all questions of price, has this year increased his area of the higher yielding varieties, and the result in produce of cotton and value of the crop will be eagerly looked for.

The Chairman, in conclusion, thanked the staff for their services, and welcomed to the meeting his Excellency V. Harari Pacha, C.M.G., the chairman of the company, to whom, he said, the excellent position of the company was largely due.

The report and accounts were unanimously adopted, the proposed dividend of 12 per cent. was approved, the formal business was duly transacted, and H.E. Harari Pacha expressed the gratitude of the staff in Egypt for the appreciation of the shareholders.
